Mr. Forrester thanked Mr. Hawes for his interest, cited the present handling of mental health in the prisons, and declined comment on the "neglected areas" mentioned by Mr. Hawes.

A representative of the United Church Women of Atlanta asked the Fulton legislative delegation at a public meeting to lend its support to prison reform in the state.

The Fulton juvenile advisory group praised The Atlanta Journal's series, and its chairman, Attorney William B. Spann Jr., commented that state corrections officials "should capitalize on the interest created;" . . . along with the report of R. A. Chappell to the Atlanta Crime Commission on the same subject.

AN EDITORIAL in The Christian Index urged Gov. Vandiver to include help for the prison system in his program of reform at the Milledgeville State Hospital.

"We need the help of penal experts," said the editorial. "We need the help of some leading citizens."

Meanwhile, there's always the problem of money. The state is casting around for a place to build a new prison to relieve a terribly overcrowded situation. That will cost a lot of money. Nearly everything that needs to be done in constructive fashion would cost some money, it appears.

Several weeks ago, when this reporter was visiting prisons, one stop was at the Putnam Prison Branch at Eatonton. Conducting a look-around was Louie Tuggle, yardman. After an hour or so of looking had revealed the entire contents of the prison, Mr. Tuggle said: "Well, now that you've seen it all, what suggestions would you make for improvement?"

Ninety days do not an expert make, let alone an hour or so, but a few audacious suggestions concerning the prison system will here be put down by an outsider:

—Why not seek the advice and help of knowledgeable and interested citizens and of penal experts for the purpose of arriving at a long-range plan for penal improvement, for the purpose of creating a goal to work to? Why not listen to R. A. Chappell of the Federal Probation Board, who made the report to the Atlanta Crime Commission? Why not seek the advice of someone like Dr. Philip Weltner, the former Oglethorpe University president who went to a chain gang voluntarily in 1912 in the interest of penal reform? Why not seek the help of known authorities on the subject? There is one at the Atlanta Federal Penitentiary who has been sought out by numerous other states—but not by Georgia.

—THE COUNTY CAMP situation is shot through with politics from fore to aft, from beginning to end, from the state level down to the precincts. The practice of running county camps is dwindling wherever modern penal practices are put into effect. So why not set up a plan, not a drastic, overnight one, but a longer-range one to gradually do away with county camp control of state prisoners?

What about county financial situations? Wouldn't this work a hardship on counties? Not an undue one, if a gradual situation. And in addition it can be said flatly that prisoners are not confined for county benefit anyway, political considerations notwithstanding.

What about the fine, well-built county camps in which thousands have been invested? Over a period of time, why couldn't the state acquire the better ones for branch prisons under state control? This it did in Putnam County. And it has built prison branches in other places.

WHILE REMOVING political considerations from the corrections system, this would also remove some political wardens.

—Meanwhile, why not set up a program seeking wardens with some penal and/or sociological background, likewise not an overnight thing. More immediate could be the removal of those who have repeatedly shown sadistic tendencies in the past.

—At the same time, guards could be put on notice—some need it and some don't, of course—that there will be no foot-in-the-rear overseeing, that example-setting instead will be demanded of custodial personnel. This would work only where the warden's attitude matched the directive.

—WHY NOT INSTITUTE immediately a program of industry to sell to the state and its agencies and political subdivisions—a program that could start with a moderate investment and build itself up if there existed a lawful compulsion that its products be favored over political sellers from one administration to another? This same program would lead to the solving of more problems than one, including the one of sending prisoners out penniless after their time has been served, invited to err again.

—Why not set up at least limited recreation facilities at all prison camps? The few camps which let inmates indulge about once a week in such as horseshoes and volley ball find it pays off in prisoner morale.

—WHY NOT START OUT an education process on a shoestring, even if limited in the beginning to inmate teachers working a few hours a week with those who can neither read nor write?

—Reassess punitive measures, retaining the certainty of punishment for rule-breaking but allowing the individual to retain his dignity and mental and physical health while undergoing extra punishment. This could include a standardization of solitary confinement practices.

—And why not provide a board removed from the department of corrections to hear prisoner complaints? Sometimes legitimate ones are ignored because some officials feel they must under all circumstances trust the guard over the prisoner. Under that circumstance, the complaining prisoner is never telling the truth—a situation adding to the hopelessnes and futility found in some prisons.

SUCH A GROUP to be in the least effective would have to be composed of individuals interested only in justice and humanity and not in political favor, individuals who would look upon the confined man as a prisoner, but not "only a prisoner."

—All the while, competent minds could be working conscientiously toward a corrections system that would seek to do what its name implies—correct the offender; a system that would seek more equal justice in the beginning; one that would make wider use of probation and parole powers, one that would incarcerate convicts on the basis of known background, and let them back to society, following their "treatment" and punishment and debt service, rehabilitated if possible and ready and able to enter an honest life.

The present system falls somewhat short of that.

For how long, how long will it do so?

Vandiver Rejects State Crime Board

By GENE BRITTON

Gov. Vandiver squelched a proposal for a state crime commission Thursday, declaring there is no rampant crime in Georgia.

The governor was asked at his news conference about a recommendation by the Atlanta Citizens' Crime Committee that a state crime commission be created under an administration law enacted by the last General Assembly.

Vandiver said he recommended the legislation merely as a standby authority and hoped it would not have to be used.

The Atlanta committee criticized ineffective law enforcement in some areas of the state and complained that the Georgia prison system is an archaic one which emphasizes custodial care rather than rehabilitation.

Vandiver said he didn't consider that the state's crime situation is severe, and, as to the penal system, he said the Corrections department is doing an excellent job under unfortunate circumstances.

Vandiver said planned expansion of physical facilities, including the establishment of an industrial prison system, would solve many of the problems.

On other topics, the governor was asked at the news conference about a recent statement by former Gov. Arnall, who predicted a "political revolution" in the state.

"Predicting or hoping?" Vandiver quipped.

He was reminded that Arnall had said that former Gov. Griffin seemed to be "copyrighting" the closed schools issue, and that he, Arnall, was advocating open schools. Vandiver was asked which of the two he would prefer if Arnall and Griffin were the only candidates for governor in the election.

He grinned and asked, "You don't really expect me to answer that question do you?"

Governor Can't Select Banks Chief

Gov. Vandiver cannot name a successor to the late Superintendent of Banks A. P. Persons until the legislature meets again, according to a 1919 law.

The law, apparently unknown to Gov. Vandiver and other state officials, was brought to light by State Auditor B. E. Thrasher.

The law states that the superintendent of banks is to be appointed by the governor with the advice and consent of the Senate.

But it adds:

"In the event there shall be a vacancy in the office when the Senate is not in session . . . the assistant superintendent shall act, holding the office until the Senate convenes and a successor . . . is appointed."

Another provision of the law stipulates that while acting as superintendent, the assistant shall receive the pay of the superintendent.

The present assistant superintendent is W. M. Jackson.

The law requires that the superintendent "be a man of good character and (have) at least five years' active experience in the banking business."

It also stipulates that he must not have business connections with any bank during his term.

Crime Board to Propose Statewide Probe Body

Citizens Group Hears Prison System Called Inefficient Political Plum

The Atlanta Crime Committee decided Wednesday to ask Gov. Vandiver to establish a crime probe group operating on a statewide level.

The decision followed a wide-open discussion which (1) characterized the Georgia penal system as an archaic and inefficient political plum and (2) lamented lax law enforcement in the far reaches of Georgia.

Charles Jagels

But, recognizing both problems as beyond the scope of its function in metropolitan Atlanta, the committee agreed to call upon the governor in a body to request establishment of a state crime commission.

WELTNER TO SURVEY

As a preliminary, the committee instructed Investigator Charles L. Weltner to survey state law and determine the extent of the governor's power in establishing a crime probe body, as suggested by committee member Charles H. Jagels.

Committee members claimed the problem lies in lax law enforcement in some sections of Georgia, coupled with the state prison system's emphasis on custodial care instead of rehabilitation.

The discussion was kicked off by Committee Chairman Morris B. Abram, who said he has been long concerned with reform of the penal system.

CORRECTIONS UNIT HIT

Referring to the state agency headed by Jack M. Forrester, he said, "It is labeled the Department of Corrections, but it does not correct."

He was joined by committee member Frank C. Bowen Sr., who said:

"Those in charge of prisons are not interested in reports or suggestions. We've not been able to get anywhere with Forrester. Our prisons are just a place to confine people, not rehabilitate them.

"Anything we start in Fulton County doesn't have much chance on Capitol Hill. We all know that."

Abram, citing the need for better prison facilities and classification of prisoners for rehabilitation purposes, said prison reform appeared to be "an extremely immovable object."

"POLITICAL PLUMS"

Prison reform efforts meet inertia, he said, because the creation of many small prison units throughout Georgia comprised "political plums" which boosted local economies and "made prison labor available for private and semi-private use."

"This is a state problem and beyond our scope," said Jagels, in suggesting the state committee. "What we can do is hard to tell. It's been my experience that periodic reform governors crop up, but I don't think Vandiver is a reform governor.

"My knowledge is only casual, but Vandiver is interested only in the commendable goal of saving the taxpayers money.

"I get the impression he wishes the newspapers would lay off some of this crime and corruption stuff."

Baptists Urge Prison Probe

Call for Rehabilitation Of Convicts

The Christian Index, publication of the Georgia Baptist Convention, has called for an investigation of Georgia's prison system "by able men outside the prison administration."

In what seemed to be a criticism of Gov. Vandiver, an editorial in the Jan. 7 issue of the publication, which has a circulation of 106,697, declared that: "The General Assembly apparently must take the initiative if anything is to be done."

"The administration apparently finds no need for a fact-finding commission," the editorial said.

LAST WEEK, Gov. Vandiver received from a legislative subcommittee a report of brutality at the Buford Rock Quarry Prison and turned it over to the Department of Corrections, which administers that institution and the others of the system. The governor said the charges would be investigated by the department and any guard guilty of brutality would be fired.

The editorial added: "There is need for reform within the prison walls and there is need for a helping hand when the prisoner is released."

This was the second editorial The Index has carried on prisons since the beginning of a series of articles on the system in The Atlanta Journal. An editorial in the Dec. 2 issue urged Gov. Vandiver to move with "boldness" to lead a study of the system.

THE LATEST editorial declared:

"The administration apparently finds no need for a fact-finding commission. But all is not well within the walls. The solitary confinement cells, for example, are little if any better than the dungeons of earlier centuries. We even have the whipping posts as a carry-over.

"Let's establish the facts by able men outside the prison administration. The General Assembly apparently must take the initiative if anything is to be done."

Georgia is "sadly negligent" in the area of vocational training for prisoners, The Index said. Prison industries, it declared, will save money, "but of greater importance, will provide employment for otherwise idle men."

The only opposition to a prison industries program, it held, "will come from the private business interests accustomed to profits from sales to the state."

erved by calling up soldiers for less than a year active duty. Said Gilpatric:

"The purpose was to persuade Khrushchev to call off his threat of signing a separate peace treaty with East Germany, which would cut off our acess routes and threaten our vital interests in Berlin. We may face the same threat again this year."

3 STATES STILL BALK

This special report is based on data from various authoritative sources, including the Journal-Constitution's special correspondents, who filed exclusive summaries from six of the Southern states.

More public schools in 17 Southern and "border" states will be desegregated this fall, bringing to 948 the total number of school districts which have complied with the U.S. Supreme Court decision of May, 1954.

Only three Southern states — Alabama, Mississippi and South Carolina — will open their schools without integrated classrooms.

In the other 14 states, 33 of the 948 districts will be desegregated for the first time. Twenty-four of the 948 districts, which already had been desegregated, will have Negroes in schools with whites for the first time.

In the parochial area, Roman Catholic schools in Atlanta and 71 north Georgia counties have been ordered by Archbishop Paul J. Hallinan to integrate this fall. His order affects 7,500 pupils, including 735 Negroes.

A much greater number — about 75,000 pupils — are affected in a mandate which Archbishop Joseph F. Rummel issued at New Orleans in March, calling for integration of the 153 archdiocesan schools.

Here is a brief analysis of public school desegregation this fall:

ARKANSAS

Little Rock's school board approved transfer of more Negroes to the previously desegregated junior and senior high schools, making 78 Negroes assigned to biracial classes. This is 30 more than last year.

DELAWARE

All 92 districts are desegregated. Laurel, one of the few large districts still with separate schools, has approved admission of at least 22 Negroes in formerly all-white elementary and high schools.

Crime Unit Weighs Alcoholics' Farm

By BUDDY DAVIS

An effort to curb Atlanta's drunkenness problem, deemed costly both in dollars and humanity, was launched Wednesday by the Atlanta Crime Committee.

Placed under serious study was establishment of a "drunk farm" to dehydrate alcoholic inmates during terms extending from two to six months. The first practical step planned by the committee is conferences with city officials.

Statewide crime committee suggested. Story on Page 8.

A committee report revealed Atlanta police made 46,110 arrests for drunkenness in 1959. Of this number, 98 per cent drew short-term sentences in the city prison farm.

Housing of these prisoners alone cost the city an estimated $1,200,000 last year, not including cost of police and court operations.

Crime Committee Chairman Morris B. Abram, terming short-term imprisonment ineffective, said the current procedure was "pouring money down the rat hole."

The Crime Committee had before it a report on alcoholism prepared under the direction of committee member Charles H. Jagels. The report was critical of current practice of sentencing drunks to "$15 or 15 days," then returning them to the streets to commit another offense.

It looked with favor on a plan ess.

As Dr. Weltner found in 1912, the convict's day is filled with work, and no positive restorative action is taken "to fit him for an honest life." Ninety-five per cent of all convicts are eventually released back to the society they offended—in most cases not corrected, sometimes embittered, and always bearing the stigma of being an ex-con.

With the wisdom of years between his voluntary chain gang experience and the present, Dr. Weltner said:

"We need to take a fresh look at what we are doing in terms of what we know."

SO HE ASKED questions on the penal system — a system whose object is the protection of society against criminal acts, rather than raw punishment and revenge — questions asked "in terms of what we know."

Does society need protection? How do we get it?

"We don't get it by making people worse than they are.

"We don't get it by locking a man up a given number of years, then turning him out.

"We have two alternatives — either make him better, or shoot him."

Many of the answers to the penal problem are in the hands of the legal profession, said Dr. Weltner who started his diversified career as an attorney.

"IF WE LOOK for the best interests of all concerned," he asked, "wouldn't we have a different concept of the courts?"

The court is a battleground, he said, "a substitute for a personal feud," with the judge serving as an umpire and the jury deciding who wins. The court should not serve as a battleground, he said, but should conduct a "wide inquiry."

Dr. Weltner's inquiring approach to the penal problem:

When a person has committed an act against society, the inquiry should find out: Is he the kind of person who, unless restricted, would repeat the act? Does society have to be protected against repetition?

"Then the question is not how many years behind bars," Dr. Weltner said.

"The true question is, what must we do to get that fellow straightened out?

"YOU CAN'T protect society any other way, except by shooting him.

"That's the beginning of the inquiry."

That's the beginning, where's the solution? The question to Dr. Weltner brought another from him.

"What can we do now that will have greater value for the people 15 or 20 years from now?"

Prisons are full of individuals. You find as much diversity under prison suits as outside. How do you "straighten these fellows out?"

"First, know these people as individuals. Can this happen as the result of a court trial? No. Can we learn the answers through questions asked as a matter of record? No.

"That's the beginning of the inquiry."

"WE JUST DON'T know enough. We're not asking the right questions."

Then is this a dead end, a futile hope?

"No," said Dr. Weltner. "It's not a dead end. It's the beginning.

"Collectively we know enough to answer those questions. As a group we know. It's up to us who don't know to learn from those who do . . ."

It's also up to those who don't know to say so, he said.

"SOMETIMES our duty requires us to say, 'I don't know.' It's no disgrace to say that."

Among those who could work toward a solving of penal problems, said Dr. Weltner, are the lawyers. "With their sense of justice," he said, "it's their baby. Society looks to them."

And who, Dr. Weltner was asked, would be in position to instigate the "fresh look" that he proposes?

THE UNTIED D.A.

BILLINGS, Mont., Nov. 28 (AP)—One of the new door signs placed in the federal building in Billings by the General Services Administration sports this misprint: "Untied States Attorney."

"I hope I'll never have to use it." There is no point in wasting money on a commission that is not needed, he asserted.

Gov. Vandiver commented that the State Department of Corrections, which was criticized by members of the Atlanta Citizens Crime Committee, is doing "an excellent job under very trying circumstances."

Some parts of the prison system are overcrowded and the proposed industrial prison is greatly needed, he asserted, calling attention to action by the last General Assembly to expand prison facilities.

"I THINK the greatest part of our problems will be taken care of by this action," he said.

The governor's comments on crime were in response to a step taken by the Atlanta Citizens Crime Committee to look into the question of whether the governor should appoint a state crime agency of "impartial, distinguished citizens."

At its meeting Wednesday, at which the Department of Corrections was criticized and Gov. Vandiver was described as being commendably interested in economy but not in such matters as prison reform, the committee decided to have attorney Charles L. Weltner determine what authority the governor may have to establish a statewide crime commission.

CHAIRMAN Morris Abram said Mr. Weltner will make a report to the commission July 13.

The Atlanta committee, Mr. Abram said, has found that the problem of crime in Atlanta is "inextricably intertwined with the way the state deals with the problems of conviction and correction." He added:

"We noticed that 75 per cent of the violent crimes since Jan. 1 were committed by persons with previous service in some institution. We are not quarreling with the fact that they are out. What we are saying is that those who enter these institutions are not corrected, are perhaps embittered and are more of a menace to society when they come out than when they entered."

Vandiver Discusses Schools With Voter League Officials

Short Conference Apparently Changes No Segregation Views

Gov. Ernest Vandiver and two officials of the League of Women Voters of Georgia chatted briefly and amiably Monday about the school situation in Georgia.

But when the short conference was over, it was apparent to all that neither the governor nor the two ladies who visited his office had changed their minds one bit about segregation and the possibility of Georgia's public schools being closed.

Mrs. Edward M. Vinson, state president of the League of Women Voters of Georgia, and Mrs. Philip Hammer, chairman of the education committee of the league's state board, sought and received the talk with the governor.

MRS. VINSON SAID Monday that she and Mrs. Hammer represented only the league, and not the nine or 10 other organizations which sent representatives to the Capitol last Tuesday. That group found the governor not in his office, and some members of the group seemed to feel the governor was evading them.

Mrs. Vinson and Mrs. Hammer gave the governor a letter Monday, outlining the league's endorsement of a legislative commission to review school segregation laws in Georgia and urging Gov. Vandiver to set up such a commission.

SUCH A COMMISSION, said the letter, ought to:

"1. Devote immediate attention to evaluating methods used to prevent school closing in other states.

"2. Explore new legal channels which will conform to the Supreme Court ruling (on segregation in the public schools) but will give scope to the will and wishes of individual parents.

"3. Come up with recommendations to the 1960 General Assembly."

But Gov. Vandiver, expanding on what he had told his press conference an hour earlier, told the league officials that the request for such a commission had been sent from the Atlanta School Board to the General Assembly.

"The legislature will deal with it," he said.

MRS. VINSON TOLD the governor how the state convention of the league in May adopted a resolution urging creation of a special body "dedicated to finding ways of preserving the public school system."

"Nobody is more interested in keeping the schools open than I," Gov. Vanderbilt said. "But I want to keep them open and segregated."

"That's what we are working toward. . . . The governor is bound by the law, and I intend to comply with what the law is," he added.

"The state law, you mean?" asked Mrs. Vinson.

The governor said "yes," that was what he meant.

GOV. VANDIVER assured Mrs. Vinson and Mrs. Hammer that he is certain the General Assembly will give consideration to the plan for a commission to study the situation.

"That is the most we can ask," Mrs. Vinson replied. She said she and Mrs. Hammer would just leave a copy of the league letter with the governor and forward other copies to Lt. Gov. Garland Byrd and House Speaker George Smith.

After shaking hands again with Gov. Vandiver and standing by him for press photographers, the two league officials thanked him again for his time and departed. The entire conference lasted about five minutes.

GOV. VANDIVER permitted about a dozen newsmen to come into his office for the conference when he welcomed the two women.

Mrs. Vinson opened the talk by telling him: "It is so good of you to see us this morning." She said they realized how busy the governor is, and then got right down to business.

The governor assured the two league officials that it was a pleasure for him to meet them and talk with them.

He made it plain, however, that he had not composed a commission like the one being proposed and that it would be up to the General Assembly to consider the idea.

Vandiver's Text On Crime Control

Here is the text of Gov. Ernest Vandiver's prepared statement Monday, in which he set out his policy regarding reported incidents of law violations in two Georgia counties:

"Let it be clear and unmistakable that I do not condone crime, anywhere, any place, at any time.

"Should crime exist in Fulton County, McIntosh County and Gilmer County, it should be blotted out.

"The people of Fulton County, McIntosh County and Gilmer County elect law enforcement officers at the local level. It is the primary responsibility of those elected officials to deal with law enforcement in their own particular situations. Should local people feel that their local, elected officials are not properly performing their lawful duties, then, local people, if they so desire, can change these officials at the ballot box.

"IT HAS long been the policy of the State of Georgia—a very sound policy—not to interfere in local law enforcement unless requested to do so by local officials.

"Local self-government is the very bedrock of the American Republic, and it is local self-government that has made America strong, free and great.

"A few years ago Atlanta and Fulton County was overrun with slot machines of a gambling character. When local officials asserted their responsibility, these gaming devices were removed. This action was indeed commendable.

"TODAY within two blocks of the Atlanta City Hall, and in virtually every portion of Fulton County, mixed drinks are being openly and notoriously served across the bar—all one has to have is the money to pay for it.

"To be sure, a visiting CONVENTION TOURIST or a local citizen, in Atlanta and Fulton County can walk into commonplace or plush open barrooms, request and receive a Scotch and soda or a bourbon and gingerale—or a double Martini. SERVING MIXED DRINKS IS AGAINST THE LAW OF GEORGIA.

"IT IS POSSIBLE that I could send the GBI or the State Patrol or a State Revenue agent to investigate this violation of the state law, as aforesaid.

"As governor of Georgia, I do suggest a violation of state law is a violation whether it is committed in Fulton County, McIntosh County or Gilmer County.

"There is one important exception to the policy of the State of Georgia of not interfering with the duties of local officials. That exception is when organized racketeering and crime affect the economy and good name of the state.

"Should local officials fail or refuse to perform their duty to enforce the law after proper warning from the state, it then becomes the duty of the state to act.

"Again, let me make it clear that Georgia has a very minimum of organized crime.

"Where any isolated instances of organized criminal activities are reported to exist, the State of Georgia is and will be keeping such activities under close surveillance.

"Should it ever become apparent that local law enforcement is broken down throughout the state and that organized crime is running rampant, I will implement the State Crime Commission and investigate violation of state law, whether that be in Fulton County, McIntosh County or Gilmer County."

Churchwomen for Reforms in Prison

Statewide Organization Tells Governor 'It Is Clear' System Needs Revision

A statewide organization of church women has written Gov. Vandiver that "it has become increasingly clear" a complete revision of the state prison system is needed.

The comment was included in a letter to the governor from the United Church Women of Georgia, an organization composed of an estimated 20,000 women.

The letter, agreed upon at a statewide meeting Friday in College Park, pledged cooperation with the governor "in your efforts to take initial steps to improve Georgia's penal system."

IT HAS ALSO been announced that the National Probation and Parole Assn., at the behest of the church women and the Georgia Federation of Women's Clubs, is sending to Georgia Monday an expert to lead a "citizens' action" program for penal study and reform.

Aubrey Elliot, a field representative of the national organization, will arrive Monday for "a lengthy stay." His visit will be financed by the Ford Foundation.

The letter to the governor was composed and dispatched at a meeting at St. John's Episcopal Church. All but one of the group's 28 councils were represented. Mrs. John Patton of Atlanta is president of the United Church Women, and Mrs. W. Sheffield Owen of Atlanta is chairman of the penal reform committee.

THE LETTER said:

"We want you to know that we are solidly behind you in your efforts to take initial steps to improve Georgia's penal system. We are grateful that Mr. Frank Gross, as head of the House Committee on State Prisons and Property, has given prompt attention to find out firsthand about some of our most pressing prison problems.

"We have been working for an improved prison system for several years, with particular emphasis on young offenders. We have dedicated ourselves to continue this work, since we feel even more strongly now. It has become increasingly clear that we need to work for a complete revision of the whole system. . . .

"WE WISH to assure you and other public officials of our willingness to cooperate with you in your effort to meet immediate crises in our prison system, and also to work for a long-range program."

The churchwomen also agreed to visit prisons and jails in their own communities and get firsthand knowledge of them.

Gov. Vandiver, in his speech two weeks ago to the General Assembly, laid out plans for an "initial program" to relieve overcrowding in the penal system and foster rehabilitation through industrialization.

A three-bill package has been introduced in the Legislature to set up the prisons indu its management.

Deputy Warden at Buford Denies It, Citing Prison's New Search Rule

By JOHN PENNINGTON

A young Roswell man said Tuesday he was manhandled and intimidated by the deputy warden when he went to the Buford Rock Quarry Prison Branch over the weekend to visit his brother, a convict.

James V. Foster said deputy warden Dan Johnson, in the process of searching him, lifted him up on his tiptoes by the seat of his britches, telling him:

"I'm going to search you like one of these d----- convicts."

ASKED ABOUT the incident by telephone, deputy warden Johnson said:

"When they come in, we search 'em. If you come in, we search you. We search the newspapermen or anybody. Nothing happened (with Foster). Only he got searched, see? He complained. I told him if he didn't like it, he could just get out of there."

Johnson said he did not search Foster in a rough manner. He said he just searched him.

Warden Hubert Smith said the quarry prison has a new rule that all incoming persons are searched. He said he knew nothing about the Foster incident.

FOSTER SAID that in addition he was restricted, by a guard standing inches away, in his conversation with his brother.

Foster, of Rte. 1, Roswell, said he and his wife went to the quarry prison during early Sunday afternoon to visit his brother, Troy, who is doing a long term for several offenses, car theft, arson, armed robbery and shooting at another. He took along a package containing some sweatshirts and work gloves.

"I laid the package down and wrote Troy's name on it," he said. "Then this man said, 'I haven't searched you yet.'

"I said, 'What do you mean? Search me?'

"He said, 'I'm going to search you like one of these d—— convicts.'

"HE GRABBED me by the belt and by my pocket and jerked me straight up on my tiptoes. It broke two belt loops on my Sunday britches."

Foster said when he complained, Guard No. 27 commented to Deputy Warden Johnson, who had done the searching: "I'll throw 'em out the —— door if you want me to."

Foster said that when he commented casually about some articles on prisons in the paper, the guard told him:

"Wait a minute. You can't talk to the prisoner about anything that doesn't concern his welfare."

FOSTER SAID that on a previous occasion his wife and father and mother had a visit abruptly terminated when Troy began to cry and complained that he had been slapped for asking for an aspirin.

Gov. Vandiver has said he feels the state's prisons are being properly run by able men, and he finds it difficult to work up sympathy for the incorrigibles at the Buford prison.

Governor Says Brutality Charge Unsubstantiated

Has Read Corrections Report On Buford Quarry Conditions

By CURTIS DRISKELL

Gov. Ernest Vandiver said Thursday he has read a report by the State Corrections Department on alleged brutality toward prisoners at the Buford Rock Quarry Prison and that he found "The allegations are not substantiated."

The governor told his news conference the report from the Corrections Department was "an objective report."

He said it contained the facts and circumstances concerned. The report referred to is one gotten up by the Corrections Department during the past session of the Georgia Legislature and delivered to him, but apparently not read by the governor until just recently.

GOV. VANDIVER did not offer to release the report itself. His statement on it was in answer to questions at his morning news conference.

Corrections Dept. Director Jack M. Forrester delivered the report to the Governor, in response to a request by a legislative committee that the Corrections Department do the investigating of the rock quarry, a prison branch for hardened and habitual criminals which has been under fire on numerous occasions in the past.

Mr. Forrester declined at the time to release the report or to comment on it himself, saying it was a report intended for the Governor and that any statements on it should come from Gov. Vandiver.

PINEY WOODS PETE Says:

DEAR MISTER EDITOR:

Either most politicians are dumb or they think a lots of voters are. (Maybe it could be both.)

What brought this on was the Republicians bragging about what they call a Eisenhower surplus of $1.1 billion for the year ended June 30, 1960, and that the Treasury will pay $600 million on the national debt in August.

But they ain't mentioning the Eisenhower deficit of $12.4 billion for the year ended June 30, 1959, and they ain't pointing out that the overall Eisenhower deficit since he's been in office is $18.2 billion, after subtracting 3 surpluses totaling $4.3 billion. (Of course, both the President and Congress are responsible for this big deficit.)

Yours truly,
PINEY WOODS PETE.

Red Awaked After 18 Years

MOSCOW, Aug. 4 (AP)—A Soviet soldier knocked out by a bomb blast in World War II has been brought back to consciousness after 18 years by a new method of treatment, Tass reports.

The Soviet news agency said Pyotr Vetrov had been in a coma since he was wounded when the Nazis were trying to take Moscow in 1942. He was an army driver.

Dr. Leonid Konderyakov successfully used a new treatment including electric therapy, Tass said. Vetrov, now 47, told Soviet newsmen he hopes to become a driver again. Doctors are certain he will be able to return to work soon, Tass said.

Prisoner Schooling At Alto Is Urged

By RICHARD ASHWORTH

The State Board of Corrections has urged that laws be passed, if necessary, to set up an educational program for young prisoners at the Georgia Industrial Institute.

The recommendation was made in the annual report of the board to the governor and the General Assembly. The report was released Wednesday.

A similar recommendation came recently from the State Board of Education. However, the school board suggested that legislators "consider" whether such a program should be set up.

And the school board also wanted the General Assembly to "designate which state agency should have the responsibility—and the funds—to do this."

The corrections board proposal went further than this. It said such a program should be instituted by the State Department of Education in cooperation with the corrections board.

The corrections unit would maintain custodial supervision and the education department would employ teachers and have

The Forrester Reforms

REFORMS IN Georgia's prison system have been greatly needed, though there have been some, including prison administrators, who emphatically have denied that the system falls short of perfection.

However, the chief apologist for the prisons, Director of Corrections Jack Forrester, now has come up with a fine new program designed to correct some of the deficiencies which The Atlanta Journal among others has been emphasizing.

One is an educational program for juveniles under the system's jurisdiction. This is a basic need.

Another basic need also is on Mr. Forrester's list. It is an upgrading of prison personnel by making their jobs more attractive, and through a training program for guards and others with supervisory jobs.

Critics of the system have found many of the publicized faults of Georgia prisons can be traced directly to wardens and guards who do not know their jobs and who try to substitute cruelty for intelligent treatment.

Mr. Forrester says he would like to remedy this. We'd like to see him do it. We'd also like to see the state carry through with his suggestion that these prison employes be given retirement and old age benefits, as a means to this end.

Until they get these benefits they will remain second class employes of the state, and the state can expect only substandard performance from them.

Mr. Forrester's plans for the New Year are impressive. If he is able to put them into effect it will mean a better deal for prisoners and the state at large.

Crime Delay a Great Risk

THAT GEORGIA desperately needs a statewide citizens crime committee should be evident to citizens and politicians alike.

It should not be necessary for the Atlanta Citizens Crime Committee, which has done such an excellent job in its home territory, to recommend the formation of a statewide group.

But it has, and the proposal should not be buried by the state administration simply because it originates in Fulton County.

The Atlanta Crime Committee speaks with considerable authority. It has worked on local crime problems for months. It has seen how closely many of these problems tie in with poor state administration.

There is a need for study and action on the state front for two very good reasons: (1) the state penal system is archaic and inefficient and the Department of Corrections has shown it isn't going to move a peg to change it; and (2) law enforcement has broken down in some Georgia localities.

The situation is critical and a great many citizens are concerned. They are concerned that flagrant violations of the law are being condoned—openly—and that even when court action is instituted the violators too often go unpunished because of technicalities.

Months ago, when troubles at the Buford Rock Quarry Prison were getting out of hand, The Atlanta Journal appealed for a citizens committee to study the state prison system.

No such committee was named; yet prison administration and law enforcement have not improved.

Now Atlanta's crime probers have spoken. The state will be taking a great risk if it continues to ignore these warnings for an honest appraisal of where we are falling short.

Church Group Urges State Crime Study

By JOHN PENNINGTON

The United Church Women of Georgia urged Gov. Ernest Vandiver Saturday to "recognize with us the urgent need for a crime study commission."

The church women sent a telegram to the governor—and another to Morris Abram, chairman of the Atlanta Citizens Crime Commitee—following a semiannual conference in Atlanta.

The organization, which has a statewide membership of about 20,000, joined a growing campaign for a state study of crime and punishment and associated problems.

THE PAST Fulton County Grand Jury urged the governor to create a study committee to look into crime, "from causation to correction."

The governor has said he does not intend to use his authority to appoint a crime commission because crime is not "rampant" in the state.

The telegram to him said:

". . . Since we know your and Mrs. Vandiver's interest in the social problems of our state, we believe you will recognize with us the urgent need for a crime study commission. We hope you will give this matter serious consideration."

THE TELEGRAM was signed by Mrs. John Patton of Atlanta, president of the organization, and Mrs. W. Sheffield Owen, chairman of the group's penal reform committee.

The telegram to Mr. Abram stated a belief "in the urgent necessity for a crime study commission," and endorsed "heartily" a proposed conference at Athens on the subject of crime and prevention.

The church group actively has been seeking penal reform and better detention facilities for juveniles on a statewide basis. In co-operation with the Georgia Federation of Women's Clubs, it secured a "docu-drama" presentation which presents the plight of the juvenile offender in Georgia.

The drama was presented Friday at the state conference and Mrs. Owen said the group has been "bombarded" with requests for it.

Forrester Pledges Full Quarry Probe

Buford Story to Be Sought on Both Sides As All Will Get Chance to Talk

Jack Forrester, director of the State Corrections Department, has promised "a complete and thorough investigation" into alleged brutalities at the Buford Rock Quarry Prison.

Mr. Forrester announced plans for a quarry probe after receiving from Gov. Vandiver the Frank Gross report on inmate reports of beatings and brutalities.

The report "alleges certain acts of brutality toward prisoners serving at the state institution for incorrigibles at Buford," said Mr. Forrester in a prepared statement.

A PROBE WILL BE made "in order that the truth may be determined," he said.

"All parties who have any authentic information will be given an opportunity to be heard, including wardens, guards, doctors and other personnel," said the corrections director.

Mr. Forrester's announcement came after House Speaker George L. Smith termed the Gross report a "serious" one needing further investigation. He said he felt sure the Board of Corrections "will immediately begin an investigation and report back to the governor and to the House."

Rep. Gross of Toccoa, chairman of the legislative committee on state institutions and property, reported to Gov. Vandiver Tuesday that he made a surprise visit to the quarry prison and heard numerous allegations of brutality from prisoners.

Women's Clubs Demand Georgia Prison Reforms

The Georgia Federation of Women's Clubs Monday called for sweeping prison reforms in the state. The group urged this action in a telegram to Jack Forrester, director of the State Board of Corrections, meeting during the day.

Mrs. Hellice Clark, executive director of the federation, said the telegram was prompted by Atlanta Journal reporter John Pennington's current series of articles on conditions in the prison. She added that the federation "has always been interested in prison reform" and that members felt the articles have aroused public interest in improving prison conditions.

THE TEXT of the telegram follows:

"Our organization is looking to you and your staff to develop and implement broad programs to improve our antiquated correctional system. We are on record demanding reform of subhuman treatment of prisoners in solitary confinement cells in state prisons and county work camps.

"You will have our full cooperation in developing programs designed toward the rehabilitation of prisoners including: classification centers; developing prison industry; increase use of probation services, especially for misdemeanants, and job placement for prisoners eligible for parole."

The telegram was signed "Mrs. E. L. Barnes, president, Georgia Federation of Women's Clubs."

Forrester Pledges Full Quarry Probe

All Parties Will Be Heard, Corrections Chief Declares

The Department of Corrections' investigative service will make a "complete and thorough investigation" into reports of brutality at the Buford Rock Quarry Prison, department director Jack Forrester said Wednesday.

He said he personally would investigate the charges "as much as the time will allow."

Meanwhile, House Speaker George L. Smith joined Gov. Vandiver in calling for an investigation.

He termed "serious" a report by Rep. Frank Gross of Toccoa which gave details of interviews with prisoners who said they were beaten and subjected to other cruelties at the state's prison branch for incorrigibles.

Forrester said "All parties who have any authentic information will be given an opportunity to be heard, including wardens, guards, doctors and other personnel."

Gov. Vandiver earlier said he thought the Department of Corrections should look into "both sides" of the report, interviewing the warden and guards as well as inmates.

A Brighter Future?

THE STATE Board of Corrections has plans to correct some of the evils of Georgia's prison system.

Its annual report was accompanied by a letter to the governor from Director Jack Forrester, requesting the establishment of an authority to help relieve overcrowding in existing camps and prisons and as a means of planning for the future.

The board also wants to go ahead with a prison industries program and would like money for an educational program at the Industrial Institute for young offenders at Alto.

These plans for the future are happy signs that the days of official complacency with the status quo are at an end.

Staff Writer John Pennington's series on conditions within the system brought to light many discouraging and some occasionally brutal aspects of this phase of our way of life. Included were the high incidence of repeaters and the sad fact that Georgia has the highest ratio of prisoners to total population of any other state.

There is much the state can do to improve prison conditions, but there also is much that can be done on the local level. Lay leadership and community interest in the problem last Sunday resulted in the dedication of a chapel at the Bulloch County Public Work Camp near Statesboro. Plans also are under way for a recreational program there.

What the good people of Bulloch have done can be done wherever there is a camp. With state officials reviewing their position in respect to the prisons, and with the public sincerely interested, the old days of brutal treatment and the functioning of the system as training ground for further crime may be gone forever.

Another Incident Mars Buford Prison Record

More than 30 convicts at the Rock Quarry Prison, where the more dangerous and incorrigible prisoners are confined, have gashed their arms against steel benches in their cells as a protest against solitary confinement.

This is one of a long list of such incidents at the prison. Slashing of leg tendons has been the drama of protest in the past.

In a second bit of news the wife of one of the inmates charges her husband was placed in a strait jacket and then beaten. She visited him later and saw, she says, stitches in his head and arm.

First, let us say that these convicts are at the Buford Prison because their records in other prisons have been bad. They are screened and typed as the most dangerous and the most resistant to discipline. And there is no illusion about how dangerous and brutalized some of these men are after long years of prison life.

But against that background is the unquestioned fact that much as Georgia's prison methods have improved, they still eave much to be desired. If prison life s one of degredation and brutality then he product becomes an incorrigible and s accurately tagged "dangerous."

We are sure there is need for a special prison for such men. But the Buford prison seems to appear too frequently in the news. Something is wrong with the discipline, the methods and the direction.

The issue seems to be whether the prison at Buford has a policy of strict discipline or one in which brutality is an accessory of that discipline. Georgia, so far as we know, has no training courses for its prison staffs and its guards have had no professional schooling in handling such prisoners. A staff upgrading is at least one of the needs.

ETTERS TO THE E

Pain Too O As Crime D

The Editors: All nations seem to have had supreme confidence in the deterrent power of threatened and inflicted pain. Punishment has been regarded as the shortest road to reformation.

Imprisonment, torture and death constituted a trinity under whose protection society might feel secure.

In addition, nations have relied on confiscation and degradation, on maimings, whippings and exposure to public contempt. . . . The ingenuity of man was exhausted in the construction of instruments that would reach the most sensitive nerve. All this was done in the interest of civilization—for the well-being of states.

Curiously, no matter how severe the punishment, crime increased. It was found that the death penalty made little difference. . . .

Crimes were committed to punish crime. Crimes were committed to prevent crime. The result was that those who inflicted the punishment become s degraded as their victims.

Top Prison System Pledged by Vandiver

Gov. Vandiver promised Tuesday that his plans for developing Georgia's prison system will go far toward putting it on a par with the best in the nation.

At the same time he received a report on alleged brutality to prisoners at the Buford Rock Quarry with an insistence on hearing "both sides" of the story.

The report was delivered by Rep. Frank Gross of Toccoa, chairman of the House Institutions and Properties Committees.

Gross told reporters that the report is based on charges made to him and Rep. Robert E. Coker of Walker when they paid a surprise visit to the prison last week.

Gross originally had announced his report would include recommendations, but he apparently withdrew these in view of the governor's request for a fuller investigation.

Vandiver told his news conference that the charges would be investigated by the Department of Corrections. Any guard guilty of brutality will be fired, he added.

The governor said a new spending program for the prison system would be outlined in his state of the state-budget message Jan. 11.

"I think that the legislative program will go far to bringing the prison program in Georgia up to par with any in the nation," Vandiver asserted.

Although he did not go into details, the program probably will include money to build a new prison. Much of the current troubles have been blamed by prison officials on overcrowding.

The Vandiver program also is expected to follow an Economy and Reorganization Commission recommendation for setting up a prison industries program to teach trades to convicts and keep them occupied.

The report delivered by Gross to the governor outlines numerous instances of alleged beatings at the quarry, some supposedly administered while prisoners were mechanically restrained.

The Rock Quarry, the "last resort" prison for incorrigibles, has been in the headlines many times since its founding 10 years ago.

During the past several months, the institution reportedly has been undergoing the most serious discipline difficulties of its existence. The core of the trouble reportedly comes from prisoners transferred to Buford after staging a "hunger strike" at the Reidsville prison last year.

State Keeps Sweat on School Unit

Gov. Vandiver has reappointed Lonnie Sweat of Blackshear and three other members of the State Board of Education, State School Supt. Claude Purcell said Thursday.

There had been considerable speculation that the governor might pick State Sen. Wallace Jernigan of Homerville to replace Sweat on the board. Sweat's term expires this month. Purcell said the governor had reappointed Sweat to a full seven-year term.

~~One of~~ The most remarkable mother I've known ~~woman I have ever met~~ is Mrs. A. Clarence Henry, who is ~~[illegible] bitterly grieved and~~ considerably driven by the death of her son, ~~[illegible]~~ Carlton Henry at the age of 27 in ~~[illegible]~~ April of 1958. ~~[illegible] Henry,~~ Mrs. Henry has six other hard-working & church-going

children and a number of grandchildren, all doing well, in whom she rejoices; but ~~of course~~ the death of a first-born son is not a matter to be sighed or smiled away, and Mrs. Henry suffers a good deal. But she does not sentimentalize ~~her grief,~~ nor sanctify her grief. ~~[illegible], and~~ If, in the circumstances of her son's death there is grisly horror, she ~~does [illegible]~~ faces it and recounts ~~and expresses it in its fearless accuracy.~~ Mrs. Henry is not given to soothing euphemisms, self-deception or pretense that things are not as they are. And, if in her anger or protest, there are elements of humor, she does not cringe from the honesty ~~and~~ relief of ~~[illegible]~~ laughter.

Mrs. Henry believes her son was beaten to death at the Buford Rock Quarry, or at Reidsville Penitentiary, and she has a ~~formidable~~ formidable mass of circumstantial evidence and perhaps inadmissable testimony from fellow prisoners to substantiate this frightful conviction. The rebuttal of prison officials is that Carlton Henry, a mental case after off-and-on sentences at the Rock Quarry and participation in ~~at least one~~ leg-breakings, injured himself in deranged frenzies, several attempts at suicide ~~by hanging,~~ and finally did hang himself at Reidsville. He was, they say, "an incorrigible," and I daresay ~~Carlton Henry~~ he like many others, was incorrigible to the savage administrators of the Rock Quarry. He was arrested for a young infringement against society at the age of 16 and sent to Reidsville. He had a later sentence to the Boys' Training School. And from there on out you have it, including a sentence to Chillicothe, a federal prison where, as Mrs. Henry's letters and records show, her son Performed ~~distinguished himself~~ as an apt pupil and a "good" prisoner under a more enlightened penal system than ours.

Mrs. Henry thinks her son was early led astray by older criminals, and later picked up on circumstantial evidence~~, as a man with a record, and blamed~~ for crimes ~~(like auto theft)~~ which he didn't commit. If so, he would not be the first one, but ~~Her evidence strongly suggests that she is right, though~~ I am willing to concede that a mother's judgement on her first-born son is liable to be prejudiced in her [redacted] favor.

All of which, of course, is beside the point. Carlton Henry was no murderer, rapist, [redacted] knife-wielder or gun-toter, according to the record. But even if he had been, his treatment in prison is a disgrace to every Georgian. [redacted] Perhaps ~~I rather doubt that~~ he was a real "mental case" who bashed holes in his head against the prison walls and hanged himself on mattress ticking, as prison authorities report. But if he did, why did Warden Hubert Smith, Corrections Director Jack Forrester and his assistant, J. B. Hatchett, all of whom had suffered and rebuffed tearful and furious [redacted] protests from Mr. and Mrs. Henry over their son's condition, permit a mental case to stay in the Rock Quarry?

There are most curious type discrepancies also in the death certificate and other records on the death of ~~of~~ Carlton Henry, which I have seen. [redacted]. And, while undertakers, [redacted] an employed pathologist and the prison administration do not [redacted] testify to the curious condition of [redacted] Carlton Henry's body when it was delivered to the family, several of their friends and neighbors can and do. ~~Mrs.~~ They recall bruises, lesions and "holes in the back of his head you could put your finger in."

~~I do not quote Mrs. Henry on the appearance and condition of her son when she saw him at the Rock Quarry on the Sunday before his death on Monday. She is not a competent witness, being his mother, nor is his father. Besides, Mrs. Henry's stalwart ability to face up and to sustain such horrors, (even if we could, within the law of libel, print it) is not a brave and clear-eyed gift which all of us enjoy, and it would look pretty ghastly in print.~~

"good job" on a defiant, but defenseless man to a guard whose daily chores include beating, cursing, slapping, stringing up and ~~[illegible]~~ half-starving prisoners could, ~~you know,~~ result in fatal injuries. I ~~am informed~~ by a pathologist not inexperienced in these cases that police and prison ~~guards have interesting techniques~~ in beating by which the pain and injuries are ~~so inflicted~~ that they can't be diagnosed as cause of death.

But, back to the remarkable Mrs. Henry, who seems to endure her personal hell by channeling it into a crusade against our prison system. She has knocked on the door of every state office she knows of, ~~of every news channel,~~ of private lawyers and state and local politicians for help in establishing ~~[illegible]~~ what she believes was the murder of her son, but so far in vain, since all her evidence is circumstantial.

The interesting thing about Mrs. Henry, and her husband, is their concern "with those other boys up there and in the work camps."

As Mr. Henry put it, "Even if we can't ever prove Carlton was killed, we can spread around what goes on up there for the sake of these other fellows. . .treating a man like that makes him hate the law and everything else."

~~But what seems so intolerable this Mother's Day of 1960, is that it is possible~~

What seems intolerable to some of o~~thers~~ us mothers in 1960 is that, in a whether or not Carlton Henry hanged himself ~~(and that would be a considerabl feat in his condition after un-denied beatings)~~ it ~~is quite possible~~ cant happen ~~for~~ in ~~an "incorrigible" prisoner to be killed by xxxx beset guards instructed~~ by ~~their warden to "do a good job of it" when they beat a helpless prisoner.~~

~~for~~ in ~~an "incorrigine"~~ in a prison where guards are

~~I hail Mrs. A. Clarence Henry, a brave, honest and possessed~~ mother, ~~who~~

I hail Mrs. A. Clarence Henry, a brave mother who will not let us forget that many sons still endure in Georgia prisons.

So, of course I don't know if Carlton Henry was beaten to death at the Rock Quarry or Reidsville, on April 1958. But I don't know why any boy's body should be sent home to his mother and father with ~~holes~~ deep dent in the back of his head, a blood-clotted lesion on the top of his head, purple bruises on his hands, scars on his face, some of whicn showed up a day or two after his embalming ~~prison authorities~~ at Reidsville, an embalming which took place illegally before the family was notified of his death.

In justice to Mr. Forrester, Mr. Hackett, Mr. Smith and Warden Balkcom of Reidsville, and to satisfy Georgia churchwomen and others aroused over the Henry story, I think perhaps Carlton Henry's body should be exhumed to see whether or not he had a fatal skull fracture, which he could scarcely have inflicted on himself.

But what I ~~started~~ out to say about Mrs. Henry being such a remarkable woman is that what drives her so restlessly in her quest for justice is her concern for "them other boys up there---my God, look what they're doing to them!" ~~Mr. Henry has not followed, but rather indulged and supported Mrs. Henry in her grief-driven appeal to newspapers, TV and radio stations, public officials.~~ Mr. Henry, I think is rather more worldly-wise about position and power, than Mrs. Henry and he says "if we can never prove Carlton was murdered, the thing to do now is ~~help~~ protect them other boys in prison." ~~up there" at the Rock Quarry.~~

And I think the Henrys are quite right, It would serve the interests of justice to find out of Carlton Henry was beaten to death--- and let's remember it's quite possible at the Rock Quarry, where they do, admittedly, beat straight-jacketed and shackled prisoners with pipes and tubes, on instructions from Warden Smith to "do a good job of it." But if that can't be proved, then let's get rid of wardens and administrators who will keep what they call "a mental" case" in a hell hole like the Rock Quarry.

South African Games Draw Huge Crowds

Eighteen months ago, the South African Olympic Games Association began planning the biggest and most colorful gathering of sportsmen ever to take place in Southern Africa. The event—the South African Games—took place in the Wanderers Stadium, Johannesburg, from February 29 through March 14th.

With competition in 35 different sports — ranging from archery to yachting — the Games gave thousands of amateur athletes a chance to compete against the best. Unique events like parachuting and paraplegic athletics drew huge crowds of spectators.

Mr. Frank Braun, chairman of the Olympic Council, characterized the S. A. Games as a great success and said that they could play an important part in maintaining the country's high standards in sports. Money collected at the Games will be used to send South African teams on overseas tours and to assist Springboks to attend world championship meetings.

One of the highlights of the occasion was the convergence on Johannesburg of torch-bearing athletes from all over South Africa and South West Africa. The first runner left Cape Town on February 27th with a torch lighted from the flame of the 1960 Union Festival.

Similar torches originated in all parts of the Republic, with schoolchildren carrying them in relays during the day and athletes from local sports clubs taking over at night. (The torch from Windhoek, South West Africa, had to be flown from there to Kimberley, since nobody volunteered to run it across the Kalahari Desert.)

A tableau of massed flags and athletes climaxed the first South African Games.

The runners rendezvoused outside Johannesburg and on the afternoon of March 7th, marched through the center of the city to Wanderers Stadium, where they lit the Games Flame. State President Charles R. Swart, who was the Chief Patron of the event, was standing ready to declare the Games officially open.

In several sports, notably track events, trampoline and rugby, South Africans competed with athletes from foreign countries, including the United States, West Germany, New Zealand and Rhodesia.

The organizer of the Games, Mr. Gerhard Roux, said their success meant they will probably be repeated every four years. Plans are already underway for the Games to be held in Durban in October, 1968.

The roster of events read like a syllabus for a physical education teachers training college. Inter alia were archery, athletics, baseball, boxing, canoeing, cricket (for men and women), fencing, gliding, judo, marksmanship, parachuting, polo, power boating, rugby, show jumping, tennis, water skiing, and wrestling.

PARAPLEGIC CHAMPS

Wheelchair athletes from all corners of South Africa and Rhodesia took part in the first South African Paraplegic Championships, at the Wanderers Stadium as part of the South African Games on March 9, 10 and 11. Altogether, 65 wheelchair athletes were seen in action, including those who won gold medals for South Africa at the 1963 International Paraplegic Games held in the United States.

A demonstration by young crippled children was also given to show the public how sports give even the youngest person confined to a wheelchair a new interest in life.

WHITE NATION NOT ALIEN TO AFRICA

Multi-National Future for South Africa

The first fact fundamental to understanding of South Africa, or Africa for that matter, is that it is not the exclusive preserve of any one race said Dr. W. C. Naudé, South African Ambassador to the U. S. in a speech to the Alexandria, Va. Rotarians on March 24. Africa may long have been the "Dark continent". But it never was the "Black continent" — whatever the image might be that has grown up, or that has been built up. It has over the millenia of recorded history been the home of Carthaginians, Egyptians, Greeks, Israelites, Hamites, Berbers, Negroids, Europeans, Arabs — and, if one must speak of colors, it has been the home of the blacks, whites and browns: these are Africans, all of them. He whose ancestors came from Europe centuries ago is no less a child of Africa than the black man — or the Arab, said Dr. Naudé.

"It will therefore be appreciated that there is no single African race — just as little as there is an Asian race, or an Australasian race, or an American race.

"In more recent history, it is also a fact that the south of Africa became known to people in Europe as long ago as some five hundred years. It was then, as the Renaissance flowered on the western peninsula of the Eurasian land mass that the explorers of Europe, first the Portuguese and then the others, set sail. In Africa these men and women founded a nation, with cultural origins in Western civilization but today, after three centuries, with indestructible roots in the soil of Africa. The people who make up this nation are not settlers. They are a permanently established society with all the attributes of a modern, advanced nation. This nation is no foreign nation in Africa. It is, in fact, as indigenous a nation as that of most countries. It is no usurper. Its right to a seat in the councils of nations is beyond legitimate dispute. Proof of this was shown on numerous occasions by its sense of responsibility, its maturity, its contributions in war no less than in the cause of peace.

MULTI-NATIONAL

"Just as Africa is a multi-national continent so the microcosm of South Africa is multi-national. Just as the diversity of countries, large or small, in the rest of Africa is recognized and accepted, so logic demands the recognition and acceptance also of the concept of a multi-national South Africa. Some 17 million souls live in South Africa but they are not consciously one nation. True, they live in what is today one overall political entity but there is no all-inclusive sense of common nationhood. There is no common creed or language, tradition or moral code. Rather, there are some half-a-dozen nations, each with its own identity: each entitled to the recognition of that identity.

Dr. Willem C. Naude, Ambassador of the Republic of South Africa in the United States.

"I submit that the yardstick for objective opinion in respect of South Africa should include acceptance of, amongst others, these propositions:

a. that black Africa be not equated with Africa: there is in fact also an Arab Africa as well as an Africa with the closest cultural, economic and social ties with the West;

b. that the Negro in the U. S. be not equated with the Bantu in South Africa:

c. that the black man in South Africa was never made the slave of the white man;

e. that the Bantu does not have a claim, deriving from prior occupation, to all of South Africa;

f. that the image of "colonialism" is wholly irrelevant to the South African situation;

A REVIEW OF CHURCH-STATE CASES AND ISSUES

SEPTEMBER, 1963 — SEPTEMBER, 1964

by George Kellman

This is the third of a series of annual reports on Church — State cases and issues, prepared for the Religious Freedom and Public Affairs Project of the National Conference of Christians and Jews.

The year commencing September 1, 1963 was marked notably by reactions to the Supreme Court's historic decisions of the preceding two years, banning prescribed forms of prayer in public schools, and finally prohibiting public school ceremonial Bible reading and devotional exercises of any kind. Between the extremes of outright defiance and accession, there appeared a confusing variety of purported solutions and substitute practices. Too, this period was highlighted by legislative moves to circumvent the Supreme Court via constitutional amendment, and a plethora of petitions for amendments finally brought on a Congressional hearing at which many divergent views were aired.

Again, the period will be remembered as that during which massive federal aid was voted to aid education and combat poverty, its recipients and beneficiaries including private and church-related institutions and schools.

AFTER SCHEMPP — MURRAY

The Supreme Court's June, 1963 decision in the companion cases of School District of Abington Township vs. Schempp,[1] and Murray vs. Curlett[2] set off an emotion-charged public discussion. This landmark decision struck down ceremonial Bible reading and prayer in public schools, holding these practices to be in violation of the First Amendment's prohibition against the establishment of religion and a trespass upon its guaranty of religious freedom.

Presaged a year earlier by the Court's decision in Engel vs. Vitale[3] barring the use in public schools of a "non-sectarian" prayer composed by the New York State Board of Regents, controversy over the Schempp-Murray decision, though widespread and intense, was attended with far less bitterness. Indeed, a growing spirit of reason on the part of most disputants was evident toward the close of the period of this report.

Rev. Billy Graham expressed "shock" over the barring of prayers and Bible-reading, which, he said, "have been part of American public school life since the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth Rock," while the Rt. Rev. James A. Pike, Episcopal Bishop of California, declared that the decision's result was "not neutrality, but an imposition upon the public school system of a particular perspective, namely, secularism by default." Dr. Henry P. Van Dusen, the then President of Union Theological Seminary, wrote of his regret that the decision barred "the affirmative recognition and collaboration by Government at all levels with all organs of religion in all relationships and circumstances." The Assemblies of God church, by resolution at its 1963 meeting, charged the Supreme Court with moving the country toward becoming "an officially Godless nation." Bishop Fulton J. Sheen characterized the decision as saying, in effect, "Thou shalt not pray." Ad hoc groups, such as the Constitutional Prayer Foundation (chaired by the former Baltimore City Solicitor who represented the Commissioners in the Murray case) charged that "a small minority of atheists is seeking . . . to impose its views on all Americans."

In contrast, support for the decision was evidenced by statements such as that of the Rev. Eugene Carson Blake, who, voicing the opinion of the leadership of major Protestant denominations within the National Council of Churches, hailed the Court's ruling because it underscored "our firm belief that religious instruction is the sacred responsibility of the family and churches." Similarly, The Catholic Universe Bulletin, official publication of the Cleveland Diocese, expressed the sentiments of many Catholic publications when it said that "Nobody has challenged the right of children to pray voluntarily in public school . . .", and that the Court's decisions "boil down to this: . . . that public school administrators and teachers, being agents of government, are forbidden by the Constitution to compose, propose

"BUCCANEER" COMMITMENT

P.M. STRESSES SANCTITY OF CONTRACTS

THE South African Prime Minister, Dr. H. F. Verwoerd, recently warned Mr. Harold Wilson, the British Prime Minister "One cannot be a partner in a defence arrangement when you cannot be assured that any commitment will be fully upheld at all times."

In the previous week Dr. Verwoerd had said that South Africa would break off the Simonstown Agreement if Britain did not honour the contract to deliver "Buccaneer" bomber aircraft to South Africa.

Dr. Verwoerd said in Heidelberg, Transvaal, that he would not, at this stage, reply to the recent statement by Mr. Wilson about the supply of arms to South Africa and the British contract for the supply of "Buccaneer" aircraft because Mr. Wilson's statement was incomplete. He awaited with interest any further statement by the British Prime Minister.

"Mr. Wilson dealt in the course of the week with a ban on arms purchases by South Africa generally" said Dr. Verwoerd. "The implication of that will be properly studied in due course. Mr. Wilson held out for a further statement on his government's attitude towards the sale to South Africa, according to existing contracts and commitments, of Buccaneer aircraft."

"Until that statement of Mr. Wilson's has been amplified it

Slower But Sustained Increase Forecast

THE EXPANSION of the South African economy, which has gone ahead at a record rate during the past two years, is expected to continue during 1965 — although the momentum will tend to slow down.

This is the main prediction of an annual survey of the prospects for the next year, made by the Bureau for Economic Research of the University of Stellenbosch.

The survey forecasts that the net domestic product, which rose by 8.9 per cent in 1962-63, and is estimated to have risen by 10.6 per cent during 1963-64, will rise by a further 7.7 per cent over the year ending June 30, 1965. In value terms it is expected to reach $9,136 million this year. The authors state that "this would represent a very satisfactory achievement. The present upswing is the longest yet experienced in the post-war period."

The survey stresses the role of private manufacturing in sustaining this high rate of expansion. This sector is expected to expand by a further 10 per cent in 1964-65, but replies from manufacturers questioned by the Bureau indicate that capacity and employment bottlenecks will put a definite ceiling on growth.

On the expenditure side, estimates of the level of gross domestic expenditure suggest a slightly sharper tapering off. While expansion achieved in 1964 is estimated at 12.1 per cent, the forecast for 1965 suggests a rise of only 8 per cent. Under this head, personal consumption expenditure, expected to rise by 10 per cent in 1964, will rise by no more than 6.9 per cent in 1965. One important forecast is that the rapid rise in the sales of new motor vehicles will taper off.

Investment in the private sector of the economy is also likely to slow down, mainly because of the physical inability of the private sector to expand at a faster rate, rather than through any lack of incentive. Investment spending in the public sector of the economy will continue at a high rate.

These forecasts have important consequences for the balance of payments situation — the tendency for this to be less favorable as internal expansion accelerates, is likely to be reversed in 1965.

The authors also forecast a moderate improvement in exports, and with gold output forecast slightly higher, the account of the balance of payments is expected to show a deficit of not more than $21 million in 1965 compared with the estimated deficit of $63 million for 1964.

The survey concludes that expansion has been achieved at the cost of only moderate inflation and without any undue strain on the reserves. "A slowing down in the rate of expansion appears to be a welcome and necessary pause to relieve the pressure on scarce labor resources."

R30m. FACTORY TO BUILD JET AIRCRAFT IN S.A.

THE Atlas Aircraft Corporation of South Africa Limited has announced that its factory will be situated near Jan Smuts Aiport, Johannesburg. Apart from housing, a total capital of more than R30-million will be required.

The announcement by Mr. F. S. Uys, Managing Director of the Corporation, states that the factory will be situated next to Jan Smuts Airport in order to use the runways of the airport for the purposes of the factory. The size of the ground is approximately 230 morgen and adjoining properties have already been purchased for housing.

Mr. Uys said that preliminary estimates indicated that a labour force of 1,300 would be exceeded within five years.

In terms of contractual arrangements between the State and the corporation, the corporation will undertake to manufacture jet training aircraft for the South African Air Force.

The corporation will also maintain some of the existing aircraft of the South African Air Force. This maintenance will be carried out on S.A.A.F. premises until the corporation's own

STUDENTS FIGHT FOR CIVIL RIGHTS IN TOUGH SPOTS

Rugged, Ragged 'Snick': What It Is and What It Does Ex-Chicago Schoolteacher Leader in Deepest Dixie

BY M. W. NEWMAN

Staff Writer

ATLANTA — In a seedy office here, you find the command post of an amazing bluejean army that fights Jim Crow behind enemy lines.

Husky James Forman, 34, sticks out his hand and says hello. This onetime Chicago schoolteacher is executive director of what everyone in the seething "rights" movement calls Snick.

Snick is short for SNCC, which in turn is the initials of the Student Nonviolent Co-ordinating Committee.

That long handle offers protective cover for as rugged, and perhaps ragged, a band of individualists as exists in this country.

The boys and girls of Snick risk their lives deep in the South's Hate Belt in sit-ins, freedom rides, voter registration drives and other unsafe forms of citizenship.

Most of them are college students or former students, aged 20 or so. High school youngsters also take part. They have been shot, beaten, jailed, hounded or denounced by guardians of the Southern "way of life." Their skin color generally is brown, but some are white.

THEY generally are surprisingly disciplined, but they have their stagey hotheads. SNCC sympathizers were accused of taking part in the booing of Chicago's Mayor Richard J. Daley at a July 4

Luther King Jr., apostle of nonviolence, and their constitution states firmly:

"Through nonviolence, courage displaces fear; love transforms hate; hope ends despair."

SNICK'S goal, like King's, is to appeal to the white man's conscience — thus setting the stage for equal rights and peaceful co-existence of the races. By any definition, this amounts to virtual revolution, at least in Dixie.

Forman himself has been arrested six times, and this may not even be par for the course. Some Snick workers are in and out of the lockup so often they can't get their laundry done.

To get where they're going, these determined young boys and girls apparently will have to pass through all the jail cells of the racist South.

They will go into towns like McComb, Miss.; Selma, Ala.; Lebanon, Tenn., and Cairo, Ill., to reach the masses of "degraded, disenfranchised and exploited Negroes," as they put it.

SNICK leader James Forman, former Chicago teacher, in Fort Payne (Ala.) Jail.

counties where the U.S. Justice Dept. has brought voting suits, according to SNCC.

"You're just never sure what the police will do," said a white Chicagoan who had worked with SNCC gadflies in Greenwood. "You never really feel safe.

"And when you sit in the Snick office and see cars filled with white men drive by slowly, you're always wondering for things like trying to integrate a "white" waiting room. Once, he recalls, all that the police seemed to have against him was that he was riding in a car.

In Greenwood, he said, police grabbed him because he took a picture of a police dog biting a protest marcher. Forman's wife Mildred took over his duties while he lingered in jail. Despite all the arrests, Forman added, he never has been convicted of anything.

be ashamed of the word 'agitation.'"

Receives Diploma At Roosevelt

In Chicago, Forman was graduated from Engelwood High School and Roosevelt University. He became a specialist in public administration, served in the Army and worked for a while for the Institute for Juvenile Research on Chicago's West Side. His mother, Mrs. Octavia Rufus, lives at 7437 South Park.

In 1960-61, he said, he was a substitute teacher at Kenwood School, 49th St. and Blackstone. The Negro protest movement in the South already was in swing with student lunch-counter sit-ins, voter drives and mass action, influencing Forman.

He heard about sharecroppers in Fayette County, Tenn., near the Mississippi line, who were being evicted in a battle over voting rights.

"I knew that if they could be driven off the land it would be doomsday for Mississippi," he said.

THE young teacher took leave and went to Tennessee to organize help for the farmers, some of whom were living in tents and dodging bullets.

His work there drew so much attention that he was drafted to head SNCC, which had been formed in 1960 as an outgrowth of student "sit-ins."

That was the fall of 1961, and SNCC at the time occupied a hole-in-the-wall cubicle on Atlanta's Auburn Av.

Its present-day offices on

After continuing uproar, SNCC reported, the white community agreed to work out a plan to increase jobs for Negroes and integrate lunch counters and other facilities.

In return, the two crusaders had to agree to leave jail.

Agitation Pays Off

They did. Hansen, in fact, moved on to Pine Bluff, Ark. He met there with students at Arkansas A.M.&N. University, a Negro state school.

Sit-ins began in Pine Bluff Feb. 1 at a chain variety store. Eight days later, an SNCC report says, 15 students were expelled from the college.

Eight of these undaunted young rebels, with Hansen and another SNCC worker, then launched a communitywide attack on segregation in Pine Bluff. They zeroed in on restaurants, theaters, hotels. A wave of arrests got under way.

These young people "live cooperatively in two houses in Pine Bluff," a staff report says. They hope to develop a voter registration program and voters' leagues in surrounding counties.

SNICK'S daring young folk also penetrate into southwest Georgia, heart of the Black Belt and still a very unsafe place for civil rights advocates.

Twelve field secretaries operate out of an Albany (Ga.) GHQ—a cramped cold-water house with a kerosene stove.

Carver Neblett, 19, is a Negro, student from Southern Illinois University in Carbondale. Joyce Barrett, 24, hails

THEY generally are surprisingly disciplined, but they have their stagey hotheads. SNCC sympathizers were accused of taking part in the booing of Chicago's Mayor Richard J. Daley at a July 4 rally of the NAACP.

In the South, Snick workers often are on the receiving end of boos, boots and even bullets.

ONE of them, slender Robert Travis, was punctured by a white night rider's rifle bullet. It didn't stop him and he returned to his voter registration campaign in Greenwood, Miss., bastion of white supremacy.

Another SNCC staffer, Lawrence Guyot, removed his overalls and showed newsmen in Jackson, Miss., savage bruises and clots on his brown skin.

Guyot said deputies in Winona, Miss., beat him while he was protesting against the arrest of five other Negroes. Their crime, he said, was entering a "white" waiting room in a bus terminal.

All this happened while the six were on their way to Jackson for the funeral of Medgar Evers, murdered NAACP official.

The undaunted Guyot, according to Snick, went on to take part in a Negro registration drive that has brought fierce resistance from whites in Greenwood.

He wound up in the county work farm after a courthouse "stand-in" — and led a "sit-down" while in custody.

They Practice Nonviolence

These disciplined young people do not strike back when clubbed by rednecks. The most they may do is

They will go into towns like McComb, Miss.; Selma, Ala.; Lebanon, Tenn., and Cairo, Ill., to reach the masses of "degraded, disenfranchised and exploited Negroes," as they put it.

Some friendly farmer may give them a pad to sleep on and dish of chitterlings. Their "uniform" will be overalls or shirt and blue jeans.

They will go up and down the roads—by foot, by jalopy, by bus—talking, explaining, exhorting, trying to get simple rights for brown-skinned citizens living a "slavey" life and buried deep in poverty and despair.

Sometimes, out of this hard and dangerous work, come sit-ins and protests aimed at integrating lunch counters, hospitals and theaters, or at improving jobs and housing for Negroes.

SNCC's campaign to register Negro voters, to end the reign of error and terror that has kept them from Southern polling places, is acutely important. It could help change the South if successful.

That perhaps is why Mississippi officialdom has fought so hard to keep Negroes from voting. Threats, boycotts, economic pressures, jailings and violence all have been used, according to Negroes.

In Greenwood, Miss., a police dog attacked two registration workers. The city's mayor complained that the voters-registration drive followed "the Communist line of fomenting racial violence."

Police officers have killed three Negroes in Mississippi worked with SNCC gadflies in Greenwood. "You never really feel safe.

"And when you sit in the Snick office and see cars filled with white men drive by slowly, you're always wondering what they're going to do."

Tests Keep Them Out of the Booth

Negroes who manage to overcome all these barriers find still another when they seek to register in Greenwood and many other cities—unusually stiff "qualification" tests aimed at keeping them voteless. About three out of four are turned down by the Greenwood registrar.

"And on top of that," Forman says, "Negroes throughout the South have been brain-washed into thinking that voting is none of their business. Our goal is to change their thinking."

SNCC works in this kind of civil rights battleground—and as the rugged Forman puts it matter-of-factly:

"It's dangerous. We know we're risking our lives."

LIKE most of the young people he directs, he takes violence as it comes.

"There was that time in Selma, Ala., when a mob of 150 white people surrounded some of us in a church," he said.

"We had to get on the phone and call the Justice Department and the FBI in Washington in order to get the local police to take action. After Washington got in touch with them, they dispersed the mob.

"Oh, yes, there also was that time in Monroe, N.C., when a fellow pointed a shotgun at me. Fortunately, it didn't go off."

Forman has been arrested

lice grabbed him because he took a picture of a police dog biting a protest marcher. Forman's wife Mildred took over his duties while he lingered in jail. Despite all the arrests, Forman added, he never has been convicted of anything.

BLOND Sandra (Casey) Hayden of Austin, Tex., confided that she is the only staffer in SNCC's Atlanta office who never has been arrested.

"Texas is such a big place that they just never got around to it," explained this blue-eyed beauty of 25.

Like many SNCC volunteers, she came to the work through religious and ethical beliefs. A number of the staffers are clergymen's sons. Most are Southern born. About 10 per cent are white.

They usually are paid about $35 a week. Most of their peers in the commercial rat race would not even consider that petty cash.

THE cool, poised Forman came out of Chicago's densely packed South Side, where Negroes live jammed together.

He was born in Chicago but spent part of his youth in northern Mississippi. He got his first taste of race prejudice when, as a 6-year-old, he went into a Memphis (Tenn.) soda fountain to buy a soft drink.

"Even at that age, the porter made me go to the back," said Forman with a shake of his head.

"That really shook me up. I guess I learned early that you have to do something about segregation.

"There has to be some form of mass agitation to get freedom. And you don't have to

had been formed in 1960 as an outgrowth of student "sit-ins."

That was the fall of 1961, and SNCC at the time occupied a hole-in-the-wall cubicle on Atlanta's Auburn Av.

Its present-day offices on Raymond St., while roomier, barely qualify as dilapidated.

SNCC now consists of representatives from some of the student protest groups that have helped to spark today's massive Negro revolt. The budget is about $75,000 a year, with much of it coming from Northern students. They flood in as volunteers during summertime, when as many as 40 per cent of the workers may be white.

SNCC quickly won a name as a major Negro freedom group.

Martin Luther King Jr., president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, gave it his blessing and aid. The NAACP Legal Defense Fund took over the job of getting these young people out of jail.

YOU find SNCC workers on hand wherever the Negro mass movement bursts into action—be it Jackson, Miss.; Birmingham, Ala., or Albany, Ga.

What these tough-minded young folk call the "white power structure" (downtown businessmen, bankers, politicians) has become used to the idea of negotiating with them.

"Start your action against things these guys own," is a Snick byword.

In Little Rock, Ark., site of the famous school integration crisis of 1957, sit-ins began in late 1962.

Students from Philander Smith College and Shorter Junior College sat at segregated downtown lunch counters under direction of Bill Hansen, a Snick "veteran." He himself was a student.

A White Citizens Council threatened violence. But the city had suffered a black eye and economic chills since 1957, and some of the prominent people in town indicated readiness to talk.

"At first the city was not willing to yield," according to a SNCC version, "and so renewed sit-ins began in December."

Hansen and a Snick buddy, Worth Long, were arrested. They chose to stay in jail.

Twelve field secretaries operate out of an Albany (Ga.) GHQ—a cramped cold-water house with a kerosene stove.

Carver Neblett, 19, is a Negro, student from Southern Illinois University in Carbondale. Joyce Barrett, 24, hails from Philadelphia and is white. Jack Chatfield, 20, is a white student from Bradford, Vt.

They and others conduct mass meetings in churches or tents, stirring up hope and belief, battling deep fear. They canvass from door to door, seeking to build trust.

They try to work with teenagers, teachers, ministers, and encourage people to register.

A lot of their time is spent in documenting stories of threats and firings suffered by voter applicants.

It's hard going, and slow, but these young SNCC workers apparently have banished thoughts of self and pelf. They can be likened to missionaries in a dark and dangerous land, risking their lives for a cause bigger than themselves.

They're Angry And Honest

Are they angry? Of course. Zealots? Undoubtedly. Political radicals? Some of them may be. Honest? Obviously.

The contrast with beatniks, panty-raiders and beach rioters is painful—or refreshing, depending on how you look at it.

Certainly these young people are revolutionaries, tackling "the monster in the backwoods" or the downtown white businessmen who hire Negroes only as porters and segregate the races in separate toilets.

AMONG themselves, SNCC missionaries almost automatically assume that American society is corrupt and commercial. That's the lever they use to pressure white bosses into concessions:

"Hit him in the pocketbook; Babbittry comes before bigotry."

But, notes a thoughtful Atlanta newspaper columnist, who can deny their assumptions?

"For the goals of their revolution," he writes, "are simply the basic rights guaranteed in the Constitution."

Some day, Forman hopes, SNCC will have done so well that it can put itself out of business. That will be the day.

STUDENTS' ROLE IN RACIAL STRUGGLE

How Nonviolent Warrior Feels On Firing Line In Rural Dixie

Here is the second of two articles by Robert S. Bird of the New York Herald Tribune. His survey of Negroes' views on white America, described as "brilliant" by Walter Lippmann last week, has received widespread attention.

By Robert S. Bird

Special from the New York Herald Tribune

I met Carver Neblett in about the same way you reach in and pull a number out of the hat. I dropped into what is called "Snick" headquarters in Atlanta and buttonholed for an interview the first typical, Negro Snick kid I could find who was fresh off the firing line, so to speak.

Snick is the way they pronounce the initials of the Students Non-Violence Co-ordinating Committee—SNCC.

These are the nonviolent, Negro and white student commandos who are risking their lives in the Negro voter registration drives in rural Georgia and Mississippi with courage not easy to understand.

And these drives to get for Negroes in the Deep South the tool of voting power to improve their lot is becoming this year the most important breakthrough of any in the struggle for Negro rights. SNCC is one of several organizations, including the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), that are active in this turbulent and dangerous field.

'Get Into More Hell, Too'

"But we go into more hell than any of the others," Carver said.

Their headquarters is in a very small building off Hunter Av. in the Negro section out beyond Morehouse College. When you enter the door you find yourself in a cramped little warren of small, connecting offices, all busy with the comings and goings of students strain of white hatred, threats, beatings, arrest, jail and even shootings?

Carver Neblett is 19 and a sophomore at Southern Illinois University, who has been on leave for more than a year. He was born into a sharecropper's family in rural Tennessee. The family moved north six years ago, to Carbondale, Ill., but he was not able to rid himself of the resentments he felt in growing up as a segregated Negro in the South.

When he was in his last year of high school in Pulaski, Ill., in 1960 his brother Charles, now 21, wrote him from Southern Illinois University that he was joining in a SNCC desegregation "action" in Cairo, Ill., and why not come along?

Carver went to Cairo, was arrested promptly, and went on a hunger strike in jail. This was the beginning of his conversion to the nonviolence philosophy of "creative protest," and to what he calls the "Snick way of life."

Deeply Moved By Philosophy

He learned the nonviolent techniques in endless SNCC workshop sessions, and found himself greatly moved by the power of the nonviolence philosophy and by the examples of SNCC leaders who had been through the fire.

Although he had become well embarked on his studies at the university, he decided to quit school temporarily and go South to throw himself into the most perilous "actions" of all.

Telling how the first student workers to enter a new rural area go in with nothing but the clothes on their backs, placing themselves deliberately on the charity of the frightened Negro community, Carver said:

"Usually they don't know who we are, except they think we're dangerous to them. Most of them never heard of SNCC, but

and the lawyer and the field hand and the servant girls are all going to jail together.

Becomes Community Project

"Then it is that we have become part of the community ourselves, and everybody is knit together and the whole Negro group is ready to do anything—anything—to get their goal."

Carver was not able to express very well the quality of the peril which envelops such a Snick-invaded rural Negro community like a chill miasma. But older and more mature Negro workers who help to guide the missionary students on the scene did provide moving accounts.

One was Randolph T. Blackwell, the Negro field director of the voter education project, a law graduate and specialist in government and economic studies, who was in a car with SNCC workers that was shot up outside of Greenwood on Feb. 28.

"I don't know how these kids are able to stand up to the strain and danger," he said. "As for myself it seems like being in combat, where you move through the town expecting anything to happen and looking ahead of you and behind you both at the same time.

"But I have learned that it is helpful if you have in mind an absolutely clear understanding of the nature of your opposition. One of the experts taught me that it's not too difficult to stay in a community if you start with the following assumptions:

"No 1, that there are a lot of white people in the community who will want to kill you and who will try. No 2, that the police are hostile to you and not your friends. No. 3, that the courts are not going to be fair with you. No 4, that a sizable portion of the Negro community will not understand what you're trying to do at first.

"And No. 5, that it will require great persistence and continuation of effort before the

the car began to pull up they could expect bullets.

Very soon that time came. The other car moved forward. Travis, at the driver's window, was in the most exposed position. Moses was in the middle and Blackwell at the right window. The car pulled up beside theirs. The gun appeared. One of the white men opened fire.

Driver Shot In Neck

There were seven shots fired. Blackwell shouted to Travis to pull over to the right and stop. But Travis cried that he had been shot—in the neck, as it turned out. Moses grabbed the controls and pulled their car to a safe stop while the other auto sped away.

The bullets had smashed both side windows in front and the left side window in back. They found succor at a nearby Negro vocational school and Travis was removed to a hospital where the bullet was taken from his in all kinds of dress—boys and girls, white and Negro.

At a desk near the door I saw a white girl wearing scuffy sneakers and owlish spectacles, and an air of supreme calm amid all the hurly-burly. She absorbed the explanation of my mission faster than I could say it.

"Follow me," she said cheerfully, and led the way into the labyrinth of offices to a corner where two Negro youths were chatting. She pointed to one of them and said:

"He's Charles Neblett. He's been working in Greenwood, Miss., but he's leaving today to go on tour with the freedom singers. The other one's his brother, Carver. He's working on voter registration in Terrell County (Georgia) and he's just in from the field. Maybe he's the one you want."

He Interviews Carver

So I ended up the following morning interviewing Carver, trying to pry out of him something he couldn't quite put into words.

It was typical of this action-minded boy that he was one who embarked on the walk from Chattanooga to Mississippi with the band of Negro and white youths commemorating the killing of Baltimore postman William Moore. Moore was shot on a lonely road in Alabama while on a demonstration march on this same journey.

Carver is a tall. rangy lad with a somewhat loungy, offhand manner and a low but quick way of speaking. He has very alert eyes. He was wearing a bright-red sports shirt and black slacks of collegiate-slim styling. and he was feeling mighty good in them.

"Can't wear these things on the job in Terrell County," he said, fingering his red shirt and grinning. "You gotta wear work clothes there."

Whence Comes Courage?

What I was searching for from him and others was, what is the nature of the dedication and strength these students have that enables them to stand up to the prolonged and tend to think that's what we are. They have been told by the whites that if any freedom riders come into the town, stay away from them, they're trouble makers, and it would be very dangerous to talk to them.

"But in any of these rural areas you are going to find a few dynamic Negro persons who will take you in and understand the situation. That's how we get the first toehold. These few members of the community give us food and a place to stay, and they know that we're doing nothing wrong but are working for the betterment of the Negroes.

"So what do we have to lose? The ordinary people at first think we are crazy in a funny way, that we are absolutely fearless, sort of inhumanly brave. We have to get that idea out of their heads fast and make them understand that we are completely human, though not fearful in the way they are."

Only Place To Go—Up

In all these areas, Carver said, the Negro community in general has a pervasive feeling that they cannot go down any lower, that the only place they can go is up. He continued:

"Gradually you start dealing with the Negro people on several different levels. You go to the night clubs. You go to the churches. You go everywhere that people gather and talk. And very slowly they begin to respect you and to look on you as symbols of the respect which they themselves want and should have."

The slowest to respond in many cases are the Negro ministers of the local community. and it is they who have always been "set up on a pedestal," Carver continued.

"In the beginning they shy away from us. I guess they are afraid of their position in the community and afraid that their churches will be bombed. But SNCC knows how to use a a little psychology on them. We get things going, and pretty soon the idea of the freedom is in the air, and we're having mass meetings and people are getting involved, and the doctor nation will wake up to the point where it will call on the administration to live up to its national responsibilities."

Here is how the strain of peril falls on both Negro and white workers in such a danger area. It summarizes the account given by Blackwell.

The Technique Of Terror

On Feb. 28 Blackwell drove in a rented car to the SNCC office in Greenwood, arriving at 1 p.m. He noticed a car with no license plates parked in front of a Negro cafe near the SNCC office which later was burned down. Three white men were in it. Just sitting. They were still in the car, still sitting. at 2 p.m., at 3 p.m., at 4, at 5, at 6.

At 6 p.m. they switched on their lights and stayed there, just sitting. They were still sitting in the car at 7, at 8. at 9. At 9:15 p.m., Blackwell, finally aware that trouble was in the offing, got into his car and prepared to leave.

The car with the white men instantly pulled away and drove around the block, coming in behind Blackwell's car as he was leaving his parking place. It followed him so he drove around the block, returned to the office and warned the eight or nine student workers in the headquarters to close up for the night and be careful in leaving. because he was being followed.

He got back in his car with two other workers, Robert Moses and James Travis.

They drove to a nearby gas station, where they refueled the car and ate sandwiches. The car with the three white men followed them and circled while they ate. Then, with Travis at the wheel, they headed out on the main highway toward Greenville, Miss., with the other car following them.

All three were in the front seat. They knew they would be attacked. The only question was when. For a while there was too much traffic on the highway for the other car to come up beside Blackwell's. Btu they knew that when neck. He recovered. The others were not hit.

Carver Neblett assured me he is prepared to take any risk whatever, fortified as he is by his nonviolence philosophy, though up to now he has not been shot.

"No matter what happens to me, I am going to participate in the movement for as long as possible, even when I go back to school," he said, simply. "I was not always nonviolent"—he laughed at the thought—"but we won't go into that.

Fear Of Jail Vanishes

"I was brought up—all Negroes in the South are—with a fear of jail. But I don't care about jail now. Sometimes I get lonely there, or frustrated, but think of our freedom song, 'Paul and Silas were bound in jail, had no money to go on bail, keep your eyes on the prize, hold on . . .' Or I think of what that poet said, about bars do not a prison make if a fellow's soul is free, and that gives me content. And I pray."

Carver Neblett talks awkwardly about his feelings of spirituality, and I felt it was because he hesitated to commit to words things he feels as deeply as the spirituality of the nonviolence philosophy.

Still he tried to explain it, and this is what he said:

"I don't believe in approaching a person and asking him to accept nonviolence as a way of life. It's something you have to come to yourself. But if you are on the demonstration line, the opposition will start engaging in things that are so unpleasant that you really have to use nonviolence in order to survive.

"You see, we believe we can overcome hate with love, overcome violence with nonviolence. And this is a tremendous force. It amounts to a conversion to a new attitude toward life."

There are many Carver Nebletts working today in the brooding, rural country side of the Deep South, where the Civil War and the days of Negro slavery seem very close.

Albany Police Arrest 25 As Racial Protests Continue

ALBANY, June 22 (AP)—Arrests mounted in this South Georgia city as police coped with renewed desegregation efforts.

About 25 were arrested Friday. Police Chief Laurie Pritchett said they included five white persons.

Those arrested had refused to disperse when ordered to do so, Pritchett said. The police chief said they had lain on the sidewalks and refused to move.

THE ARRESTS brought to about 175 the number of persons taken into custody since desegregation efforts were begun Wednesday. Nearly 1,000 were arrested in demonstrations last summer.

Pritchett said most of the 15 or 20 white persons arrested were leaders in the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC).

A spokesman for SNCC in Atlanta said 20 of the organization's 24 staff representatives in Albany have been arrested on a variety of charges.

A POLICE CAR window was broken in Friday's demonstrations, but there were no other incidents reported and no injuries, Pritchett said.

Mrs. Goldie Jackson, secretary of the Albany Movement, said a mass meeting was called off Friday night because "We want to make it clear that the Albany Movement's meetings are not responsible for this week's violence."

Mrs. Jackson charged that police beat demonstrators with clubs Wednesday night, and that prisoners were beaten in jail cells. Pritchett denied the charges.

LOOK SENIOR EDITOR

We have walked through the shadows of death,
We've had to walk all by ourselves:
But we'll never turn back, no, we'll never turn back
Until we've all been freed and we have equality.

That is part of a song Bertha Gober, a tense, fragile-looking girl of 21, composed not long ago for an organization known as the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee. On paper, the song struck me as awkward, even a little pretentious. But it is a favorite of the student civil-rights movement in the toughest areas of the Deep South. To find out why, I asked Bertha to sing it. She looked around at her friends in the busy SNCC office in Atlanta and said, softly, "No." She is shy, I thought, because I am an outsider, the only white person here.

"Please," I said.

"Close the door," she said.

We sealed ourselves off from the others. Bertha began to sing hesitantly, hunched over, staring at the floor. Then, as if she had found a way to tell a painful secret, she relaxed and forgot me as her own words set to her own melody took over. She stood very straight, tilting her head back so she could sing upwards in a strong, rich voice that warmed and overflowed the little room. When she finished, the office on the other side of the door was still. No talk, no footsteps, no typewriter sounds. There were tears in her eyes, and I understood the power of her song—part lament, part prayer, part battle cry.

A few hours later, I was talking with James Forman, SNCC*'s executive secretary. Bertha Gober's song came up again. "You see why this is a singing movement? The songs help. Without them, it would be ugly," Forman said. "Ugly."*

Negroes in Mississippi are "still scared" to vote, says James Forman, executive secretary of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee. He is tortured by the thought that his people suffer more than they have to, and accuses the Kennedy Administration of not using all its muscle to protect SNCC voter-registration workers.

The main job of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee is to persuade frightened, reluctant Negroes to register and vote. It is concentrating on two bedrock segregationist areas where Negroes account for over 50 percent of the population: southwestern Georgia and the Delta country of Mississippi.

Occasionally, there is well-publicized violence—for instance, the disorders that began in Greenwood, Miss., in March. Until then, there had been just two or three lonely voter-registration workers in Greenwood. When a young Negro passing through town was shot, however, more workers moved in. Fire damaged the office they were using, and a shotgun blasted the windows of an SNCC man's house. Aroused and united, Negroes marched to the courthouse in protest; local police dispersed them, arresting some; the Department of Justice arrived on the scene, and so did dozens of reporters. National attention was suddenly focused on Greenwood.

But in the fight for Negro votes, explosions like this one are the exception rather than the rule. Terrible as it seems, the excitement will eventually pass. For the real story of the voter-registration struggle in the South, we must look behind the headlines to the grim, everyday reality. Why does Bertha Gober sing, We've had to walk all by ourselves?

James Forman knows. Because of what he has seen in the past two years, he is a bitter man. He and some other Negro leaders feel that voter-registration workers pay a needlessly high price, in mental and physical anguish, for the gains they make. One of the ironies of the struggle in the South is that these leaders direct much of their bitterness, not at their enemies the local segregationists, but at their friends in the Federal Government.

Forman knows that diehard whites will use all their muscle to prevent Negro voting. "They have a lot to lose," he says. But he is tortured by the thought that his people suffer even more than they have to, and he accuses the Kennedy Administration—particularly the Department of Justice—of not using all its muscle to protect SNCC voter-registration workers in the South.

Justice Department spokesmen vehemently disagree. The Department's overworked civil-rights staff has filed more than 35 voting suits under the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960, at least a dozen of them in defiant, unyielding Mississippi. During the past month and a half, it has taken legal action on behalf of the Negro demonstrators in Greenwood. But, says Burke Marshall, head of the Civil Rights Division, "I'm not running a police force."

An important suit, requesting an order barring discrimination against qualified Negroes who want to register, is now under way in Sunflower County, Miss. Sunflower is the home county of U. S. Sen. James O. Eastland, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy recently said that, although we still have a long way to go, "1962

continued

"All right, I'll go down to register, but what you going to do for me when they beat my head?"

was a year of great progress in civil rights." It was. But for the Negro on the front lines, the price was high.

One of the costs of that year of progress was a bleeding ulcer that nearly killed Forman this January. He had to send field secretaries into towns where he knew they might be killed. He saw seven SNCC fieldmen in Mississippi goaded by police harassment, lynch threats and beatings until they filed suit against Attorney General Kennedy and FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover in a desperate effort to get physical protection. He had to watch voter-registration workers not only in Mississippi but in Louisiana and southwestern Georgia driven to the edge of nervous breakdowns. He is constantly fighting the ugly suspicion that he and his people are alone, deserted by friends they had counted on.

"It is hard to describe the irony of the situation," Forman told me. "Voting is a constitutional right. We take time out of school, take all sorts of risks and try to register folks. When you get no help, that's pretty demoralizing. Take Mississippi. The Government has filed suits. OK. But people are still scared. They tell us, 'All right, I'll go down to register, but what you going to do for me when I lose my job and they beat my head?' And we can't do anything. The local folks are beginning to doubt that it's worth the risk."

Your name is Samuel Block. You are a Negro, 23 years old, born and raised in Mississippi. For the past year, you have been in the front lines of the voter-registration battle, as an SNCC field secretary.

Before all the help arrived in Greenwood last March, you and one or two others tried to cover all of Leflore County in the Mississippi Delta cotton country. Leflore's population is 65 percent Negro; almost all its voters are white. When you arrived last June in Greenwood, the county seat, you found a place to sleep, cheap as possible. Then you started knocking on doors, introducing yourself and your mission, trying to convince people who have never seen a ballot that it is their passport to freedom.

You found many of your own people afraid to talk to you because a police car followed you to each house, and the police parked in front, writing things down. They jailed you several times. Three white men beat you up, and you escaped being hit by a speeding pickup truck only because you jumped behind a telephone pole. One Thursday night last August, you barely got away from a group of whites armed with bricks, chains, ropes and pistols. You assume they meant to kill you, but you don't know for sure. You never know. You demanded protection from the Justice Department. You're not sure who it was you talked to in Washington, but you remember he said he couldn't move until a Federal statute was clearly violated. A reasonable answer, but it didn't make you feel any safer as night fell in Greenwood.

In the first six months, you managed to register five new voters.

Americans have read so much about lynchings, torture and murders that many of us, I suspect, are no longer troubled by an occasional atrocity. "There goes Mississippi again," we sigh, and move on after a moment's regret. But the possibility of death is only a part of the ordeal for men like Samuel Block. His enemy is ingenious; Block never knows where the next blow will fall. Perhaps someone to whom he talked will lose a job, or go to jail, or be dropped from the welfare rolls.

In cotton country, where almost all Negroes suffer from underemployment every winter, welfare and Government surplus food are important, not just for comfort, but for survival. Last October, the Leflore County Board of Supervisors discontinued a major part of the commodities program for 1963. As a result, more than 22,000 people who lived on surplus food in the winter were cut off. The total included Negroes and whites, but Block's people suffered most. Suspecting that his activities had caused the reprisal, Block suffered too. This spring, the departments of Justice and Agriculture managed to persuade Leflore County to start the program again—but it had been a hard winter there. And if your people are too cold and hungry to worry about a concept like the vote, no matter how important you tell them it is, you can't help wondering. . . .

If you are lynched, says Samuel Block, "you're dead, that's all." Dying takes courage. Living day by day, week in and week out for a year, with no relief in sight, under endless harassment, tests not only your courage, but your sanity.

I have been in many towns in Mississippi. I was in Greenwood before the recent upheaval there, and have been back since it began. The first time, I went to see Block because his troubles were—and are—commonplace by Mississippi standards. It was not easy to locate him. He was, to all appearances, in hiding. He moved constantly: his mail went to a friend, who passed it on to him; he had no telephone. Luckily, I met three young Negroes in Greenville, not far from Greenwood, who knew where Block might be the next day. They offered to guide me to the place.

The four of us drove the 51 miles from Greenville to Greenwood the next morning, with the radio turned up loud to blanket the tension in the car. Three Negro passengers and a white man at the wheel do not feel comfortable driving through the Delta country. The stares and angry mutters of people along the road provoked nudges and nervous laughter among my companions.

Near Greenwood, a sign pointing to "Business District" directs the traveler off U. S. Highway 82. "Go past that," said one of my passengers. The highway separates Negro from white. We turned onto a dirt temporary road and found ourselves on narrow streets among wooden, two-story buildings. My passengers relaxed; they were in familiar territory. Now, I was the outsider.

We met Block on a street corner in the Negro section of Greenwood and headed off for a sandwich, but we didn't get it. The waiter in the café said, "Police told me I'd have big trouble if they ever caught me serving a white man." Block told him, "Well, don't bother serving me either," and we left.

BLOCK WALKS in long strides. His movements are abrupt, and even when he is sitting still long enough to talk, you can feel the tension in him. "We're working hard toward voter registration," Block said, "but it is beginning to seem impossible. We've carried 80 or 90 people up to the courthouse, but only five of them got registered. . . ."

That was not surprising. Mississippi law requires each applicant for registration to read and write and to interpret in writing any section of the state constitution and write an explanation of the duties of a citizen. The state constitution has 285 sections, some of which are, in the words of a Mississippi lawyer, "extremely difficult, long and tedious." The registrar is the sole judge of whether or not an applicant has passed the test. The name of each applicant is listed for two weeks in the local paper, "so they know who you are," says Block.

When I saw him, Block was still doggedly taking people to the courthouse. (Most would not go by themselves.) He refused to admit despair, but his talk was angry. "In the state of Mississippi," he said at one point, "every animal has a season but the Negro; you can shoot him anytime." To understand some of his bitterness, follow Block's early progress in Greenwood in these excerpts from his reports to James Forman:

June 20, 1962: "On my arrival in Greenwood, everything seemed the same as in Parchman, Miss. [site of the state prison farm]. Negroes working hard for nothing, each waiting for the other to do something. . . . In a conversation with Greenwood's big [Negro] businessmen, I was told to sponsor anything I want. Where? None other than the big [Negro] Elks Club. . . ."

June 30: "I have cut my office and room rent very much. Office now $14 a month, living quarters $2.50 a week. . . ."

July 11: "We lost our meeting place at the Elks Club. The members did not approve of our meeting there and singing Freedom songs. They could have turned us off in a better way than they did, waiting until we were fixing to have a meeting, then telling us to have it in our office. . . ."

July 16 [from one of Block's temporary helpers]: "Say, are we supposed to work both day and night like Sam? Man, he doesn't even take time to eat now; I don't know what has gotten into him lately."

July 26: "In all my hard days of [voter] workshop recruiting, I was only able and glad to get six to attend from Greenwood. . . . By the way, I cannot send a budget for this week because I did not have any money to spend anyway. . . ."

August 11: "With things going bad for me in Greenwood, some of the citizens have asked me to protect myself and leave now because the

Miss. Police Cool Negro Voter Crisis

The Virginian-Pilot, Saturday, March 30, 1963 3

GREENWOOD, Miss. (AP)—The tense civil rights crisis cooled a bit here Friday as police kept pedestrians scattered and moving.

Wooden barricades and police squad cars blocked off the street in front of Leflore County courthouse. Uniformed officers were backed by volunteers with riot clubs and wearing yellow Civil Defense helmets.

However, Police Chief Curtis Lary said Negroes trying to register as voters were free to enter the courthouse — so long as they walked in small groups instead of in a demonstration march.

In a City Court hearing, eight Negroes convicted of disorderly conduct drew the maximum penalty: $200 fines and four-month jail terms. Appeal bonds were set at $500 each.

One of them, Lawrence Guyot of Chicago, also was convicted of contempt of court. Punishment on that charge was one day in jail and a $50 fine.

The eight were among 11 arrested in the first registration march Wednesday. Six were tried Thursday. Guyot and James Forman of Atlanta were tried Friday.

Mayor C. E. Sampson, at a news conference, bitterly accused the Justice Department of helping "professional agitators". foment racial trouble in an attempt to win Negro votes.

When a voter registration march formed across town, about a mile from the courthouse, Chief Lary sped to the scene with three patrol cars backing him.

"It's all right for you to go down there," he told about 40 Negroes through a portable bullhorn, "but go in small orderly groups."

One Negro was arrested during the dispersal. He was booked as Donald Harris, 22, of New York City. The charge: disturbing the peace. Officers said he ignored orders to move on.

WHITES, TOO

White people loitering on street corners near the courthouse also were dispersed and told to keep moving.

The three-day-old crisis flared a few hours after nightriders fired blasts of heavy buckshot slugs into the home of a Negro who has two sons active in civil rights work. No one was hit.

It was the third incident involving bursts of gunfire. Each one served to spur on the registration drive started by the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee eight months ago.

Negroes were urged, in church rallies Thursday night, to keep trying to register.

They came in scattered groups to walk past the barricades at the courthouse and stand in line outside the circuit clerk's office, where voter registration is handled.

At one point, about 50 were waiting.

They were admitted one by one to take the qualifying test. One requirement is that they interpret the state constitution. The verdict on the test comes in 30 days.

Mayor Sampson said investigation showed that the recent fire in SNCC headquarters here was deliberately set — but that the arsonists were Negroes.

"From our investigation, it is pretty clear no white people were involved," the mayor said.

Volunteers have received death threats white people are planning to kill me. I replied, 'I am not leaving. . . .'

"Not more than a week ago, two Greenwood city policemen came to our office. I met them at the foot of the stairway and was told they were investigating an automobile theft. [One] voiced his opinion that I was a 'smart nigger from up North and if I didn't say Yes Sir and No Sir to him I would end up on the concrete without any teeth.' Last Friday, I took four Negroes to the county court in Greenwood. . . . I had given them instructions in how to register before we went. We arrived at about 2:30 p.m. and found a female deputy registrar, who acknowledged the presence of Negroes by asking me, 'What's for you, boy?' The four Negro applicants were frightened by the deputy registrar's attitude. . . .

"When I arrived home, I received a call from an individual who identified himself as speaking for the White Citizens Council. He told me, 'If you take anybody else up to register, you'll never leave Greenwood alive.' I get such calls with some frequency. About a week and a half ago, Miss ——, from who I rented a room for some time, told me that she received a similar call.

"Today, I took two Negroes to the registrar's office. The Negroes finished filling out the application form and the literacy and citizenship tests . . . and left the office. Two policemen were waiting just outside the courthouse. They said something to me, but I just ignored them, got into a taxi and took the applicants home. The police followed, stopping in front of the homes of the applicants and sat writing something. . . ."

Ironically, the recent incidents in Greenwood have proved more effective than all Block's persuasion. Since the beginning of March, hundreds of aroused Negroes have tried to register there; few have passed the tests, of course, but at least they tried.

But Block and others like him do not want to depend on violence for results. He pretends to see hope in the Justice Department's suit to open the voter rolls in Senator Eastland's Sunflower County, which borders Leflore County on the west. "Maybe if the Justice Department wins the suit over there, things will ease off here in Leflore," he says. But he doesn't really believe that. The Department, he knows, has had to work county by county in its tedious, expensive effort to break down 150 years of tradition in a defiant state.

As lawyers fight their battles in court, lonely young people will continue to struggle for voter registration in less public places. Block and his companions are outnumbered. SNCC and other groups like it are small, and they do not seem to attract many new recruits. That means there is little prospect of relief for the field secretaries. They have been at their posts for over a year now, and will try to stay there indefinitely, despite the inevitable battle fatigue that makes some weep—and sing—in anguish. For them, the voter-registration movement is an endless, nerve-racking series of guerrilla battles in dark corners of the Black Belt. In many ways, it is like underground warfare in an occupied country. To have to think in such terms of American citizens on their own soil is, as James Forman says, ugly. END

"But, We'll Never Turn Back"

These are the faces of the children and adults of Greenwood, Mississippi during a mass meeting in March, 1963 -- as Negroes braved jail and snarling police dogs to register to vote in the Leflore County Courthouse. These are the faces of Negro citizens who have lived their lives in the Mississippi Delta, where voter registration sometimes means a burning home, shots in the night, police harassment -- even possibly, death.

On the night of February 28, James Travis, a 20-year old field secretary for the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, was shot by white assailants near Greenwood. Travis, a gentle Mississippian and former Freedom Rider, almost died from bullet wounds near his spine.

Travis is one of 30 SNCC field secretaries who work on voter registration in the state of Mississippi. These workers -- most of whom are native Mississippians, and most of whom are in their late 'teens and early twenties -- each day knock on doors all over rural Mississippi urging Negro citizens to register and vote. For this, they have been beaten, shot, jailed, and mobbed, and live each day never knowing whether there will be a next one.

These young people see a new day in Mississippi's future when legislators will be truly representative of the state's citizenry, when there shall be equality before the law, and when all citizens shall have a chance for equal employment and equal education.

But they cannot do it alone. As you have read in this LOOK article, SNCC's financial needs are great, and the work is long, hard, and dangerous. Please send your contributions to:

ASK YOURSELF THIS IMPORTANT QUESTION:

What have I personally done to Maintain Segregation?

If the answer disturbs you, probe deeper and decide what you are willing to do to preserve racial harmony in Selma and Dallas County.

Is it worth four dollars to prevent a "Birmingham" here? That's what it costs to be a member of your Citizens Council, whose efforts are not thwarted by courts which give sit-in demonstrators legal immunity, prevent school boards from expelling students who participate in mob activities and would place federal referees at the board of voter registrars.

Law enforcement can be called only after these things occur, but your Citizens Council prevents them from happening.

Why else did only 350 Negroes attend a so-called mass voter registration meeting that outside agitators worked 60 days to organize in Selma?

Gov. Wallace told a state meeting of the council three weeks ago: "You are doing a wonderful job, but you should speak with the united voice of 100,000 persons. Go back home and get more members."

Gov. Wallace stands in the University doorway next Tuesday facing possible ten years imprisonment for violating a federal injunction.

Is it worth four dollars to you to prevent sit-ins, mob marches and wholesale Negro voter registration efforts in Selma?

If so, prove your dedication by joining and supporting the work of the Dallas County Citizens Council today. Six dollars will make both you and your wife members of an organization which has already given Selma nine years of Racial Harmony since "Black Monday."

The fund appeal for the Dallas County Citizen's Council of Selma, Alabama on the other side of this sheet directly affects the two boys above as it affects you.

the fund appeal appeared in the SELMA TIMES-JOURNAL. Its readers will heed the plea to "prevent sit-ins, mob marches and wholesale Negro voter registration in Selma."

Its readers will prove their dedication "by joining and supporting the work of the Dallas County Citizens Council today."

The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee also has an active program in Dallas County and in neighboring Wilcox County.

Bernard LaFayette, a 22 years old minister and his wife, Colia, have been working out of Selma since January, 1963. They have set up six voter education classes in Dallas and Wilcox Counties, and in April, accompanied the first group of Negroes to ever attempt to register in Wilcox County to the courthouse there. Significantly, no county officials--sheriff, registrar, or judge--were to be found.

When SNCC Executive Secretary James Forman spoke at a Selma mass meeting in May, 500 white men in cars surrounded the church and kept a crowd of 300 Negroes inside until midnight.

Three weeks ago, 19-years-old Bosie Reese, a local youth who has been working with the LaFayettes, was roughed up and arrested by a deputy sheriff when he accompanied some Negroes to the registrar's office.

LaFayette was beaten by two white men in June after he answered their call for help with a stalled car.

Now four other local people have joined the LaFayettes in the vote drive. One is a minister, fired from his job when his employer learned he had been attending voter registration meetings.

Others have also lost their jobs because they want to register and vote.

But LaFayette - and other Alabama Negroes (who in Wilcox County are 0% of the registered voters but 77.9% of the population) - will continue to try to become real American citizens.

But they need your help.

SNCC

RULEVILLE, MISS.

We, the . . . . students who make up the staff of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, and the thousands that make up its base, have staked our lives on the principle that an interracial democracy can be made to work in this country, even in the fields, bayous, and deltas of our deep South.

We have not spared ourselves in attempting to make that faith good. We call on the federal government to do likewise. We would have it understood that we are not calling on the country for what she might do for us, but rather to inform her of what she must be prepared to do for herself.

. . . from SNCC testimony, before the House Judiciary Committee,
May, 1963

HISTORY

The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee was born out of the history-making sit-in movement that erupted across the South in the spring of 1960. At Easter of that year, the first southwide meeting of sit-in leaders was held in Raleigh, North Carolina. Here a temporary committee to promote communication and coordination of activities among protest groups was set up. This Committee met monthly during the summer, opened an office in Atlanta, and at a second conference held in Atlanta, October, 1960, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee was formally organized. One representative from each Southern state and the District of Columbia made up the Coordinating Committee.

Participation in the Freedom Rides in 1961 and a growing sense of the depth of fear that shackled most Negroes of the South convinced SNCC leaders that some one would have to TAKE the freedom movement to the millions of exploited, disfranchised and degraded Negroes of the Black Belt. . . .

SNCC DID JUST THAT.

. . . August, 1961—SNCC launched its first voter-registration project . . . choosing Walthall, Pike and Amite Counties of Mississippi.—This sparked nonviolent direct action by hundreds of high-school students in McComb, Miss., and led to the development of a statewide voter registration program, recently dramatized by the use of snarling police dogs to stop Negroes from registering in Greenwood, Mississippi.

. . . October, 1961—SNCC workers went to Albany, Georgia, and became the catalytic fuse for the massive protests of the Albany Movement.

. . . By November, 1961, some sixteen students had volunteered to take out a year or more from school to work in the hardcore rural areas for subsistence only.

PROGRAM

SNCC's grass-roots approach is designed to . . . . build indigenous, trained leadership . . . on college and high school campuses, and in local communities . . .

 * * In recruiting potential student leaders from college campuses and sending them to work in rural communities, SNCC hopes to bridge the gap between centers of learning and the work-a-day communities.

 * * SNCC workers have organized and guided local protest movements which are never identified as SNCC projects. This is part of its program of developing, building, and strengthening indigenous leadership.

This program has captured the imagination of students all over the country, and today more than 150 SNCC field secretaries are symbols of courage and dedication as they undertake the often tedious and tiring, and always dangerous work, in the most difficult areas of the South. . . .

Mississippi—Southwest Georgia—Central Alabama—Eastern Arkansas—Southern Virginia

These students work for subsistence salaries when funds are available, but at times they have chopped cotton and picked squash to secure food. They live in the community, often in the homes of local residents, for the weeks and months that are required to break through generations of fear and intimidation. The students' courage helps emerging leaders achieve a new self image and the strength to act. Sustained personal contact, discussion and persuasion and his determination to stay with them and their problems, give the local people confidence in the SNCC worker and the program he advocates. The people then begin to gain enough confidence in themselves to seek and assert their rights.

In the community SNCC workers organize for voter registration and direct action. SNCC voter registration efforts give disenfranchised Negroes the right to vote in areas where they have been denied this right since Reconstruction. And, fully as important, the program deepens an awareness of the meaning of first class citizenship, develops a community of action, and creates mutual trust and support among people who too often have been suspicious and divided by fear.

As of summer, 1963, SNCC had initiated and participated in . . . . direct action campaigns in 49 cities in 13 states. . . .

THE FUTURE...

The future means redoubled efforts to continue . . .

—introducing educated and determined young workers into hard core areas;

—maintaining a college contact that leads to militant action in cities and provides new recruits for full time work.

The future means . . .

—expanding our pilot voter registration projects in cities to provide workers in surrounding counties.

—finding more funds to support students willing to work at subsistence wages and share the life of the Southern rural Negro while trying to convince him of his rights.

—providing more and better workshops and conferences on the meaning and techniques of nonviolent community action and political involvement.

Change will be slow, but change must take place. SNCC will need three times our current staff to do the job we have only begun. We will also need three times our current budget.

The future means your support . . .

—in contributions and in stimulating your local community to break down every form of racial discrimination now.

—in letting us know how we can help you and how you can help us.

WE BELIEVE AND WE ASK YOU TO BELIEVE WITH US: WE SHALL OVERCOME!

Young, D-Ohio, denounced Mrs. Nhu as "viciously anti-American" and urged that her visitor's visa be cancelled. He called her a woman with "a serpent's tongue."

Rep. Silvio O. Conte, R-Mass., suggested in the House that U. S. aid to South Vietnam may be paying for "expensive bangles and wild shopping binges in Rome, Paris and elsewhere" by Mrs. Nhu.

Conte called Mrs. Nhu "one of the potentially dangerous figures in the world today."

The editors and broadcasters attending the State department session were told that the CIA in South Vietnam is not doing anything that is not known about and approved by the State Department.

There were again official denials of a "split" among the State, Defense, and CIA agencies on policy objectives, but it was conceded that in a "frustrating, mean and dirty affair" a variance of opinion is likely to be heard.

Mme. Nhu, flew into New York last night on her three-week American speaking tour.

She said at the airport:

"I do not intend to lobby any official persons during my trip."

Embargo Imposed

The Michigan State Department of Agriculture imposed an embargo of the Dornbos plant's inventory pending an investigation of the [illegible] deaths.

Dornbos said it had closed down its operations prior to the state embargo "until we can find out what is happening."

The Food and Drug Administration identified the Dornbos product as packaged in vacuum-sealed plastic bags bearing red and yellow labels.

The package has the words "Ready to eat—Keep under refrigeration. Dornbos smoked whitefish (or whitefish chubs). Dornbos fisheries. Since 1880 Grand Haven, Michigan."

In Philadelphia, a spokesman for Food Fair Stores, Inc., said all its [illegible] fish products are processed locally and distributed locally.

was involved in behalf of the Serv-U.

Vend magazine, in a copyrighted article last month, said that Serv-U had grown from an almost unknown corporation in March, 1962, to a major vending machine firm.

It listed five major contracts which Serv-U had obtained with California Aerospace Industries in that period, including two at North American Aviation plants. In each case, the article said, Serv-U supplanted vending machine firms which had been in business 20 years or more.

FACT SHEET ON THE RAID AND ARRESTS

Conducted by State and City Police at SCEF New Orleans Headquarters at the Behest of the Louisiana Committee on Un-American Activities October 4, 1963

THE CHARGES: Violation of Louisiana Revised Statute Title 14, Section 358 et seq. "The Subversive Activities and Communist Control Law" and Section 390 et seq. "The Communist Propaganda Control Act" by "organizing between themselves and with other unknown people and their doing certain acts to carry out said agreement, to violate the aforesaid statutes by knowingly and willfully participating in the management of a subversive organization, and secreting books, records and files of a subversive organization, said subversive organization herein referred to being specifically the Southern Conference Educational Fund Inc., and also distributing and storing Communist political propaganda in the State of Louisiana."

THOSE ARRESTED: Dr. James A. Dombrowski, executive director of the SCEF. Benjamin E. Smith, SCEF treasurer, labor and civil rights attorney and counsel for the ACLU in Louisiana, and former assistant district attorney in New Orleans. Bruce C. Waltzer, Smith's law partner, who has no connection with the SCEF.

THE RAID: Conducted by about 100 policemen and jail trusties in five simultaneous strikes at the offices and the homes of the three arrested men. Streets outside were cordoned off during the three-hour ransacking, in which personal and official property was indiscriminately seized.

The Louisiana Joint Legislative Committee on Un-American Activities proclaimed it had inspired this action.

The committee's legal counsel told the press the raid hadn't been "coordinated" with the FBI because, while the committee had complete confidence in J. Edgar Hoover, "we have no confidence whatsoever" in U. S. Attorney-General Robert F. Kennedy.

"We know that if we told the FBI about this raid they would have to tell Bobby Kennedy. We cannot trust him and we expect him to tell his friend, Martin Luther King."

Although the committee boasted that the raid had been planned for eleven months, the raiders first came to the wrong office in the building and broke down the door of an empty room with sledgehammers.

At the Dombrowski home, policemen repeatedly threatened to shoot the family dachshund, although the dog was on a leash.

THE REACTION: The Rabbinical Council of New Orleans declared, "We denounce the subversive practices [illegible] theirs."

The rabbis also endorsed the statement of the Louisiana branch of the ACLU, which called the raid "a dangerous act of political repression committed by our state government" and said the law under which the charges were filed "is an unconstitutional device designed to inhibit the flow of free ideas and free speech."

At the time of this writing, other groups in New Orleans—religious, labor and legal—were reported preparing similar denunciations.

In Atlanta, the Reverend Martin Luther King said, "Such smear tactics against efforts to bring about true brotherhood of man in the South have shown signs of increasing in intensity during recent months. This Friday action followed shortly after a peaceful demonstration last Tuesday in New Orleans by some 10,000 Negroes and approximately 300 whites seeking freedom, and followed . . . charges brought by Ross Barnett and George Wallace before a congressional committee in recent weeks that the search for freedom in this country was communist-inspired."

The Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee wired Attorney-General Kennedy, asserting that "state sedition laws under which these persons were arrested, were outlawed by the U. S. Supreme Court seven years ago."

"This is another demonstration of [illegible]

WHAT CAN BE DONE: WE SUGGEST:

- Wire or write the U. S. Attorney General and the U. S. Commission on Civil Rights in Washington, D. C., asking them to intervene in this unconstitutional outrage. Protests to Louisiana Governor Jimmie Davis and New Orleans Mayor Victor Schiro would also be helpful.
- Spread the word of the raid to [illegible] organizations, to individuals. A letter to the editor of your local paper can do much to foster nationwide interest.
- Advise us of what action you have taken.

PLEASE, if possible, send a special contribution to help us with the expenses of [illegible] and [illegible] with the [illegible] legal [illegible] that lie ahead.

October 25, 1963

NEW ORLEANS, La. -- Judge Bernard J. Cocke of the Louisiana Criminal District Court Division, at a preliminary hearing today, discharged and dismissed the case against James A. Dombrowski, executive director of the Southern Conference Educational Fund, Inc. (S.C.E.F.), Benjamin E. Smith, treasurer of S.C.E. F., and New Orleans attorney, and Bruce C. Waltzer, Smith's law partner.

Judge Cocke ruled that there was no factual basis for the State's charge that the men had conspired to violate the State's Subversive Activities and Control Law or its Communist Propaganda Control Act by managing S.C.E. F.

S.C.E.F. is an organization dedicated to furthering integration. Smith and Waltzer are active civil rights lawyers.

The Reverend Fred L. Shuttlesworth, president of S.C.E.F. and leader of the Birmingham integration movement, said: "The dismissal of the charges against Smith, Waltzer and Dombrowski, is a signal victory for the forces of civil rights and civil liberties in their efforts to bring about justice, freedom and fair play."

The three men had been arrested on October 4th by the Louisiana State Police and New Orleans police at the behest of the Louisiana Joint Legislative Committee on Un-American Activities; and their offices and homes were searched. Records and personal possessions were confiscated.

Arrest and search warrants had been signed by Major Russell Willie of the Louisiana State Police. Defense attornies brought out in court today that Major Willie had acted upon alleged information from a "confidential informer" whose identity Willie refused to divulge.

In a strongly worded statement, Judge Cocke ruled that the State had failed to produce a single fact to justify its actions. The three men were cleared of all charges in less than 90 minutes.

Testimony at the hearing by James A. Pfister, chairman of the Louisiana Joint Legislative Committee, revealed that the records and personal effects seized on October 4th were subpoenaed on October 5th by Senator James O. Eastland's U.S. Senate Internal Security Subcommittee.

"The fact that a State District judge dismissed the charges," said Reverend Shuttlesworth, "solidifies our hopes that justice has the same meaning in the deep South as it has in the rest of the nation. This is a definite setback to the three-state plot to destroy the integration movement master-minded by Senator James O. Eastland, Governor Barnett and Governor Wallace."

NEGROES ARE DRAGGED OFF FEDERAL PROPERTY AS THE FBI LOOKS ON Registration in Alabama

Selma

There are 30,000 Negroes and less than 25,000 whites in Dallas County, Alabama. On the voting rolls, however, there are about 130 Negroes and 7,000 whites. On the first and third Mondays of every month, the Board of Registrars of Dallas County takes additional applications from would-be voters. The form, however, is a long one, and the applicant is also questioned orally. As a result, the Board has never been able to enroll more than 30 new voters in a day.

At this rate even making the incredible assumption that the Board accepted every Negro applicant, it would take the Board 10 years to enroll as many Negroes as whites. Nevertheless, the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) began a voter-registration campaign in Dallas County last summer. It proclaimed October 7 as "Freedom Day." At 9:30 a.m. on Freedom Day there were 50 Negroes in line before the county courthouse, in the cotton town of Selma.

By 11:00 a.m. there were 250 Negroes in the line, which extended the full length of the block, around the corner, and halfway down the street. Two hundred of them would never get inside the courthouse door.

Standing over these men and women, were helmeted men with clubs and guns, members of Sheriff Clark's posse. By noon, the line of Negroes reached 300. The sun was hot, and the line did not seem to be moving.

Directly across the street from the county courthouse in Selma is the Federal Building. Here are the federal court, the draft board, the social security office – all the visible manifestations that the Civil War was won by the Union and that the national government is supreme all over the United States. In this building, on the first floor, its windows looking directly at the county courthouse, is the office of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the police force of the national government, created to enforce the laws of the United States.

Four FBI agents and two Justice Department lawyers spent Freedom Day in this building. The FBI agents were taking pictures, and watching. The Justice Department men were just watching.

Through all that happened on that Monday, while federal law was broken again and again, these law enforcement officials of the federal government stood by and watched. By the time Freedom Day was over in Selma, the Constitution had been violated in a number of its provisions, several statutes of the US Congress had been ignored, the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960 had been turned face down on the sidewalk. For all the good the federal officials did, George Wallace might have been President of the United States.

What happened in Selma on Freedom Day?

A Negro registrant, before he got to the door of the county courthouse, had to run a gauntlet of armed troopers and a local cameraman whose pictures could cost the Negro his or her job.

The registrants waited from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m., standing in the sun without food or water, without being able to go to the toilet. State troopers told them they could not leave the line and return. (When I asked a Justice Department lawyer standing by if he would go over to the state troopers and say that these Negroes had a right to get a drink of water, he said: "I think they do have that right. But I won't do it.")

There were two "incidents."

1. At 11:55 a.m. I looked away from the line of registrants, across the street to the Federal Building. On the steps of the building – so still that for a weird second I thought they were statues – stood two young members of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, facing the county courthouse across the street and holding signs. One, in overalls and a fedora, carried a sign saying "Register Now for Freedom Now." The other, in a polo shirt and slacks, carried a sign which read, "Register to Vote."

I crossed the street to get a better look. At that moment – it was a few moments before noon – Sheriff Jim Clark and two members of his posse also crossed the street, walked up the steps of the Federal Building, snatched the signs, and pulled the two young fellows down the stairs and into a police car. I have seen a number of examples of the invisibility of federal power in the South, but I didn't quite believe this. I turned to the Justice Department man and asked, "Is that a federal building?" "Yes," he replied.

2. Lunchtime passed, but no lunch for the more than 300 Negroes on the registration line. The sun was hotter now. Jim Forman, in charge of the day's operations, sent some people for sandwiches and water. By now, Al Lingo's blue-helmeted state police – commanded by Major Joe Smelley – had taken over from the posse, but

Sheriff Clark and his men were still around. Jim Forman and Mrs. Boynton (a local Negro leader) walked over to talk to Sheriff Clark (it was 1:55 p.m.). Forman said: "Sheriff, we'd like to give these people some food." Clark replied: "They will not be molested in any way." Forman said: "We don't want to molest them. We want to give them food and to talk to them about registration." Clark shouted: "If you do, you'll be arrested. They will not be molested in any way and that includes talking to them."

Forman and Mrs. Boynton went back across the street to the alley alongside the Federal Building, where a shopping cart with a keg of water and sandwiches were set up. Newsmen were called over. Mrs. Boynton said: "We want to see if to Mr. Clark 'molesting' means giving people food." Forman told the newsmen: "We wired the Justice Department last night for marshals; we figured Clark might be violating federal law today. But we've had no reply."

Two SNCC members, Chico Neblett, a tall, good-looking former student at Southern Illinois University, and Avery Williams, dark, quiet, stepped forward and filled their arms with sandwiches and registration material. It was an unreal scene: food was going to be delivered to people standing in line in front of a public building, and it was as if paratroopers were preparing to drop into enemy country in wartime.

"Let's go, man," Neblett said. He and Williams crossed the street. We – newsmen, photographers, a few others – followed. The state troopers converged on the two young men as they approached the line. Major Smelley yelled: "Get 'em!" Suddenly the two were on the ground. I saw Chico Neblett stretched out, troopers over him. I saw them jab at him with their clubs and saw him writhe under what looked like shock induced by the electric cattle prods the troopers carried. Four of them picked him up and dragged him away, and then I saw them throw him and young Williams into the green arrest truck at the corner. In the meantime state troopers and posse men were pushing and shoving all of us standing nearby, cursing, threatening, ripping one photographer's clothes. We retreated across the street. The Justice Department men hurried in and out of the Federal Building. The FBI watched.

I walked down to the corner a few minutes later, to see if the line that had extended all the way around it and halfway down the block was diminished by the tension. Some 30 more Negroes had joined the line. I went back to the steps of the Federal Building and waited for Freedom Day to be over. At 4:30 p.m. it was, and the several hundred men and women in line drifted away. A young Negro lawyer, visiting from Detroit, who had observed the day's events, said with emotion in his voice, pointing to the people walking quietly from the line: "Those people are heroes. They should be given medals."

Then what should be given the President and the Attorney General of the US?

THE NEW REPUBLIC OCTOBER 26, 1963

This article points out some of the problems that have been faced by workers for the STUDENT NONVIOLENT COORDINATING COMMITTEE in many parts of the resistant South. Selma, Alabama is not an isolated example.

The STUDENT NONVIOLENT COORDINATING COMMITTEE has similar voter registration projects in Southwest Georgia, Southeastern Arkansas, and the five Congressional Districts of Mississippi.

SNCC workers are paid subsistence wages of $9.64 a week. Your help is needed if the future is to mean that democracy can work in the most difficult hard core areas of the South.

Dear Julian & Mary:

Because you all both were so wonderful about moving quickly in support of SCEF at the time of the raids and arrest, I want to be sure you know the latest developments. I don't know what your Atlanta paper is covering. (You should be getting a news release soon if you [illegible] release yet

The judge in New Orleans dismissed the charges yesterday against all three of them. He said there was not any evidence.

Meantime, however, the Louisiana state legislative committee has turned all our records, contributor lists, etc. over to Senator Eastland and his Senate Internal Security Subcommittee. He subpoenaed them, the state people said, but I'm sure they were happy to copperate.

This is probably what they wanted all along and I suspect Eastland was in on the deal from the beginning. He tried to get our lists some years back and Jim Dombrowski told him to go to hell (at a hearing in New Orleans), so now he's done it this other way---so here we go again on another round of harassment and of more people, I suppose.

However, I do think it is somewhat encouraging that the judge in New Orleans was able to do what he did. Jim says he is just a damn fair judge, but even a good and fair judge often can't be just when the community hysteria is at high pitch. I think the~~y~~ most important thing is that they were not able to mount any real hysteria this trip. Having lived through several rounds of hysteria in my life, I believe this indicates some real changes in the atmosphere and we may be in much better shape to move ahead successfully on building a better society than we have thought.

Best regards,

WASHINGTON, D. C. -- A preliminary injunction restraining Senator James O. Eastland, Louisiana police and all others from using in any way the records of the Southern Conference Educational Fund, was requested today by Dr. James A. Dombrowski, executive director of the Fund. In the complaint, filed in U. S. District Court for the District of Columbia, a half million dollars in damages was asked by Dr. Dombrowski and by the S. C. E. F. Inc. for false arrests and illegal seizure of records and property.

Other defendants named in the suit are Colonel Thomas D. Burbank, state police superintendent; State Police Major Russell R. Willie; State Representative James H. Pfister, chairman of the Louisiana Joint Legislative Committee on Un-American activities; the city of New Orleans; and the Allstate Insurance Co., the city's liability insurer.

Dr. Dombrowski was arrested in New Orleans, La., October 4th on charges of violating the state Subversive Activities and Communist Control Law, as manager of S. C. E. F., an organization dedicated to furthering racial integration; and the Fund's records were seized at the behest of the Louisiana Joint Legislative Committee. On the following day, these records were subpenaed by U. S. Senator James O. Eastland's Internal Security Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee. Although the conspiracy charges against Dombrowski, and against New Orleans attorneys Benjamin E. Smith and Bruce C. Waltzer who were also arrested October 4th, were dismissed by State Judge Bernard J. Cocke on October 25th, the S. C. E. F. records were not returned.

On Saturday, October 26th, Dombrowski, Smith and Waltzer requested a temporary restraining order and a permanent injunction to prevent the removal of the records from State Police Headquarters. Federal Judge Robert A. Ainsworth, after ascertaining by phone that the materials were still in Baton Rouge, scheduled a hearing for Sunday, October 27th, which he then postponed until Monday morning. At the hearing, which eventually took place Monday noon, Ainsworth announced that the question of a temporary restraining order was moot, since the S. C. E. F. records had been transferred to Woodsville, Miss. earlier that morning at the request of Senator Eastland. Since Monday, at least part of these records have been sent on to Washington, D. C.

NEW ORLEANS, La.--State and city police raided offices of the Southern Conference Educational Fund (SCEF) and arrested two of its top officers on Oct. 4. All records of the organization were seized.

Civil-rights leaders across the nation immediately protested this action against SCEF, which is a Southwide group working to end segregation and discrimination. The protests were led by the Rev. Fred L. Shuttlesworth, SCEF president and leader of the movement in Birmingham, Ala., and by the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), Atlanta, Ga.

Those arrested were Dr. James A. Dombrowski, SCEF executive director; Benjamin E. Smith, treasurer of the group, and Bruce Waltzer, Smith's law partner. They were later paroled by State Judge J. Bernard Cox pending filing of formal charges.

Homes of all three men were ransacked and boxes full of personal papers and books were seized. Smith and Waltzer's law offices were also stripped of files having anything to do with SCEF business.

Dombrowski, Smith, and Waltzer were charged with "operating a Communist conspiracy" in violation of a state sedition law. A spokesman for the Louisiana Joint Legislative Committee on Un-American Activities said the raids and arrests followed a year-long investigation of SCEF by the committee.

The Rev. Mr. Shuttlesworth said: "We recognize this as part of a three-state conspiracy in Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, our three most backward states, to frustrate the drive for freedom by civil-rights organizations. We expect more of these attacks on all civil-rights groups and all persons working for full freedom.

"Evidence of the three-state conspiracy includes the testimony of Governor Wallace of Alabama and Governor Barnett of Mississippi before Congress this summer, in which they sought to label all civil-rights organizations as subversive and vilified their leaders.

"More recent evidence is the fact that an Alabama legislative committee on subversion has invited Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and myself to appear before it.

"The tendency has been and still is to label anybody communistic and subversive who seeks in a righteous way to uphold the principles embodied in the Constitution of the United States. It should be made clear that, to a segregationist, integration means nothing else but communism or subversion.

"Certain persons operating under the guise of super-Americanism will stop at nothing and will do anything to bolster the crumbling walls of segregation. But civil-rights forces are not about to be stopped in their march toward freedom. The segregationists are riding the last coach on the last train on the last track to nowhere and are getting there slowly."

In Atlanta, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee wired President Kennedy, Attorney General Robert Kennedy, and the U. S. Commission on Civil Rights, Washington. SNCC declared that the action against SCEF "can only be termed an act of despotism."

"State sedition laws under which these person were arrested were outlawed by the U.S. Supreme Court seven years ago," SNCC noted. "This is another demonstration of the lawlessness and defiance of authority by the segregationists."

ATLANTA, Ga.---Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. denounced the police raid on headquarters of the Southern Conference Educational Fund, New Orleans, and asked U.S. Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy to intervene.

He sent a telegram urging Kennedy "most urgently to take action to stop this additional harassment and intimidation of civil-rights organizations and their supporters."

In a statement to the news media concerning the raid and the arrest of SCEF officers, Dr. King described SCEF as"a courageous civil-rights organization." Dr. King, who is president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), said in part:

"...This appears to be another phase in a continuing effort by hard-core racists to place responsibility for integration in the South on Communist influence...Such smear tactics against efforts to bring about true brotherhood of man in the South have shown signs of increasing intensity during recent months.

"This breach of federal law, which was clearly established by the U.S. Supreme Court in April, 1956, calls for immediate action by federal authorities. Such tactics of harassment will not deter the march for freedom in the South and the nation, but will serve to point up most vividly the acute need for federal laws to protect all freedom-loving citizens."

Dr. King's reference to the Supreme Court decision of 1956 concerned the ruling by which the court declared state laws against sedition and subversion to be null and void.

The high court held that such matters were the responsibility of the Federal Government, and that laws of this kind could be misused by the states. Persons charged with sedition in Kentucky and Massachusetts were freed as a result of this decision, which arose out of a case in Pennsylvania.

SCEF RAIDED   October 4, 1963   Info: from Carl Braden, Ben Smith

JAMES DOMBOWSKI (exec. Dir. SCEF), Attorney Ben Smith (ACLU Staff Counsel in La., former assistant District Attorney for New Orleans) and his partner, Attorney Bruce Waltzer -- arrested October 4.

State & local
13 ~~City~~ Police raided the SCEF office, seized records, arrested Dombrowski. About 3:00 P.M.
Simultaneously, the office of Smith and Waltzer was raided, and at the same time, the homes of the three men were raided.

Charges: "Operating a Communist conspriacy in violation of state laws; maintaining a Communist ~~[illegible]~~ orggnization; and maintaining Communist propaganda on the premises."

Carried out by state police with cooperation of city police - raids at 5 locations carried out simultaneously.

They were paroled on some kind of a "personal parole"-about 7 hours later In Louisiana, under Napoleonic Code, a state judge can parole persons pending a formal charge. Judge J. Bernard ~~[illegible]~~ did so.
COCKE

Charges are based on same section of La. law as the "criminal anarchy" charges of Bob and Chuck - violation of state sedtion laws. Theoretically, state sedition laws were thrown out by the Supreme Court in Pennsylvania v. Nelson, April 1956. Other precedents for nagation of state sedition laws: Braden v. Kentucky, Massachusetts v. Gilbert. Going to test it on grounds of being violation of Supreme Court decision (according to Ben Smith.)

For 3 - 4 months, the White Citizens Council has been picketing off and on with signs reading "Communist Headquarters of the South," at New Orleans SCEF office.

Carl traces this to the TODAY program last Friday, Sept. 27, where Gov. Wallace held up pictures of Carl & Anne, Dombrowski, Miles Horton, and Len Holt saying that they were causers of 4 Birmingham deaths. This is aided by Fred Shuttlesworth being President of SCEF.

State Rep. James Pfister said on radio last night there, that SCEF had been under investigation for 11 months by the state legislative Committee on UnAmerican Activities.

All records confiscated from Dombrowski's office; boxes of papers removed from his home after about 4 hours ransacking; peace literature and mailing list taken from Waltzer, Smith not sure what taken from him.
Carl says it took him three years to get his stuff back from the Louisville confiscation.

Quote: (Carl) "This is just another effort to discredit, destroy and disrupt an organization working for human rights and integration."

Negro Testifies Later Arrested

WINONA, MISSISSIPPI -- A young Negro who told a federal jury last week that policemen "paid" him a pint and a half of corn whiskey to beat two civil rights workers was arrested in nearby Kilmachael for an offense supposedly committed while he was behind bars.

23-year-old Roosevelt Knox was one of two Negroes who were prisoners in the Winona jail when five Negro civil rights workers were beaten by police. Knox and another prisoner testified they had been ordered to assist in two beatings.

Knox's parents told SNCC workers in Greenwood the youth was charged with passing a bad check during the period he was held in the Winona jail.

His trial on the bad check charge, scheduled for December 10, was not held when charges against him were dropped.

3000 MARCH IN ATLANTA

Marchers Brave Cold In Atlanta Demonstration

ATLANTA, GA., Dec. 15 --More than 3,000 Atlantans, Negro and white, braved below freezing weather today to hear speakers from a variety of groups declare that some action must be taken soon to implement an integration plan presented by this city's Summit Leadership Conference.

Each speaker echoed the same theme: Atlanta, once a showcase city for the South and a model of "smooth" race relations, is lagging behind other Southern cities and even other Georgia cities.

While some encouraged a continuation of negotiations carried on by the Summit group, others called for direct action if Negro demands are not met soon.

James Forman, Executive Secretary of SNCC, told the crowd that overflowed Atlanta's Hurt Park here: "No one leader, no group of leaders can get your rights. You have to get them for yourselves."

Forman said, "We have two powerful weapons, the dollar and the vote."

The SNCC leader reminded the crowd of the up-coming presidential race in 1964. He called for consideration of an Easter Boycott here, and for a possible school boycott aimed at eliminating segregation and triple sessions in Negro schools. He called for a program to ease slum conditions in Negro neighborhoods, telling Atlanta Vice-Mayor Sam Massell, representing the city on the speakers' platform, "people are swimming in Buttermilk Bottom" (a slum section of the city.)

Martin Luther King, Jr., featured speaker at the junior March on Washington demonstration, told the audience "time is run-

DEMONSTRATIONS BEGIN

FIVE ARRESTED IN DANVILLE

Danville Demonstration-Summer, 1963

DANVILLE, VA., Dec. 15 -- Anti-segregation protests resumed in this Southside Virginia city as five students were arrested at a Howard Johnson's restaurant December 10.

Sit-ins at Howard Johnson's, other restaurants and movie theaters are being conducted by students, most of them from Danville, as part of a drive to open the public facilities of this city.

A 22-year-old white SNCC worker from Chapel Hill, N.C., J.V. Henry, reported that hot ammonia had been thrown on the floor of one restaurant where a sit-in took place -- Staley's Restaurant -- "to get rid of us."

Henry stated that Danville students and SNCC workers were

MISS. RIGHTS GROUPS MEET

JACKSON , MISS., Dec. 15 -- Close to 300 representatives of civil rights groups and civic organizations met here today at a state-wide meeting of the Council of Federated Organizations (COFO.)

The meeting was called to discuss the organizational structure of COFO, and to plan the direction of civil rights activities in Mississippi for the coming year.

COFO is a federation of representatives from voting leagues and NAACP chapters, and staff members from the Student Nonviolent Ccordinating Committee, Southern Christian Leadership Conference and Congress of Racial Equality, who are working in Mississippi.

One item of business was the adoption of by-laws , in which the purpose of COFO is outlined as working for "total democracy, racial equality and economic justice " in Mississippi.

"The program of COFO consists of voter registration and citizenship education projects, political action -- both mock and official, the implementation of government programs and general civil rights work," according to the newly amended by-laws.

"Mock" political action refers to the recent Freedom Ballot Campaign in which Aaron Henry, President of COFO, ran for governor and polled 85,000 Freedom Ballots from officially disenfranchised Negroes.

Robert Moses, Director of SNCC's Mississippi vote drive since July 1961, was re-elected Project Director for COFO. CORE staff member Dave Dennis was elected Assistant Project Director.

"SNCC's wholehearted participation in COFO is part of our South-wide ONE MAN -- ONE VOTE campaign aimed at breaking down all barriers to Negro voter registration except residence and age," stated John Lewis, Chairman of SNCC.

ning out for Atlanta."

The SCLC head said, "If our words fail to move them (the power structure) then our actions must show them."

Other speakers were Larry Fox, Chairman of the Committee on Appeal For Human Rights; Dr. C.M. Smith, for the Atlanta NAACP; Rev. Ralph D. Abernathy, for Operation Breadbasket; and the Rev. William Holmes Borders.

Two members of the National States Rights party, attired in Nazi storm trooper uniforms, picketed the gathering with signs reading: "Negro, your future is not here but in Africa."

The theme of the meeting was that Atlanta, despite its image as a city "too busy to hate," is still as segregated as many deep South towns.

Public schools are integrated tokenly; only lunch counters and a few restaurants downtown admit all comers. All movie theatres are integrated, as are the colleges in the area. But Atlanta Negroes are still shunted into slums and ghettoes in the city.

Today's "Pilgrimage for Democracy" was the first demonstration held here since President Kennedy's assassination.

The day before the large march, 275 Atlanta area clergymen -- Protestant and Jewish, Negro and white -- signed a petition supporting the aims of the Pilgrimage.

Leaders of the Summit Conference reported to the crowd on the progress of negotiations to implement their plan for total integration of Atlanta.

The Atlanta Summit Leadership Conference is composed of representatives from 10 civil rights organizations and representatives from "at least 75" other community groups, according to Summit Co-chairman Attorney A.T. Walden.

The group called a city-wide conference on October 19, 1963, where over 300 people, from a cross-section of Atlanta life, discussed and recommended action in the following areas: public accomodations, employment, education, registration and voting, health and social services, housing, political issues and law enforcement.

Since then, members of the group's steering committee have

Henry Suit Appealed

Dr. Aaron Henry

CLARKSDALE, MISS., - Dec. 3, A libel suit filed against Aaron Henry, recent gubernatorial candidate on the Mississippi Freedom Ballot, was appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

The defamation suit, filed by the Chief of Police and the District Attorney, resulted from a press conference following Henry's conviction on a morals charge in 1962.

Henry, state president of the NAACP, was convicted in Justice of Peace Court, in Shelby, Miss. on March 15, 1962 on charges of making perverse advances on a white teen-ager hitchhiker. Henry stated that the charges were a complete fabrication, and presented an alibi supported by sworn witnesses.

When Henry later stated in a press conference that the prosecutor and the police chief, who figured in the trial, had conspired to frame him, Henry was sued by them for defamation.

The Mississippi State Supreme Court upheld the libel suit in a December 2 ruling, and awarded $15,000 to the police thereby reversing an earlier decision.

Has No Authority Says Justice Dept.

ATLANTA, GEORGIA - A spokesman for the Department of Justice has told a California senator the government "has no authority" to intercede in the case of a 67-year-old white minister held in jail here since August 28.

The senator, Thomas Kuchel (R-Cal.), forwarded the letter to the SNCC office here.

The letter was written by Burke Marshall, Assistant Attorney General.

The elderly minister, the Reverend Ashton Bryant Jones, a native Georgian now residing in San Gabriel, California, is being held under $20,000 bail on charges growing out of a protest demonstration at an all-white church here this summer.

Since Jones' conviction is being appealed, his time behind bars is "dead time" and does not count against his sentence.

Cooperating groups include SCLC, NAACP, SNCC, Operation Breadbasket, the Committee on Appeal For Human Rights, the Gandhi Youth Society, the All Citizens Registration Committee and the Atlanta Negro Voters League.

BLIND CASHIER NIXES BIAS

TALLAHASSEE, FLA. -- The cafeteria of the Florida State Capitol Building was desegregated recently because its cashier is blind.

Several Florida A&M University students, along with SNCC field secretary Sam Shirah, went to the end of the line to pay, the cashier could not see to refuse their money.

This is the first time that a SNCC staff member has worked in Florida. A militant student action group here, which Shirah helped organize, has requested affiliation with SNCC.

"Most people don't realize that northern Florida is as rigidly segregated as Alabama in many places," Shirah stated. The 20 year old SNCC worker, from Atlanta, is a white native of Alabama.

SCEF Case In Federal Court

NEW ORLEANS, LA. -- A case challenging the constitutionality of Louisiana's communist control laws was taken under advisement by a three-judge federal court on December 9.

The Southern Conference Educational Fund and its executive director, James A. Dombrowski, original plaintiffs in the case, were joined by attorneys Benjamin E. Smith and Bruce C. Waltzer whose request for intervention was granted by the court.

Smith, who is the Fund's treasurer, and his law partner, Waltzer, were arrested along with Dombrowski on October 4th for allegedly violating the state anti-communist statutes -- as managers of a "subversive" organization and for distributing "communist" literature, -- and all SCEF records were seized. Conspiracy charges against the three men were dismissed by a Criminal District Court, but the records were not returned to SCEF.

The plaintiffs are now asking for a temporary injunction against state and city officials preventing them from enforcing the statutes, and prohibiting the Louisiana Joint Legislative Committee on Un-American Activities (LUAC) from turning over the seized SCEF records to the Orleans Parish Grand Jury.

CORE Worker Stricken

ATLANTA, GEORGIA -- CORE field secretary Zev Aleony was hospitalized here last weekend with a heart attack.

Aleony was one of the Americus Five held in that Southwest Georgia city for two months on charges of attempting to incite insurrection.

Aleony is 25 years old, and a native of Minneapolis, Minnesota.

KENYA CONGRATULATED

ATLANTA, GEORGIA -- The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee extended "heartiest congratulations" to Kenya Prime Minister Jomo Kenyatta on the evening that country achieved independence, December 12.

The SNCC cablegram from Chairman John Lewis and Executive Secretary James Forman called Kenya's struggle for independence "an inspiration for all freedom struggles."

Raleigh Vote Drive Begins

ATLANTA, GEORGIA: A new SNCC voter registration project operating out of Raleigh, N.C., was announced here by John Lewis, Chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

SNCC was invited into Raleigh by the Raleigh Citizens Association (RCA), a coordinating body of Negro organizations in that city.

SNCC field secretary Reginald Robinson, last based in Cambridge, Md., during this past summer's racial unrest there, will direct the project.

Officials of Shaw University and St. Augustine's College in Raleigh have offered their support.

Only 32% of the eligible Negroes in Raleigh and Wake County are registered, according to the 1961 Civil Rights Commission Report.

SNCC now has major field projects located in Alabama Arkansas, Georgia, Mississippi and Virginia, in addition to North Carolina.

SNCC worker Dick Frey in Greenwood said the office there had lodged protests with the FBI about Knox's arrest.

Knox had testified at the trial of five Mississippi law officers who were accused of beating five Negroes in the Winona jail.

The five officers were acquitted by an all-white all-male jury.

MRS. CAROLYN DANIELS, whose Dawson, Georgia home was bombed last week after shots were fired at her house, has indicated she will continue trying to register voters in Southwest Georgia.

now beginning to organize in Pittslyvania County and the outlying districts of Danville.

"SNCC was asked into Danville in early June 1963. Over 20 SNCC workers have since worked in this mill and tobacco town -- which has seen some of the worst police brutality in the South," according to John Lewis, Chairman of SNCC.

"Danville is an example of an upper South city, assumed by most of the nation to be more liberal than the deep South. And yet we have encountered some of the greatest resistance of the demands of the twentieth century in this city," Lewis said.

"IF YOU KNOW WHAT'S GOOD FOR YOU ......"

Stay Out Of Helena!

HELENA, ARKANSAS -- The Chief of Police of this Arkansas Delta town has threatened to arrest SNCC workers whenever they cross the county line.

Chief Roy Ross told SNCC worker James Jones, "whenever you cross that Phillips County line we've got you."

Ross told Jones to, "take that station wagon, that literature and all that 'snick' stuff and get out of here if you know what's good for you."

Jones was warned to, "tell your buddy (SNCC worker William) Hansen that everything I've told you goes for him."

Hansen and two other SNCC workers were jailed in Helena following the first sit-ins held here in early November. Two workers, John Bradford and Bruce Jordan, were jailed last week with an East Helena minister on land adjoining a Catholic church.

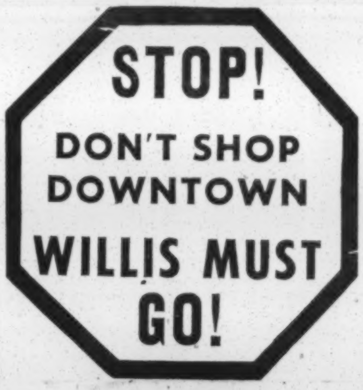
On December 13, SNCC workers Bradford and Jordan were sentenced to 30 days in jail and fined $500 each for "threatening to make a disturbance." They were held under $1500 bail each.

Hansen, who direct's SNCC's Arkansas project, said the two youths had been in Helena for only 6 hours when they were jailed.

Bradford and Jordan were working on a voter registration project in Phillips County.

Negroes are 53.9% of the county's population, according to the 1961 Civil Rights Commission Report on Voting. Only 28% of the eligible Negroes are registered voters, however.

Friends Ask Help For Chicago Boycott



STOP!
DON'T SHOP DOWNTOWN
WILLIS MUST GO!

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS --Chicago Area Friends of SNCC (CAF-SNCC) has initiated a "STOP! Don't Shop Downtown" Campaign calling for the ouster of School Superintendent Ben Willis and for the adoption of a positive policy for integration by the Chicago School Board.

This action, supported by a growing number of community organizations, is the follow up to an Oct. 22nd FREEDOM DAY School Boycott, in which over 200,000 students and parents participated in the largest civil rights action in the country's history.

The purpose of the downtown boycott is to pressure business leaders, who have openly supported Willis.

CAF-SNCC has issued a call for volunteer help to make the boycott a success. It has asked college students to spend their Christmas vacation in Chicago working on the "STOP! Don't Shop Campaign." Chicago Friends of SNCC cannot provide subsistence wages but will find living accomodations for those who come. Those interested may contact CAF-SNCC, 765 E. SNCC Raps Service Bias

JACKSON, MISSISSIPPI - The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) has asked Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara to "act immediately to halt discrimination in the processing of inductees in Jackson, Mississippi."

The SNCC protest, from the group's chairman, John Lewis, said SNCC worker McArthur Cotton was refused service at the Air Base Grill here while he was taking a physical examination.

Cotton also said he and other Negroes were made to ride in the rear of an Army bus to Jackson from Kosciusco, his home town.

Cotton said the Jackson induction center was "totally segregated."

The SNCC worker said he protested the segregation of government facilities to officers there, and was told "the induction center is a city establishment and not controlled by the government."

Cotton said he entered the white dining room for one meal but was refused service. He said he did not eat another meal during his two day stay here.

The SNCC worker, who has been jailed three times for his participation in the civil rights drive, heads a vote drive in McComb, Mississippi.

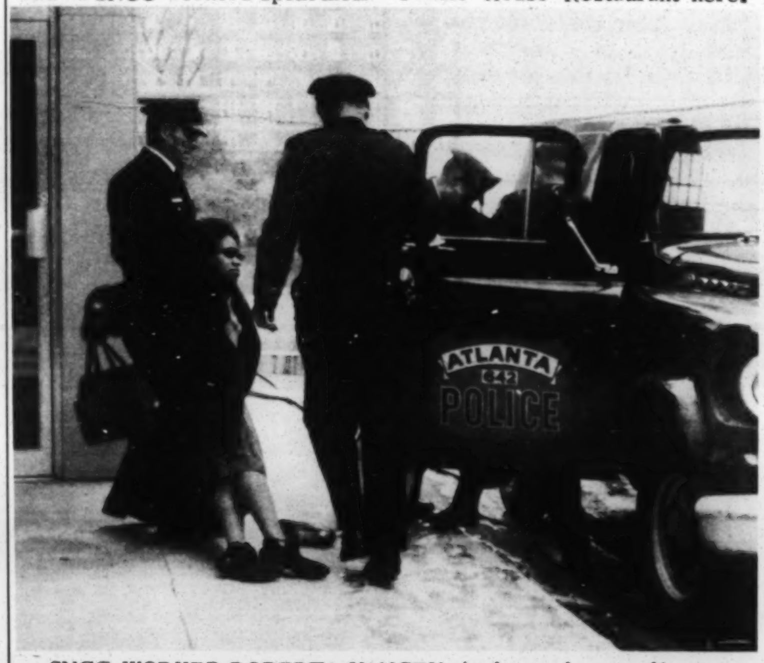
WORKERS SPEND XMAS IN JAIL

ATLANTA, GEORGIA - The Chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, the wife of commedian Dick Gregory and 22 SNCC workers spent their Christmas in an Atlanta jail.

SNCC Chairman John Lewis Mrs. Lillian Gregory and the other 22 workers were jailed at a Toddle House Restaurant here.



SNCC WORKER ROBERTA YANCEY is dragged to a police car. Miss Yancey, Prathia Hall and Mrs. Dick Gregory, all arrested at the Toddle House on Christmas Eve, are all stockholders in the Toddle House.

Mrs. Gregory and the two young women arrested with her are stockholders in Dobbs House, the Tennessee corporation that owns Toddle House. All were, in effect, arrested on their own property. They are being held under $100 bail. The three were placed in solitary confinement on Saturday night, December 28, when they refused to obey jail rules.

Protests at the segregated eating place began on Saturday evening, December 21. after SNCC workers visited and sang Freedom Songs, with the Honorable Oginda Odinga, Minister of Home Affairs of Kenya.

Two members of the group that met and sang with members of the Kenya delegation tried to get coffee at the Toddle House. When they were refused, and entire group sat-in and 17 were arrested

The next morning, Sunday, December 24, Christmas Eve, Mrs. Gregory and SNCC workers Prathia Hall and Roberta Yancey were arrested. Misses Hall and Yancey, who refused to cooperate with police as did most protestores arrested at the eating place,

SELMA OFFICE RAIDED

Nine Arrested

SELMA, ALABAMA -The sheriff of Dallas County, the County Solicitor and four policemen raided the office of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) here today and arrested nine people.

The same policemen also broke into "Freedom House" - a three-room apartment used to house SNCC workers here, and "completely wrecked" it, according to one SNCC worker.

Willie C. Robertson, 24, who was arrested in the SNCC office this afternoon, said Sheriff Jim Clark tore a telephone from the wall and pushed SNCC worker James Austin, 21, against a window.

Robertson said Sheriff Clark told Austin, We've been after you for a long time."

The officers also confiscated materials and affidavits from the office files, including a large number of leaflets promoting a selective buying campaign in Selma.

Earlier this week, a federal judge had refused to allow Dallas County officials to subpoena the record of the organization.

Arrested were Frank Spivey, 18 Louise Johnson, 22; Joseph Pickett, 16; David Murray, 25; Alvery Williams, 21; and Austin and Robertson. Also jailed were J.D. Pritchett Sr., and J.D. Pritchett Jr., printers who prepared the boycott leaflets.

Miss Johnson and Murray were arrested in downtown Selma as they distributed the leaflets. Spivey, Pickett, Austin, and Robertson were arresred in the SNCC office. Williams was jailed in the "Freedom House" when he walked in on Sheriff Clark and the policement there. They had broken into the house, Williams

Leaders Sentenced On Perjury Charge

Joni Rabinowitz

MACON, GA. --- Five leaders of the Albany Movement - including a SNCC worker were sentenced in U.S. District Court here on Dec. 23 as a result of picketing of a supermarket in Albany last spring. The formal charge against them was perjury.

Those sentenced were Slater King, acting president of the Albany Movement, who was given a year and a day in prison; the Rev. Samuel B. Wells, a year and a day; Miss Joni Rabinowitz, SNCC worker and white Antioch College student, three months to four years, and Thomas Chatmon and Robert Thomas suspended sentences and five years' probation.

Attorneys immediately filled notice of appeal to the Fifth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals at New Orleans. Judge W.A. Bootle set appeal bonds at $5,000 for King; $3,000 for Miss Rabinowitz, and $2,500 apiece for the others.

None had ever been arrested previously except for taking part in integration activities. Albany was the scene of a great upsurge against segregation in 1962, during which it became a symbol of the integration movement throughout the world.

After he was sentenced, Slater King declared; "I knew from the beginning that it would be an impossibility for all of us who had been very active leaders in the freedom struggle to receive a fair and impartial trial before an all-white Southern jury.

"It is interesting that white segregationists can bomb, murder, and plunder at will and with the knowledge that they will not be punished by the courts, but black men must face death daily, and even persecution by the Federal Government, in attempting to obtain their constitutionally guaranteed rights."

The sentencing followed separate trials for the five during November, at which the defendants flatly denied the charges against them. A sixth person accused, Mrs. Eliza Jackson, is to be tried Jan. 27. She is the recording secretary of the Albany Movement.

Dr. W.G. Anderson, former head of the Albany Movement, is to be retried April 6. A jury was unable to agree at his first trial in the fall. He is charged with conspiring to injure a federal juror. The others are charged with lying to a federal grand jury about various matters during its investigation of the picketing of the supermarket.

The grand jury was investigating a charge by Carl Smith, a grocer, that his place had been picketed in retaliation for a verdict he gave as a juror in Federal Court.

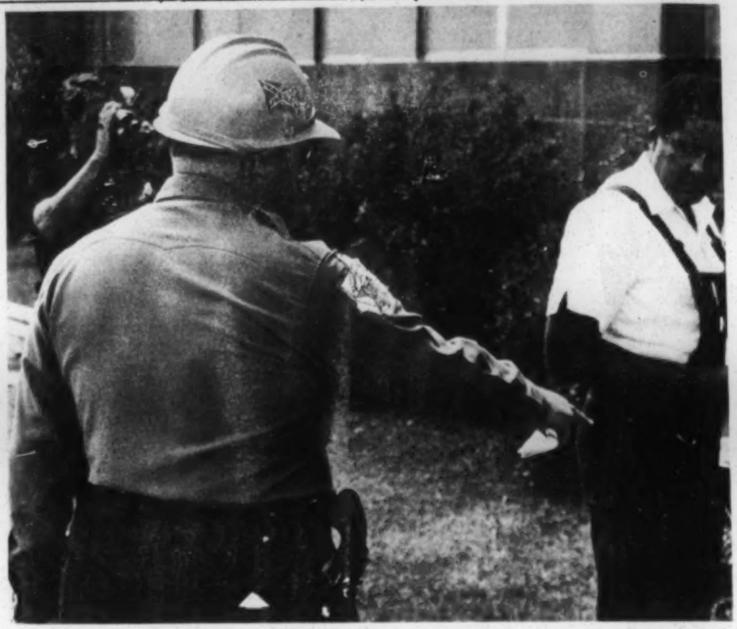
Smith and others on the jury had found in favor of Sheriff L. Warren Johnson of Baker County, accused of beating and shooting a Negro, Charlie Ware, while Ware was a prisoner.

Smith closed down the supermarket after it had been picketed for about an hour. The pickets said they were protesting Smith's failure to upgrade Negroes employed in the store.

Smith was represented by a law firm which included Mavor Asa Kelly of Albany. This firm requested the investigation by the Federal Government. The Justice Department conducted the most vigorous prosecution yet seen in the civil rights movement.

The guilty verdicts will be appealed on the ground that Negroes are discriminated against in the selection of jurors in the U.S. courts in the Middle District of Georgia. Of 93 persons called as possible jurors for the Albany leaders' trial, only three were Negroes. These three were quickly stricken by U.S. Attorneys.

Slater King ran for mayor of Albany in 1963 and Chatmon was a candidate for city commissioner in 1962. Mr. Wells has been very active in voter registration. Thomas, an Albany Movement. Thomas, an Albany barber, has been a strong supporter of the Albany Movement.



DALLAS COUNTY SHERIFF Jim Clark orders SNCC Executive Secretary James Forman away from a line of Negroes trying to register to vote during an extensive vote campaign this summer.

Two SNCC field secretaries were beaten by Clark's policemen shortly after this picture was taken. Forman and the two workers who were beaten were trying to bring food to the Negroes, some of whom had to stand in line all dav without eating.

Voter Suit Halted

SELMA, ALABAMA A Federal Judge has "temporarily" suspended a hearing on a Justice Department suit charging the Wilcox County, Alabama board of registrars with discriminating against Negro voters.

The Wilcox County hearing followed a recessed hearing on a Justice Department plea to halt a grand Jury in Selma from investigating government action in this central Alabama town.

Judge Daniel H. Thomas said hearings on the grand jury investigation would continue after arguments were heard in the voting cast.

Before taking up the Wilcox County suit, Thomas ruled the Dallas County Improvement Association and the Dallas County Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee would not have to produce member ship rolls, literature, financial statements, payrolls and pahphlets, requested by the defense.

The Justice Department called Lonnie Brown, a Negro farmer, who testified he was refused a chance to register in Wilcox County on two occasions.

Brown, who worked with SNCC Field Secretary Bernard Lafayette in getting the first group of Negroes to make a registration attempt in Wilcox County in 30 years, testified his home was fired upon shortly after he first tried to register.

Two white men testified they had been given help by the registrar on their voting applications.

There are no Negroes registered in Wilcox County. In 1960 Negroes were 77% of the total population of the county.

All were charged with "illegal circulation of literature promoting a boycott." All were released on $500.00 bail.

SNCC has conducted an extensive voting drive in Dallas and Wilcox Counties since January 1963. Negroes are 57.7% of Dallas County's population, Only .9% of the voting age Negroes are registered voters, according to the United States Civil Rights Commission. The U.S. Department of Justice has filed suits against Sheriff Clark, Solicitor McLeod and the White Citizens Council here charging them with intimidation of and discrimination against potential Negro voters.

were dragged and carried to a paddy wagon. Mrs. Gregory, who is expecting a child in April, 1964, walked.

Mrs. Dick Gregory

Before Mrs. Gregory and the two young women were jailed Christmas evening, members of SNCC staged a stand-in demonstration at Atlanta Mayor Ivan Allen's office and home. Others staged a demonstration at the City Airport, carrying signs which said: "Welcome To Atlanta, a segregated City."

Signs carried to the Mayor's office and home read: "Black is Not a Vice or Segregation a Virtue; Atlanta's Image is a Fraud."

Working with SNCC to protest segregation is the Committee On Appeal For Human Rights (COA HR), the Atlanta University Center student group. COAHR, headed by Morehouse College student Larry Fox, is responsible for integration of Atlanta's movie theatres, dime store restaurants and for securing more jobs for Negroes here.

Mrs. Gregory's husband, Dick Gregory flew into Atlanta on Thursday, December 27, to witness her arraignment.

He said he would return to Atlanta to engage in demonstrations here.

Before Lewis was jailed Sunday morning, he asked Undersecretary of State for African Affairs G. Mennen Williams by telegram to "remove Atlanta from the itinerary of future African visitors to the United States. Atlanta is the most segregated city in the South for its size."

On Saturday night, Lewis had telegrammed Atlanta Mayor Ivan Allen, Jr. protesting rough treatment given the prisoners. Lewis' telegram said SNCC worker Worth Long was punched five times by a policeman.

After Lewis was jailed Sunday morning, SNCC Executive Secretary James telegrammed President Lyndon Johnson, saying arrests here "make it impertive to pass the federal public accommodations law."

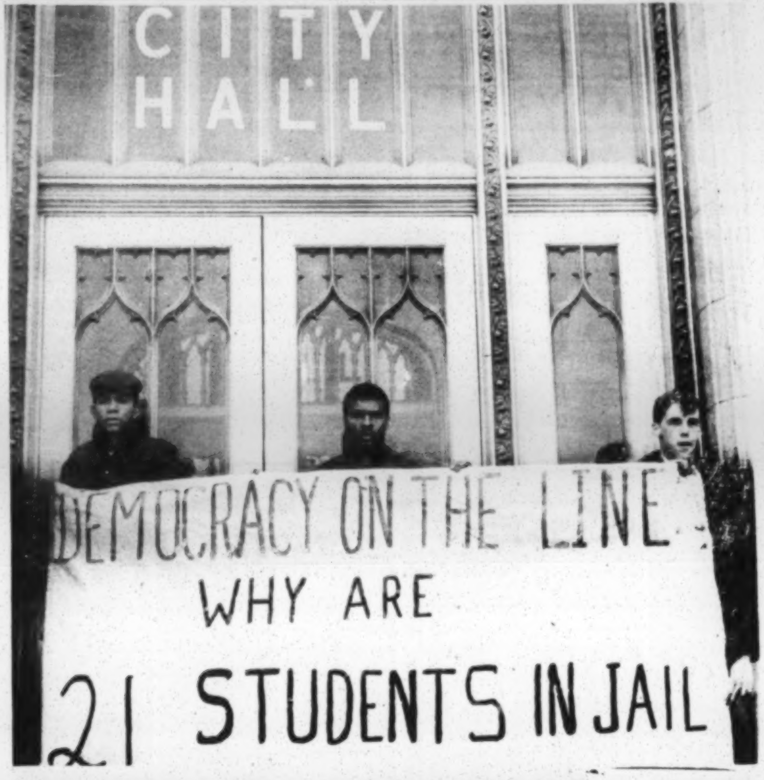
Minister Odinga said racial matters in the United States were "very pitiful." The Kenya official said the United States "practices segregation - which is what we are fighting in Africa."

Forman also expressed "profound apologies" to Odinga "for any embarassment you might have encountered here in Atlanta as a result of the arrests."

Mr. Odinga is vice president of KANU, The Kenya African National Union, the party of Prime Minister Jomo Kenyatta's government.

On Sunday morning, December 29, eight carloads of SNCC members went to Allen's home again.

They sang songs and issued a statement protesting jail conditions for the three women behind bars and calling for a public accommodations law and for more jobs for Negroes in city government positions here.



Demonstrators protest at Atlanta City Hall.

WHAT YOU CAN DO

The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee needs your help. We are being hit on all fronts at once.

We urgently request your help TODAY.

ATLANTA, GEORGIA

1. Sympathy demonstrations at Toddle House and Dobbs House. There are 255 Toddle Houses in 30 states and Washington D.C. Toddle House is owned by Dobbs, which has 89 restaurants in 28 cities. Demonstrations are already under way in Hartford, Philadelphia and New York.

2. Letters to Mayor Ivan Allen, City Hall, Atlanta, Georgia, protesting the jailing and the rough treatment afforded those arrested.

3. Letters to G. Mennen Williams, Undersecretary of State for African Affairs, State Department, Washington D.C. and to President Johnson protesting the arrests and asking that Atlanta be removed from the itinerary of future visiting Africans. The letters should also emphasize the need for a public accomodations bill.

4. ATLANTA IS ON THE MOVE. WE CAN USE ALL PEOPLE WHO ARE WILLING TO DEMONSTRATE AND GO TO JAIL, WITHOUT BAIL.

SELMA, ALABAMA

1. Students should begin considering spending their spring vacations in Selma, helping the local people show the Dallas County police that we will not be turned back no matter what. Help is needed in voter registration, taking affidavits of voting violations, and generally mobilizing the community.

2. Those who join us must be prepared to spend time in jail.

3. Letters protesting the seizure of our records should be sent to Attorney General Robert Kennedy, Justice Department.
4. Food and clothing is needed desperately in Selma.
5. Money to buy industrial sewing machines for the setting up of a piece-goods factory for the unemployed women is needed. One machine costs $230.000.

MACON, GEORGIA

Letters protesting the four year sentence of Joni Rabinowitz should go to Attorney General Robert Kennedy.

Students Step Up Boycott

PRAIRIE VIEW, Tex., - In their latest activities against segregation in Hempstead, Tex., 60 students of Prairie View A&M College picketed two restaurants in the town over the last two weekends.

The all-Negro college was integrated this fall by its board of directors, but so far no white students have enrolled.

The demonstration was part of a continuing economic boycott of Hempstead, population 1, 500, by students of Prairie View A&M.

The boycott began last summer in protest of the town's segregation policies concerning entertainment and business facilities.

Students and faculty began to shop in near-by centers or in Houston, about 30 miles away, withdrawing their economic support from Hempstead.

The administration of the college has not taken a stand on the segregation policy of Hempstead, and in an effort to elicit a stand, 3,000 students met in the gymnasium Oct. 31 to applaud 46 student leaders who resigned their campus offices in protest.

The mass resignation was touched off by the purchase at a Hempstead store of a color telesivion set for the student union, by T.R. Solomon, dean of student life.

Solomon said of the television set purchase, "I had no idea it would cause all this trouble."

The idea for the boycott of Hempstead originated last spring in a business class when a student asked how much buying power the college's faculty had over Hempstead merchants. It was estimated at 60%.

Later faculty members spearheaded a drive in June to talk with town merchants about desegregating. Discriminatory signs in Waller County Court House and other places were removed and 10 merchants hired 13 Negroes.

Will the Army act to halt jimcrow aimed at those who are fighting to bring democracy to this country ? s/John Lewis"

IN CAMBRIDGE.....

New Protests Warned

CAMBRIDGE, MARYLAND - Mass demonstrations will began here after December 22 "unless there is a substantial change in the situation."

Mrs. Gloria Richardson, chairman of the Cambridge Nonviolent Action Committee (CNAC) called for renewed protests in the wake of complete inaction by the city administration and businessmen.

"The Biracial Committee has made no progress and will not meet again until January 21," Mrs. Richardson said. "The federal Housing Project has been held up until summer, and no one knows why." she said.

The housing project and biracial committee were two of the provisions of a "desegregation" agreement with white officials. The agreement was signed July 23 in the office of Attorney General Kennedy in Washington.

Cambridge was the scene of protracted demonstrations this summer. On June 14, after a near riot, Governor J. Millard Tawes called in the Maryland National Guard. The Guard still remains here.

On October 1, Cambridge voters rejected a city charger amendment, part of the "desegregation" pact, which whould have banned discrimination in public accommodations.

Only 40% of the registered Negro voters here cast ballots in the election. This small number, compared to a 76% white turnout, was a vote of confidence for Mrs. Richardson, who had urged Negroes to boycott the polls.

Mrs. Gloria Richardson

The Cambridge Nonviolent Action Committee, (CNAC) is an affiliate of the Atlanta-based Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC). Mrs. Richardson is a member of the SNCC Executive Committee.

The December 22 date marks the end of a one month moratorium called by CNAC in commenoration of the death of President Kennedy.

Justice Dept. Abandons Suit

GREENWOOD, MISSISSIPPI - The United States Department of Justice has asked a federal appeals court to dismiss its appeal of a suit against LeFlore County officials.

The Department had been appealing U.S. District Judge Claude Clayton's denial of a temporary injunction against prosecution of 45 Negroes arrested in Itta Bena last June.

The 45, accused of throwing rocks and "causing disturbances'' have been convicted in a Justice of the Peace Court. All are free on appeal, and their cases may come up in the January term of county court here.

All were arrested June 18. The Justice Department maintained they were forced out of a voter registration meeting in a church by tear gas and were walking toward the sheriff's house to seek protection when they were set upon by another group of Negroes hired for that purpose.

At their trial the males were sentenced to six months in prison and fined $500 each. Women received four months and $200 fines.

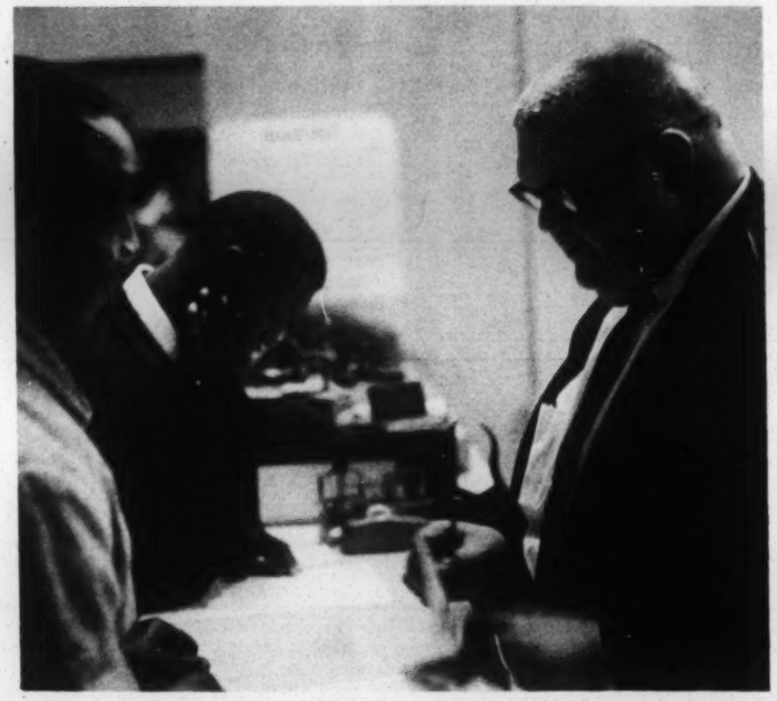
1963 Annual Report

HATTIESBURG, MISS., FREEDOM DAY

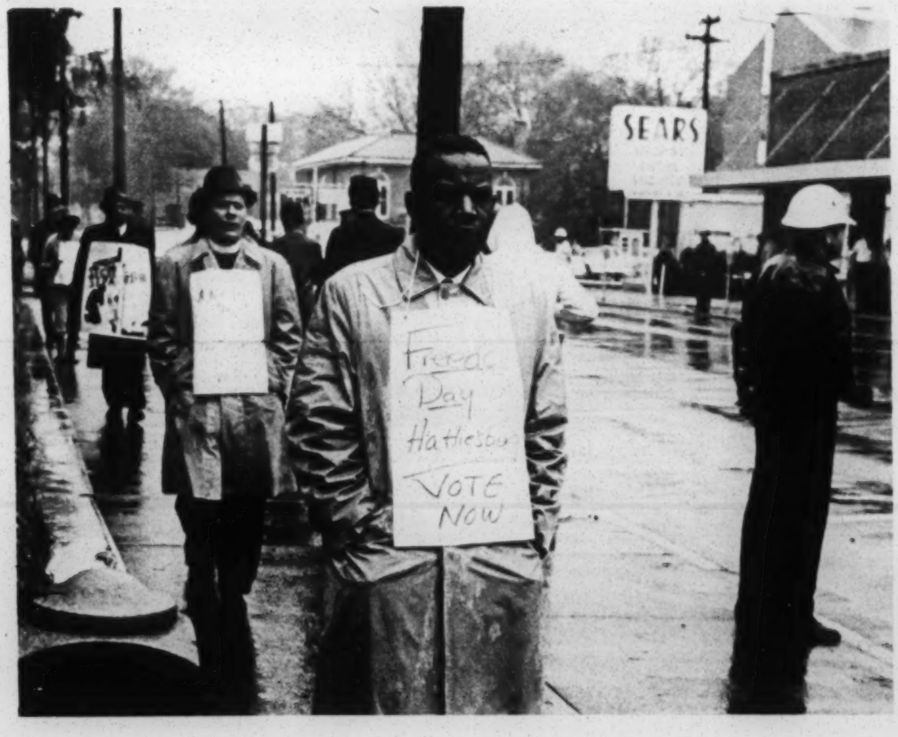
JANUARY 22, 1964



Hattiesburg is the county seat of Forrest county in southern Mississippi. The county has a population of 52,722 of which 28 percent are Negro; 7, 406 of them are of voting age yet only 53 are registered voters. The Justice Department has had an injunction against the county registrar, Theron Lynd (left), since April 1962. The injunction orders him to stop discriminating against Negro applicants. Lynd was also convicted of civil contempt in July 1963 for his failure to register Negroes. However, he has not yet complied with the injunction or purged himself of contempt.

In Forrest county on January 22, "Freedom Day," an intensive vote drive began with the aid of many ministers. The campaign was conducted by workers from the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), under the auspices of the Council of Federated Organizations (COFO), an alliance of all civil rights groups working in Mississippi.

"Personally I am not important in this . . . rather it's the deep over-riding fear of Negroes . . . American citizens who are residents of Hattiesburg. They are afraid and it's a tragic fact that they have good reason to be. Most of the Negroes there work for white people. If they register to vote, they will lose their jobs. You see, it's a basic bread and butter issue for parents concerned about feeding their children. Many of them have lost their jobs, but we are trying hard to instill courage in the townspeople."
-- Rev. Donald Register, St. Louis, Missouri



'I hope to try to indicate to those in the ministry that the church must have action to go along with the talk.'

-- Dr. Alan Pickering, United Christian Campus Fellowship, University of Nebraska.

"We saw a great change come over the local Negro community. Dick Gregory, the comedian, was there, and he told me it was the first time he had addressed an audience in Mississippi and not seen fear written on their faces."

-- Rev. Russell Williams, Denver, Colorado

"You asked what the point of it is. I think the point is that this is much like Germany at the beginning of Hitler's rise -- fear, police intimidation and summary arrests. I don't want you, or any other kids, to grow up in America in those circumstances."

-- Rev. Emil J. Hattoon, Decatur, Illinois in a letter to his two sons.

These and over 100 other ministers and rabbis worked closely with field secretaries from the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), canvassing house to house, picketing at the county court house and speaking at mass rallies in churches.

"We went to the SNCC state headquarters, where we were again most impressed with the creative determination and comprehensive program of these youthful civil rights leaders . . . We met these dedicated young freedom fighters, Negro and white, male and female, from north and south . . . All of them are heroes produced by the struggle for human justice in the southland, heroes with hard eyes, soft hearts, tight stomachs and unwavering commitment."
-- Rev. Kenneth Waterman, First Presbyterian Church, Kansas City, Missouri.

This work for civil rights and human dignity must continue. But so that it can continue, your help is needed.

CANTON CRACKS DOWN ON RIGHTS ACTIVITY

CANTON, MISS . --- Sixteen civil rights workers have been arrested here in a three day period in what appears to be the first sign of a forthcoming crackdown on integration activity in this central Mississippi city.

Between January 22 and 24, 16 workers for the Council of Federated Organizations - a coalition of civil rights organizations in this state - were arrested while either inside or in the vicinity of the community center-voter registration office of COFO.

Among the arrested was Carole Merritt, a 23-year-old worker for SNCC from Cincinnati, Ohio. Miss Merritt was arrested January 24 on a charge of "contributing to the delinquency of a minor" and allegedly causing a juvenile to distribute "leaflets of a libelous nature." Bond was set at $500.

Eight persons were arrested January 23 under a newly-passed

GREENWOOD, MISSISSIPPI - Forty-five Negroes arrested and convicted here last June after they were smoke bombed from a voter registration meeting face sentencing Monday, January 27.

Twelve were found "guilty as charged" by a jury last week. Attorney Carsie Hall, acting for the group, said the remaining 33 will plead not guilty and will waive their right to a jury trial, since evidence in all cases is the same.

The case has been complicated with Federal litigation.

On December 26, the United States Department of Justice asked a Federal judge to dismiss its appeal of a suit against Leflore County officials.

The Department had been appealing Federal Judge Claude Clayton's denial of a temporary

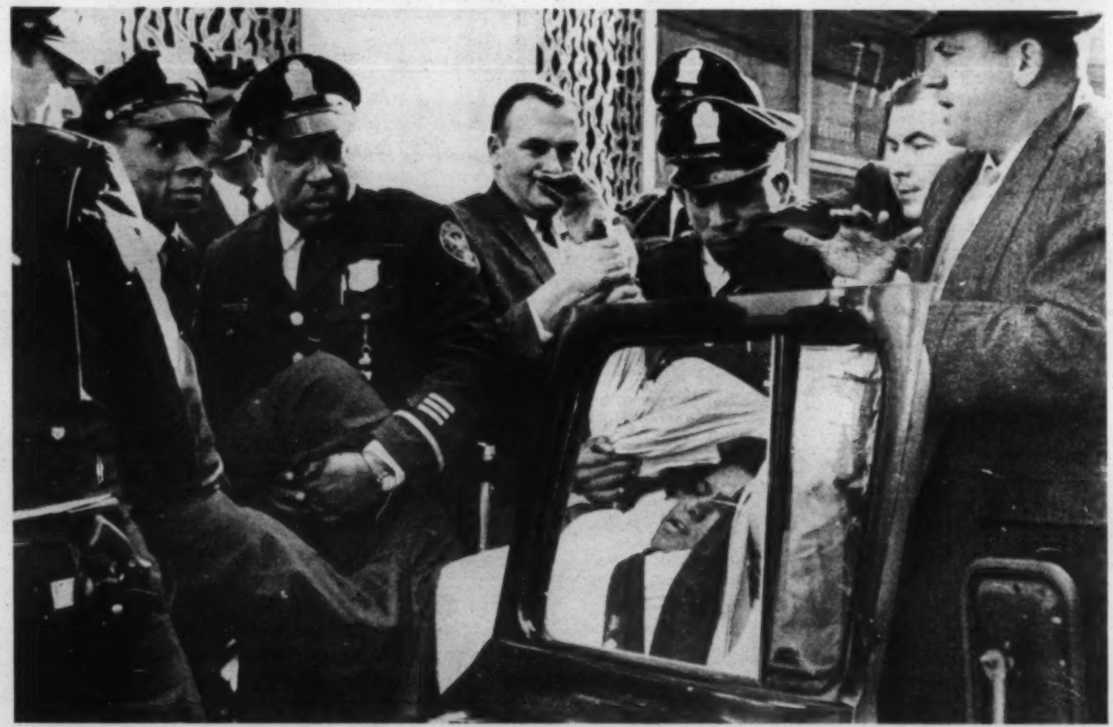
JAILS FILL AS PROTESTS RISE



GETTING CARRIED AWAY is SNCC Executive Secretary James Forman, jailed during a Sunday night demonstration at a segregated eating place. Seventy-nine demonstrators arrested Sunday night were released later on their own recognizance.

Eighty-Six Arrested

ATLANTA, GEORGIA - Eighty-six anti-segregation demonstrators were arrested, held on two sets of different charges and under two bonds, and finally released here under their own recognizance on Sunday night.

The 86 were arrested during full day demonstrations at segregated restaurants here.

Among those jailed were comedian Dick Gregory and SNCC Executive Secretary James Forman.

All were originally charged with "disorderly conduct" and "inciting to riot," and bond was set at $1000 each.

Later, the charge was changed to "disorderly conduct" and bail reduced to $15 cash and $50 property.

Still later, all were released on their own recognizance and allowed to sign their own bonds.

SNCC's James Forman, Attorney Donald L. Hollowell and Atlanta Police Chief Herbert Jenkins signed a statement saying all would be released and that SNCC would make "every effort" to comply with Atlanta picketing regulations.

Demonstrators were critical of police handling of the protests. Four girls were hospitalized - two knocked unconscious - after the protests.

Negro demonstrators and robed and hooded (but not masked) members of the Ku Klux Klan met for the second time in downtown Atlanta Saturday night, January 25.

The demonstrators, numbering as many as 500 at some points, had met on the Atlanta University Center campus and marched into the downtown area.

OUTSIDE THE FORREST COUNTY COURTHOUSE Negroes wait for a chance to register. Only 2% of the voting age Negroes are registered in Forrest County.

FREEDOM WALKERS CASE APPEALED

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA - An appeal by 10 white and Negro Freedom Walkers - members of SNCC and CORE - who were arrested May 3, 1963 as they attempted to walk into Alabama from Georgia has been taken under advisement by the U.S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals.

Attorneys for the Walkers appealed the dismissal of an injunction brought against Colonel Al Lingo, head of the Alabama State Police, prohibiting him from interfering with the Freedom Walkers' right to travel.

The Walkers were enroute to Jackson, Mississippi from Chattanooga, Tennessee, as a memorial to William Moore, a Maryland postman murdered near Gadsden, Alabama while carrying signs urging an end to segregation.

Lingo announced that the integrated Walkers would be arrested if they entered Alabama, and arrests were made on breach of the peace charges after the group was 50 feet inside the Alabama state line.

Later a state attorney obtained an injunction against them. Jack Greenberg, head of the NAACP Legal Defense Fund, argued in court here that the Walkers had experienced no trouble in Tennessee and Georgia.

"We are not going to have a Federal union if citizens cannot go from one state to another without being arrested," Greenberg said.

After being jailed, the Walkers spent 31 days in jail.

city ordinance for "distributing leaflets without a permit." The law had been passed by the city council two days prior to the arrests. Bond was set at $800 each - an unusually high bond for that offense.

Other charges included "intimidating an officer," "breach of the peace" and burning trash without a permit."

Two rights workers, Clarence Chinn and James Collier, were charged with "violation of the building code," and were arrested while making repairs on the COFO office. Their bond was set at $350 each.

SNCC workers in Jackson report that simultaneous to the passage of the new city law, two constables and another police cruiser were added to law enforcement agencies in Canton. A bill recently passed by the state legislature will aid cities in making exchange of jail space.

The leaflets, which pressed for continuation of an effective boycott already underway here, asked Negroes to withhold patronage from merchants who address Negro customers as "boy" or "nigger."

SNCC spokesmen have labeled the anti-circular law as "a clear violation of First Amendment rights guaranteed by the Constitution."

NEGRO CHILDREN PICKET WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON, D.C. - A group of Negro fifth grade students picketed the White House here January 18 with signs demanding an end to "Rats, Roaches and Rent-robbers."

The group told newsmen they had consulted the Washington SNCC office and asked the SNCC workers to get them an appointment with President Johnson.

The group's leader, 10-year-old Lawrence Dunbar Twyman III, admitted the notice was short, but said, "It seemed to me that although the President is busy with a lot of things, he has a lot of assistants."

Ten-year-old Jackie Scott said, "I'll bet the President is not too busy to see white folks."

Before leaving the White House the fifth graders sang "We Shall Overcome" and "Ain't Gonna Let Nobody Turn Me Round."

(COAHR) had demonstrated before the Riviera Motel where members of the United Nations Subcommission of the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities were meeting. The group carried signs reading "Welcome To Atlanta, a Segregated City." Other protesters Friday night staged a four hour sit-in at the Segregated Travel Lodge Motel. There were no arrests.

During Saturday's demonstration, which ended after midnight, the Klan and protesters often picketed a few inches apart.

Two fist fights occurred, one involving Klansmen and police.

The protesters were joined by comedian Dick Gregory who flew into Atlanta from Chicago to join the demonstrations.

A special target of the sit-ins is Leb's Restaurant, where several demonstrators were jailed during last summer's demonstrations.

While marching, the demonstrators chanted "The old KK. she ain't what she used to be" while Klansmen yelled "We want a white Mayor."

RENT STRIKE ORGANIZED

WASHINGTON, D.C. - Tenants at a Girard Street tenement, assisted by SNCC workers, have organized a rent strike against property realtor David E. Barry because of poor conditions in their building.

All seven household heads in the building signed an agreement saying living conditions in the house are "unhealthy and not safe."

"When we paid our rent," the tenants said, "we expected services which the landlord has chosen to deny us. Before we resume payment of rent to the landlord at the present level, this apartment must be made sanitary and safe," the tenants said.

SNCC worker Bill Mahoney said "This is the first in the strides toward freedom of Washington Negroes. As long as slumlords don't supply services and repairs, and as long as they overcharge tenants, the tenants should assert their right not to pay rent."

The rent strike began when the landlord tried to evict a family of six. Fifteen members of the Nonviolent Action Group (NAG), the local SNCC affiliate, entered the apartment and prevented the eviction.

Mahoney said the landlord denied he was delinquent in making repairs, but was struck by water dripping from a ceiling when he left the building.

He collects $600 a month rent from the building.

Chapel Hill's image is a Fraud

A LONG LINE OF demonstrators in Chapel Hill, North Carolina protest the city's failure to pass a public accommodations law. Major demonstrations are expected here on February 1, anniversary of the birth of the sit-in drive.

Protests Continue In Chapel Hill

CHAPEL HILL, NORTH CAROLINA - Anti - segregation protests are continuing here with daily marches protesting the failure of the city's board of aldermen to pass a public accommodations ordinance.

Demonstrations were begun here before Christmas by the Congress of Racial Equality. Other groups joined the movement to form the Chapel Hill Freedom Committee, and local leaders are planning massive demonstrations on February 1, the fourth anniversary of the beginning of the student anti-segregation movement.

A civil rights leader from Danville, Virginia, the Rev. A. I. Dunlap, told a mass meeting crowd that Negroes elected North Carolina Governor Terry Sanford and "they ought to put him out."

Dunlap, head of the Danville Christian Progressive Association (DCPA) "served notice" on Governor Sanford that "he can send out all troops, call out the National Guard, but nobody is going to stop the movement in Chapel Hill."

Sanford promised last week to use his full resources to support the aldermen's refusal to yield to "pressures" from the Freedom Committee.

Demonstrators have been staging a sit-in in the aldermen's office since January 13, saying they are waiting for them to return to "take up unfinished business."

SNCC worker Avon Rollins announced from Danville that he and Mrs. Gloria Richardson, head of the Cambridge Nonviolent Action Committee and a member of the SNCC Executive Committee, were ready to assist protesters here.

CORE executive director James Farmer also indicated his group's support of integration efforts in Chapel Hill.

Over 250 people have been arrested since the current drive began.

STUDENTS PICKET GREENVILLE LIBRARY

GREENVILLE, MISSISSIPPI - Seventeen Negro students picketed the all-white public library here Saturday, January 26. They were led by Carol Bolton, SNCC worker.

After picketing the library, the group entered Greenville's white park and was asked to leave by a policeman.

During a trial of anti-segregation demonstrators here this summer, Greenville police chief Burnley said the park was integrated.

SNCC Asks Cancellation

JACKSON, MISSISSIPPI -SNCC has wired protests of the planned appearance of two government officials at a segregated meeting to be held here January 28.

SNCC Chairman John Lewis telegrammed James E. Webb, administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Agency (NASA), and Congressman George P. Miller, (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Science and Astronautics Committee that their presence would be an "embarrassment to the United States Government" and an "endorsement of the systematic segregation found throughout the state,"

Lewis urged Webb and Miller to cancel their appearance at the Jackson Chamber of Commerce "rather than force open protests in that city" upon their arrival.

The Chamber of Commerce meeting is closed to all except members of the state legislature, local officials and Chamber members, according to Mendel Davis, vice-president of the Chamber, Lewis reported.

"There are no Negroes in those positions," Lewis said, "because the state does not permit Negroes to vote in sufficient numbers to elect public officials. The Mississippi state legislature publicly supports a policy of segregation which includes inequality of employment."

The telegram continued "It is therefore inappropriate and inexcusable for officials of your stature to participate thereby indicating government approval, in the program of a body which openly opposes President Johnson's position on equality of employment."

WITNESS MURDERED

LIBERTY, MISSISSIPPI - A Negro who saw a state representative kill another Negro active in voter registration here almost three years ago was shotgunned to death Friday night, January 31.

Louis Allen of Route 2, Liberty was found dead in his front yard. He had been shot with a shotgun three times.

In Atlanta, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee asked the Justice Department for "a complete investigation of Allen's murder."

A week ago, Allen's son's car and a Liberty grocery that employed Negroes had been fired on.

Allen had witnessed the slaying of Herbert Lee, an Amite County farmer, at a Liberty cotton gin on September 26, 1961. Lee, who worked with SNCC vote workers in Amite County, was shot by E. H. Hurst, then a member of the state legislature. Hurst was acquitted by a coroner's jury before Lee's lifeless body was removed from the street outside the gin.

Allen, a witness to the killing, testified at the coroner's jury that freed Hurst, but later said he lied because he feared for his own safety. SNCC workers told officials of the United States Department of Justice he would change his testimony and tell the truth if protection was offered, but he was refused.

In February, 1963, Allen told a worker from the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee he saw Hurst shoot Lee without provocation. Allen said a Liberty law officer picked him up minutes after the shooting, drove him to the coroner's jury, and told him what so say on the stand. Allen was told to say Lee had threatened Hurst with a metal tire iron and that Hurst had killed him in self defense.

Allen had been warned that local whites were out to "get him."

In August, 1962 he was arrested and beaten by a Liberty

IN MISSISSIPPI —

SIX HELD INCOMMUNICADO; HATTIESBURG WORKER TRIED

JACKSON, MISS., January 31 -- Six persons have been moved from a jail in Canton, Mississippi to the Jackson city jail and are being held "incommunicado," according to workers for the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

The six were arrested in Canton over a three-day period from January 22 to 24 for "violation of the building code," "intimidating an officer," "disturbing the peace" and "contributing to the deliquency of a minor." Ten others arrested during that time are still held in the Madison County jail.

All of the arrested were engaged in anti-segregation activities under the auspices of the Council of Federated Organizations - a coordinating body of civil rights groups working in Mississippi.

HATTIESBURG, MISS. -- A voter registration worker for the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee was convicted here January 31 of "contributing to the delinquency of a minor."

Lawrence Guyot, 24, refused bond when he was arrested here January 27. Bond had been set at $1,000.

Guyot was sentenced to six months in jail, $500 fine with five months suspended and 30 days to be served. At state insistence a $500 peace bond was also lodged.

Presiding Judge William Haraldson told the court that Guyot "has willfully . . . taken advantage of children of his own race." This referred to his alleged action of urging children to stay out of school to picket.

Guyot stated in court that he had "never directly tried to influence anyone to stay out of school" and that his primary interest was voter registration.

Injunction Bans Vote Discrimination

AMERICUS, GEORGIA - Fifteen local white men - including seven public officials - have been permanently enjoined by a Federal court from interfering with voting and voter registration in Terrell County.

The Department of Justice sought the injunction in 1962 after more than a dozen armed white men broke into a voter registration meeting sponsored by the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) at the Mount Olive Baptist Church in Sasser.

The leader of the group, Terrell County Sheriff Z.T. Matthews, told reporters at the church meeting "We want our colored people to go on living like they have for the past 100 years. We're a little tired of this voting business."

The injunction was handed down by Federal Judge J. Robert Elliott on January 24.

The court order permanently enjoins the 15 "from interfering in any act or acts from the purpose of interfering with the right of any person to register or to vote for candidates to public office" and punishing any person for exercising the right to register and vote."

Matthews, deputies Matthews and R.M. Dunaway and Dawson Police Chief Waymon Cherry were enjoined from failing to furnish reasonable police protection for persons registering to vote and from "threatening" or "prosecuting" anyone who votes or tries to register to vote.

All defendants were enjoined from committing any act of violence against persons voting or registering to vote and from encouraging others to intimidate prospective voters.

Terrell County vote registrars, including Deputy Matthews were enjoined in 1960 from denying qualified voters the right to register.

Terrell County has a white population of 4,600 and a Negro population of 8,300. There are 2,935 registered white voters in the county in 1963, but only 100 Negro voters.

Night riders fired into the home of a Terrell County woman who had conducted vote classes and who had housed SNCC workers last year. The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee has maintained a voter registration drive in Terrell County and Southwest Georgia since 1961.

WASHINGTON D.C. -- Five year-old Ricky Schuler stands in the hallway of the $90.00 per month apartment from which his mother Mrs. Catherine Schuler was threatened with eviction when she complained about the condition of the apartment. Mrs. Schuler, mother of five, and members of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, refused to allow the eviction. The other tenants in the three-story building, supported her action and are now participating in a SNCC organized rent strike against realtor David E. Berry. The premises are at 1414 Girard Street, N.W.

U.S. Official Cancels Meeting

JACKSON, MISS --- The chief administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Agency refused to speak before a segregated meeting here January 28 in response to protests from the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

James Webb, head of NASA, and Congressman George P. Miller (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Science and Astronautics Committee, were scheduled to appear before a special welcome dinner for the Mississippi State Legislature sponsored by the Jackson Chamber of Commerce.

John Lewis, Chairman of SNCC wired Webb and Miller that it was "inappropriate and inexcusable" for government officials to honor a segregated meeting "thereby indicating government approval."

Lewis urged the space chiefs to cancel rather than to "cause open protest" in Jackson.

Negroes would not be permitted to attend the meeting Lewis said, because a meeting closed to all except members of the legislature, local officials and Chamber members necessarily excluded Negroes. "The state does not permit Negroes to vote in sufficient numbers to elect public officials," he stated.

Spokesmen for NASA confirmed Webb's decision with SNCC officials in Atlanta. "Mr. Webb does not intend to speak at a segregated meeting," stated Oakley B. Lloyd, Director of Public Information for NASA.

Several cancellations of scheduled appearances in Jackson have occurred in recent weeks because of this city's widespread segregation policies. Entertainers from "Hootenanny USA," a TV program, refused to appear at the segregated City Auditorium. Instead they appeared at a substitute concert at nearby Tougaloo College, and turned over $70, that was collected for use in bonding vote workers out of jail.

The Cartwright Family of the "Bonanza" TV series cancelled a similar appearance for the same reason.

POLICE SHOOT FOUR STUDENTS

JACKSON, MISS. -- Two SNCC workers and at least two other youths were hit by gunfire when police shot into a demonstration here February 3.

The shootings occurred when about 1,000 Negro students gathered at 10:00 P.M. to protest the earlier release of a white man whose automobile hit a student on an unlit section of Lynch Street. They were also protesting the police beating of three youths which took place shortly after the accident.

About 500 students from Jackson State College surrounded the scene of the late afternoon accident and observed police release the driver after short questioning. The student, a girl, was taken to Baptist Hospital and treated for a broken hip.

Students watched as police beat three youths while dispersing the crowd. Gil Moses, former student at Oberlin College and a reporter for the Mississippi Free Press, was hit by the butt end of a police rifle. Richard Murphy, a white youth who is also with the Free Press, was hit over the eye by police with a rifle and knocked to the ground. A third youth, James Jones, was roughed up by police. He is a student at Utica College in Mississippi.

Later in the evening SNCC workers passed out leaflets at a college basketball game calling for a protest demonstration.

About 1,000 students gathered after the game and began walking back and forth across the street, singing freedom songs and asking for installation of a traffic light. SNCC workers here report that a light has been requested from city authorities on several occasions.

Police tried to disperse the crowd by firing shots over the heads of the students. When a brick was thrown by someone on the sidelines toward police,

MINISTERS ARRESTED, DEMONSTRATIONS BANNED

HATTIESBURG, MISS. --- A state circuit judge issued a temporary injunction here January 29 to halt picketing, demonstrations and "acts calculated to cause a breach of the peace."

The injunction, asked by the City of Hattiesburg, was signed into effect by Judge Stanton A. Hall shortly after the arrest of nine ministers. The ministers are working with a Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee voter registration project here.

City officials claim that orderly demonstrations will be allowed as long as "restricted areas" are not involved. The ministers were arrested when they walked with picket signs encouraging voter registration directly in front of the courthouse - one of the restricted areas. The injunction had not yet been handed down.

These ministers replaced an earlier group of 50 who came in to support the January 22 Freedom Day here. They were charged with breach of the peace. Bond was set at $500 each. Another minister arrested the day before was charged with assault and battery and interfering with a police officer.

Four religious groups which are sponsoring the presence of clergymen here were named in the injunction. They are: The United Presbyterian Commission on Religion and Race; Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity; Rabbinical Association of America; and Presbyterian Interracial Council.

The jailed ministers are from Colorado, Illinois, Missouri, New Jersey and New York. They were invited to work on voter registration by SNCC and the Council of Federated Organizations. SNCC initiated vote projects in Mississippi in August 1961.

Open Records Says U.S. Court

GREENVILLE, MISSISSIPPI - United States District Judge Claude F. Clayton has ordered Sunflower County Circuit Clerk Cecil Campbell to open voter registration records for inspection within 20 days.

Field workers from SNCC have been active in registration efforts in Sunflower County.

The United States Department of Justice, in asking for the inspection said the registration records were necessary for a suit seeking injunction against the state of Mississippi charging interference with Negro registration attempts.

There are 31,020 Negroes in the county, home of Senator James O. Eastland (D.Miss.), but only 1.6% of the voting age Negroes are registered voters.

in Canton, claiming that their permits were faulty.

A Negro leader and gas station owner, who was earlier arrested for "burning trash without a permit," reported that his gas supply was cut off by the Amoco representative. The move was interpreted by rights workers here as "further reprisal against integration efforts."

Among the arrested in the recent crackdown on integration workers in Canton were Carole Merritt, 23-year-old SNCC worker from Cincinnati, Ohio, and Richard Jewitt, 30, a worker for the Congress of Racial Equality from New York City.

SNCC workers believe that Canton officials had the six persons moved to Jackson in connection with a bill recently passed by the state legislature which facilitates exchange on jail space and police numbers. They reported that two constables and another police cruiser were added to Canton law enforcement agencies at the time of the arrests.

Canton rights workers had been distributing leaflets which pressed for continuation of an effective boycott already underway. The circulars asked Negroes to withhold patronage from merchants who address Negro customers as "boy" or "nigger."

SNCC spokesmen have labeled the anti-circular law as "a clear violation of First Amendment rights guaranteed by he U.S. Constitution."

Sit-in Movement Marks Fourth Year

ATLANTA, GEORGIA - Demonstrations commemorating the fourth anniversary of the student sit-in movement were held in several cities across the nation.

In Atlanta, students-members of SNCC and the Committee on Appeal for Human Rights (COAHR) - continued demonstrations at segregated restaurants. The protesters said they were continuing demonstrations to show "there are people here who are not satisfied with segregation."

SNCC Chairman John Lewis and Executive Secretary James Forman joined the protest.

Other demonstrations were held in Chapel Hill, Boston, New York, Tuskegee, Detroit, and Fort Valley, Georgia.

has asked the SNCC and the Committee on Appeal for Human Rights to work on restaurant segregation.

Demonstrations here in recent weeks - marked by police mistreatment and Ku Klux Klan counter - picketing - have been sharply criticized by the two white daily papers here.

The Atlanta Constitution, however , has reversed an earlier stand and now favors a Federal public accommodations law.

Protests were halted for two days when over 150 demonstrators faced all day trials. Many were forced to remain in court until as late as midnight.

Attorney Howard Moore, lawyer for the jailed demonstrators, says he will summon Atlanta Mayor Ivan Allen Jr. and Police Chief Herbert Jenkins to court when trials are continued on February 4.

Allen had asked for a 30-day "cooling off" period during hich demonstrations would halt. The Summit leadership refused to halt the protests and instead, asked Allen to set the demonstrators in jail free. He refused to do so.

The Mayor called a meeting of some 200 community leaders last week to read them a statement deploring continued demonstrations and stressing that voluntary integration was possible here.

SCLC aide Wyatt Tee Walker responded "if we waited for voluntary action, most of us would still be picking cotton."

they began to shoot directly into the crowd. SNCC worker Jess Morris, 25, from Compton, California, was hit in the left arm and taken to University Hospital here.

A shot was lodged in the jacket of a 20-year-old SNCC worker from Greenwood, Mississippi. George Greene reported that his eyeglass case stopped the shot from penetrating his chest.

At least two others are known to have been injured by the gunfire. One of them, Hernan Frazile, an 18-year-old Jackson State College student, was also taken to University Hospital.

Workers in the Jackson SNCC office, two blocks from the scene of the demonstration, reported that the shooting lasted almost 30 minutes. By the end of that time all establishments on Lynch Street had been closed by police and police were patrolling the front of the SNCC office.

deputy sheriff who hit him with a flashlight, breaking his jaw.

Morris Allen of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, the dead man's brother, said Louis Allen had planned to leave Mississippi for good less than 24 hours after he was murdered. Morris Allen said their mother had died a week before, and that Louis Allen was to leave Liberty Saturday morning to come to Milwaukee to seek work.

The dead man told a reporter on February 12, 1963 that he'd been forced to testify falsely that Herbert Lee had threatened E. H. Hurst with a "tire iron."

"The morning when it (Lee's death) happened," Allen said then, "I came to the gin. I came on the highway where Hurst and this colored fellow (Lee) were arguing. Hurst looked at me and quieted down, but I could still hear him. I walked up the highway past the truck, behind, where I could see and hear. Lee hopped out on the passenger side. Hurst ran around the front. Hurst lowered the gun at him . . ."

"At the coroner's jury, they asked me about the piece of iron. I said I hadn't seen no iron. 'Is this the piece of iron?' I said 'yes'," Allen said. He said he had been forced to lie at a grand jury investigation also.

"If you'll give me protection, I'll let the hide go with the hair," Allen said. No protection came.

SNCC WORKER FOUND GUILTY

HATTIESBURG, MISS. - A white SNCC worker was sentenced to 120 days in jail and fined $380 and another vote worker has been sent to the county farm.

SNCC worker Peter Stoner, 26, was sentenced Friday, Feb. 6. He was charged with profanity, disturbing the peace and resisting arrest.

He was arrested Feb. 5 in front of the Forrest County jail by a jailer who said Stoner "raised a ruckus" when he was not allowed to visit SNCC worker Lawrence Guyot in the jail.

NO CLUES UNCOVERED IN ALLEN MURDER CASE

LIBERTY, MISS. - Sheriff Daniel Jones said this week he has failed to find "a single clue" in last weekend's shotgun slaying of a Negro who had seen another white man kill a Negro active in a vote drive.

"I've interviewed a lot of people but haven't come up with a thing yet" the sheriff said.

The body of Louis Allen, 44 was found early Saturday morning, Feb. 1 by his teenage son. He was dead from three shotgun blasts, two in his head.

The sheriff said several neighbors heard the blasts but "thought nothing of it."

He said Allen was killed as he stepped from his log truck to open a gate 150 yards from his house. The sheriff estimated the shots were fired from 30 feet away.

"I've known Allen for years" the sheriff said. "He was not involved in any civil rights activities."

Allen was a witness in the fatal shooting of Herbert Lee, a 52-year-old farmer gunned down outside a Liberty cotton gin in 1961.

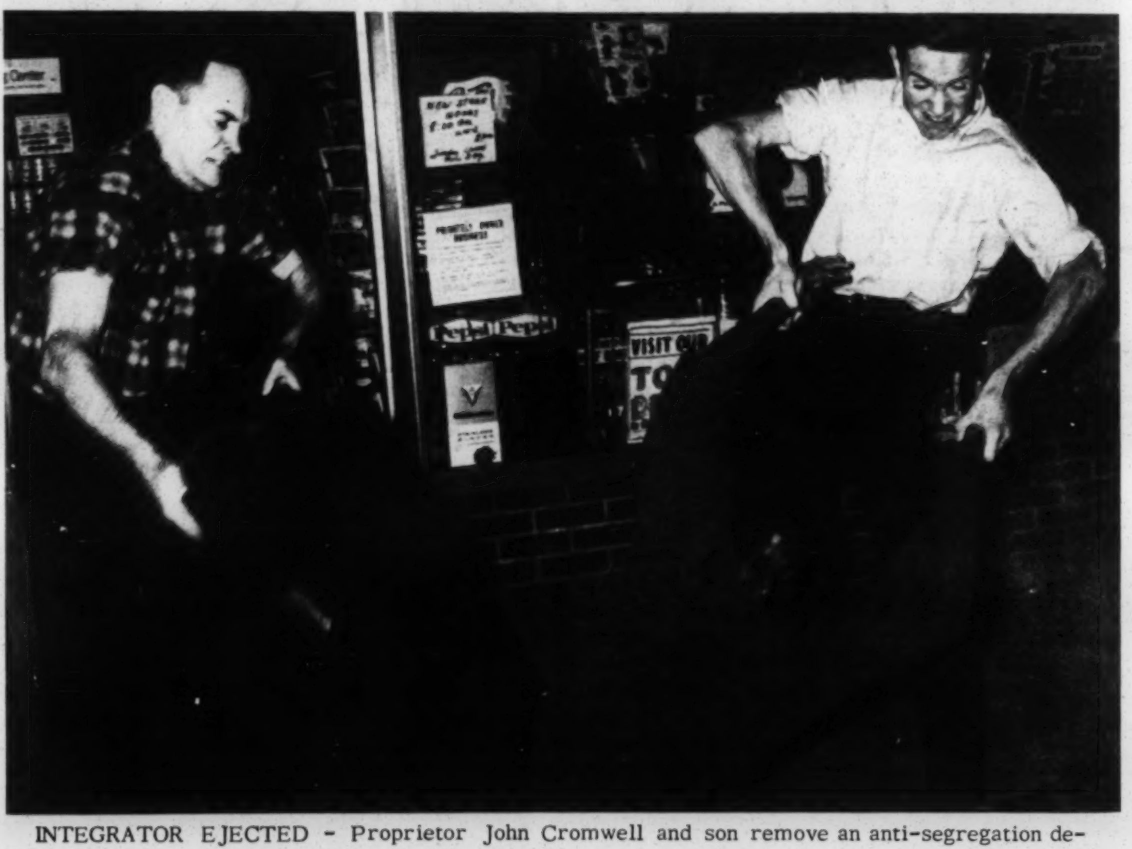
400 PROTEST IN CHAPEL HILL



INTEGRATOR EJECTED - Proprietor John Cromwell and son remove an anti-segregation demonstrator from his store in Chapel Hill on Jan. 29. Demonstrations here under the guidance of the Chapel Hill Freedom Committee - a coalition of local and national rights groups - have resulted in over 350 arrests.

120 Stage Sit-down

CHAPEL HILL, N.C. - Over 400 anti-segregation demonstrators marched through this small university town Feb. 8 and 120 staged a mid-street "sit-down."

Police ordered the street "sit-downers" to move on.

They did, but separated into five groups which staged further protests at four segregated eating places and the town hall. Five other groups of protesters blocked the three highways leading into Chapel Hill, and two other groups blocked cars at the University of North Carolina gymnasium where a basketball game was breaking up.

Another group later blocked traffic at the main intersection in Chapel Hill.

SNCC worker J.V. Henry said 98 arrests were made during the afternoon's demonstrations. Among those arrested was Avon Rollins, director of SNCC's Virginia project.

Demonstrations on Jan. 31 led to 75 arrests here, when 350 persons marched through the downtown area. More than 20 young people sat down at an intersection and unfolded signs protesting "candycoated racism."

A B-B gun was fired at the demonstrators but no serious injury resulted. A photographer had his camera forcibly taken away by two spectators. A large cherry bomb hurled at the marchers exploded, burning a spectator's leg.

A white professor from the University of North Carolina was struck by an onlooker at Carlton's Rockpile - a restaurant - the scene of ammonia-drenching earlier this month.

Two Rights Workers Arrested As Canton Continues Crackdown

Carole Merritt

CANTON, MISS. - Two more rights workers were arrested here Feb. 7 as Canton officials continue what Atlanta SNCC spokesmen have termed a "purge."

SNCC worker Claude Weaver, 20, and CORE worker Ed Hollander, 23, were arrested for "conspiracy to initmidate a family." Eleven others sentenced here Feb. 3 are still in jail due to high appeal bonds.

About 20 workers associated with the Council of Federated Organizations - an alliance of all civil rights groups working in this state - have been arrested since Jan. 22.

Nine of those tried Feb. 3 were convicted of two charges with $500 fine and six months for each charge. Appeal bond was set at $1,000.

Twenty-three year old SNCC worker Carole Merritt of Cincinnati, Ohio was found guilty of contributing to the delinquency of a minor and publishing libel. The charges referred to her encouragement of a 16-year-old girl to hand out leaflets pressing for an economic boycott and voter registration .

The others were convicted of publishing libel and disturbing the peace, or other charges arising from their participation in the voter registration and anti-segregation project here. One worker was convicted of three charges and is held under $1,500 appeal bond.

Earlier charges of distributing leaflets without a permit were changed at the trial - at which Negroes were allowed to sit only on the "colored" side of the courtroom.

SNCC workers report several incidents of police "intimidation" of persons working with the civil rights drive here, and the "blacklisting" of a Negro prominent in the local integration effort. George Washington reported that the gas pumps of the filling station he owns were removed by the Amoco representative.

On Jan. 30 police halted all Negro taxicabs claiming their permits were faulty.

Allen later admitted to SNCC workers he had lied at a coroner's jury investigating the slaying, which set free E. H. Hurst, a white man, then a member of the Mississippi State Legislature.

Allen's brother, Morris Allen of Milwaukee, Wis., said his brother had been harassed by local policement since he witnessed the Lee killing. He had been arrested twice, and once a deputy sheriff broke his jaw with a flashlight.

Morris Allen said his brother had decided to leave Mississippi to seek work in Milwaukee.

The SNCC conducted a vote drive in Southwest Mississippi in 1961.

Herbert Lee, the man whose killing Allen witnessed, was one of several local Negroes active in the drive.

SNCC has asked the United States Department of Justice to investigate the Allen murder.

Friends Send Food, Clothes

BOSTON, MASS. - Over 20,000 pounds of food and clothing have been sent to Ruleville, Miss. by Friends of SNCC here.

Dorothy Zellner, SNCC Boston coordinator, said the success of the drive "dramatically shows the sympathy people in the Greater Boston community have for the disenfranchised and dispossessed Negroes of the Mississippi Delta."

The food and clothing shipped to Mississippi was collected in 31 towns in and around Boston.

Mrs. Zellner said another 10,000 pounds would be shipped to the South in a few weeks.

'OPEN' ATLANTA STILL CLOSED

ATLANTA, GEORGIA -- Atlanta has long enjoyed a reputation as a liberal center of the South, where peaceful negotiations have solved racial problems.

A glance at actual desegregation here reveals that most integration has come through direct action, boycotts or the courts.

In 1955, a Federal court ordered the city's golf courses to integrate. A suit was filed against the city's segregated school system in 1958.

A Federal court ordered the busses desegregated in 1959, and another court ordered Georgia State College here desegregated that same year.

In 1960, a Federal court ordered an airport restaurant integrated. Sit-in demonstrations began this year also.

In 1961, 177 lunch counters in 77 stores integrated after massive demonstrations, jail-ins and a boycott.

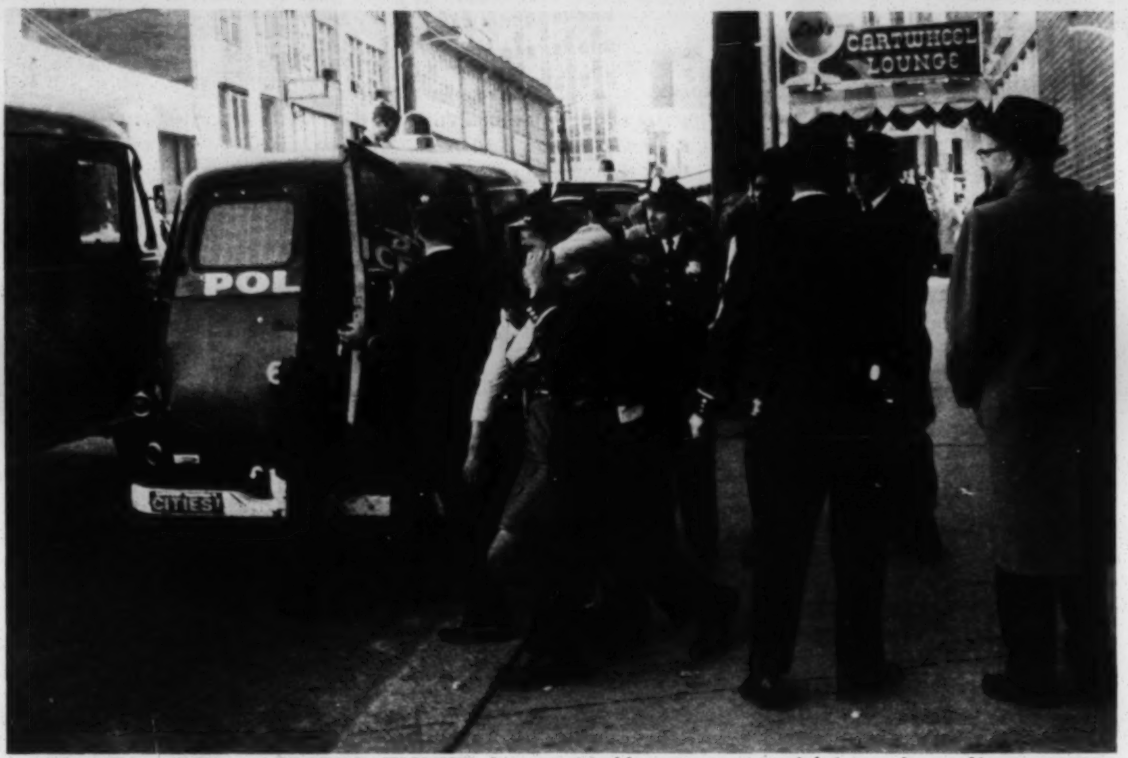
The Interstate Commerce Commission ruled bus terminals must integrate, and one Atlanta terminal eating place integrated a year later after demonstrations.

The city tennis courts closed in 1961 rather than admit Negroes.

In 1962, the city was required to drop all segregation ordinances by a Federal court.

Downtown theaters integrated after students threatened demonstrations.

"Atlanta, despite its national image as a leader in Southern race relations, actually lags behind several other Southern cities in desegregation of hotels, restaurants and schools, and in employment of Negroes in non-menial positions," the Atlanta Constitution admitted in November, 1963.



ATLANTA ARCH -- SEGREGATIONIST Lester Maddox, (extreme right) watches police arrest demonstrators. On Jan. 26, as students were being placed in police wagons, Maddox, an unsuccessful candidate for Lieutenant Governor said, "I sure am glad to see this."

RESISTANCE MOUNTS

ATLANTA, GA. - Anti - segregation protesters here are facing increased resistance from restaurant owners in their battle to make Atlanta an "open city."

Protesters at one eating place under attack from SNCC workers have had to face electric cattle prodders, knives and axe handles wielded by restaurant workers.

One demonstrator, SNCC worker Joyce Barrett, 25, was knocked to the ground by a white man on Feb. 8.

At the Georgian Hotel, a manager ordered the protesters away at gun point, and a bellboy chased demonstrators with a plank.

SNCC worker Debbie Amis was burned twice with a cattle prod at Harry's Steak House, Feb. 7.

The Atlanta Summit Leadership Conference, a coalition of groups here, has voted acceptance of an action plan presented to the group last week.

The plan calls for increased adult participation in anti-segregation protests, carried on by high school and college students up until now.

Demonstrations here have been aimed solely at public accommodations, but protest leaders say they will attempt to secure jobs, better schooling and housing conditions for Negroes also.

Twenty-nine protesters, indicted by county grand jury, are facing trial this week.

They will appear before Superior Court Judge Durwood T. Pye, the same judge who held the Rev. Ashton Jones under $20,000 bail until the Georgia Supreme Court ordered the bail lowered. (see Jones story)

Pye has insisted upon approving all bonds himself, a practice required by law but not normally followed. One demonstrator, Rev. Joseph Boone, was arrested at his home at 5:00 A.M. Feb. 8.

SNCC NEEDS FUNDS FOR CARS

John Lewis, Chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, issued a call this week for "SNCC supporters and lovers of civil rights everywhere" to donate funds to SNCC to purchase cars.

"Our staff members cannot continue voter registration work in Mississippi and Alabama without good cars," he said.

SNCC GETS EQUAL TIME

ATLANTA, GA. -- SNCC has demanded - and received - "equal time" from an Atlanta television station.

The station, WAGA-TV, presented an editorial criticizing protest demonstrations here and saying "it is no longer a matter of right or wrong."

SNCC protested under the Federal Communication Commission's "Fairness Doctrine" and received equal time - three prime time editorial spots - to reply.

REV. JONES SOON TO BE RELEASED

ATLANTA, GA. - Rev. Ashton Jones, held in an Atlanta jail under high bail since August 28, 1963, may be free soon. Jones was held under a $20,000 appeal bond set by Superior Court Judge Durwood T. Pye, until the Georgia Supreme Court ruled the bail was too high.

Pye set a new bail of $5,000 - the Supreme Court's maximum. The elderly minister, jailed here when he tried to integrate a white-only church, may be released if Pye accepts a bank certificate presented Feb. 7 by Attorney Howard Moore, Jr. Judge Pye refused to accept a $5,000 cash bail for Rev. Jones.

Comedian Dick Gregory, in Atlanta last week to participate in the anti-segregation drive, said Jones' time in jail was "Atlanta's shame."

The 67-year-old clergyman is a native of Georgia.

D.C. SLUM TENANTS PROTEST DECISION

WASHINGTON, D.C. - A rent strike picket at the Bureau of Housing Licenses and Inspection here on Jan. 30 protested a decision against a slum tenant who refused to pay rent.

The pickets demanded the bureau start rent control, statutory tenancies, more low-cost housing, and that the city "do its job" in enforcing building code violations against slum landlords.

The demonstrators, all slum tenants, threaten not to pay their rent and predict "major district-wide rent strike if the city does not take action."

Mrs. Shuler's case will be appealed from the Landlord-Tenant Court of General Sessions.

300 STUDENTS DEMONSTRATE

TUSKEGEE, ALA. - Over 300 Negro students staged a protest march on Tuskegee Institute's campus Feb. 6 and promised further demonstrations.

Student leaders have asked Tuskegee's City Council for improvements in Negro sections of the city, and for compliance with Federal orders integrating the schools here.

Student leaders said their complaints included grievances about street lighting, paving and garbage collecting in Negro neighborhoods.

PROTESTER GOES LIMP in Chapel Hill on Jan. 30. Integration drives here have been met by increased resistance from businessmen. Ammonia and beatings have been used to deter demonstrator who are pressing for an "open city" here.

Richardson Testifies At Federal Hearing

WASHINGTON, D.C. - Gloria Richardson, head of the Cambridge (Md.) Nonviolent Action Committee (CNAC) and a member of the SNCC Executive Committee said the Cambridge Human Relations Committee was "a waste of people's time."

Mrs. Richardson, who presented a three page report on the committee's inactivity, said street demonstrations may be resumed in 10 days time.

Senator Daniel M. Brewster (D-Md.), who convened the two hour hearing that brought state and Federal officials together to discuss Cambridge's racial troubles, said the Human Relations Committee would "step up efforts" to ease racial tensions in Cambridge.

KLAN BEATS MISS. NEGRO

NATCHEZ, MISS. - A local Negro undertaker was stripped and beaten by hooded members of the Ku Klux Klan late Saturday night, Feb. 15.

The undertaker, Archie Curtis, was lured to a deserted section near the city by an unidentified caller who told him a friend's wife was suffering from a heart attack, SNCC worker Julius Samstein said.

Samstein said Curtis was given directions tc a rural road and told that a "man with a lantern" would meet him and take him to the house where the heart attack victim was located.

When Curtis and an unidentified companion arrived at the road they were ordered at pistol point to leave their car.

They were taken, blindfolded to Duck Pond Road near an oil field and asked to show NAACP membership cards. Samstein said the hooded men told Curtis he was "a NAACP nigger." He was also asked to produce NAACP membership lists, Samstein said.

Both Negroes were forced to strip and were beaten with a strap.

They were then returned to their car and released.

Minister to be Removed

ALBANY, GA. - A Southwest Georgia Negro minister, an active participant in the anti-segregation drive here, has been notified he is being removed from his job at the Albany Marine Corps Supply Center.

The minister, the Reverend Samuel B. Wells, a sandblaster at the supply center, received a letter from Supply Center Commanding General Tyler informing him "it is proposed to remove you from your present position with the Federal service." The letter said removal proceedings were begun against Wells because of "conduct unbecoming a Federal employee in that you committed perjury."

In Atlanta, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) protested the proposed dismissal and asked Marine Corps Commandant Lieutenant General Wallace M. Green Jr.

Movement Secretary to be Tried

MACON, GA. - Mrs. Eliza Jackson will go to trial here Feb. 24 in United States District Court for perjury.

Mrs. Jackson, recording secretary of the Albany (Ga.) Movement, is one of nine Albany civil rights leaders indicted for perjury and conspiracy by a Federal grand jury.

Rev. Samuel Wells

Mrs. Eliza Jackson

The indictments grew out of a grand jury investigation of charges by a white Albany grocer that a half-hour picket line before his store was an attempt to intimidate him because he had served on a jury that had failed to convict a Baker County sheriff of shooting a Negro.

The grocer, Carl Smith, protested to the United States Department of Justice. A grand jury was convened and nine prominent leaders of the Albany rights drive were indicted. They are:

Mrs. Jackson; Slater King, acting president of the Albany Movement; Dr. W.G. Anderson, former Albany Movement head; the Rev. Samuel Wells, a board member of the Albany Movement: Thomas Chatmon, a local businessman and Movement board member; Robert Colbert and Luther Woodall, two youths active in the Albany demonstrations; Robert Thomas, an active participant in the Albany demonstrations and Joni Rabinowitz, a white field worker for the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC).

King and Wells, both tried in Nov. 1963 were sentenced Dec. 23, 1963 to a year and a day in prison. Chatmon and Thomas were given suspended sentences and placed on five years probation. Colbert also received a suspended sentence. Dr. Anderson's trial ended in a mistrial. The heaviest sentence was levied against Miss Rabinowitz, now a student at Antioch College, who was placed in the jurisdiction of the United States Attorney General. The length of her sentence will be determined by the United States Parole Board; it must be

Food, Clothes Sent To Miss.

RULEVILLE, MISS. - Ten tons of food and clothing were distributed here on Lincoln's Birthday to disposessed families in Leflore and Sunflower Counties.

The shipment, which arrived by truck, was collected by the New England Friends of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) in 31 towns in and around Boston, Mass.

Food and clothing distribution is part of SNCC's program in Mississippi and "an attempt to deal with reprisals from local officials when voter registration drives are underway" a SNCC worker said.

SNCC Chairman John Lewis said "many Negro Mississippians lose their jobs and homes each year because they try to vote."

TEN TONS OF FOOD AND CLOTHING arrive in Ruleville, Miss., or Negroes facing reprisals because of their activity in the voter egistration drive.

The food and clothing, collected by the New England Friends of SNCC, will be distributed to families in Lefore and Sunflower Counties.

Robert Moses, head of Mississippi voter registration for SNCC and director of the Council of Federated Organizations (COFO), protested the beatings in a telegram to Attorney General Robert Kennedy.

"We demand immediate action by the Federal Government to protect Negro citizens," Moses told Kennedy.

In Atlanta, SNCC Chairman John Lewis asked President Johnson to "act immediately to halt intimidation and beatings of Negro Mississippians."

Samstein said Saturday's beating was the fourth in the past week. A Negro was forced to strip and was soaked in motor oil before being beaten in nearby Amite County, scene of the murder of Louis Allen on Feb. 1 Samstein said.

more than three months and could be four years.

All of the sentences are being appealed. Lawyers for the Albany nine have charged that the jury which convicted them was not representative. Although Negroes comprise 34% of the population of the Middle Federal District of Georgia, where the court is located, only 5% of those chosen for jury duty were Negroes.

The white grocer's charges sparked the most active and vigorous investigation by the Federal Government ever witnessed by rights workers in Southwest Georgia. At least 35 FBI agents investigated his claims.

and Secretary of Defense Robert S. McNamara to "do everything in your power to insure that Reverend Wells is not being fired because of his participation in the civil rights movement."

Wells, and eight other members of the Albany Movement have been indicted on perjury and conspiracy charges by the Federal Government. Wells was convicted, and on Dec. 23, 1963, sentenced to a year and a day in prison. His conviction has been appealed.

His indictment, and the charges against the eight others, - resulted from charges by a white Albany grocer, Carl Smith, that members of the Albany Movement conspired to injure him after he served on a Federal jury that refused to convict a Southwest Georgia sheriff accused of shooting a Negro. Wells was accused of perjuring himself before the grand jury that investigated Smith's charges.

Wells has received a hearing before an administrative board but has not learned the hearing's results. If they rule against him, he will lose his job but may appeal to the Secretary of the Navy.

Wells, 49, was born in Lee County, Georgia. He is second vice - president of the Albany Movement, and serves as pastor of Blue Springs Baptist Church in Worth County and William Springs Baptist Church near Albany. He has been arrested at least 10 times because of his participation in the Albany rights drive. He is married and has four children , ages 12 to 15. A veteran, he was discharged from the Army with a good conduct medal in 1947.

SNCC WORKERS EXAMINE syrup poured into a vote worker's car while Hattiesburg, Miss. police had possession of it. The United States Department of Justice had been asked to investigate the car's sabotage.

SABOTAGE IN HATTIESBURG

HATTIESBURG, MISS. - Local police have either put syrup in a civil rights worker's gas tank or have let someone else do it, according to SNCC workers here.

Luther Houce, 17, of Hattiesburg was arrested Feb. 11, for speeding. He paid a $9.50 fine and was released. Police impounded his car during the period he was in jail.

Workers Convicted

SELMA, ALA. - Two young civil rights workers - arrested here on the Dallas County Courthouse steps as they carried signs urging Negroes to register to vote - were convicted Feb. 13 of "unlawful assembly."

The two were part of a group of 24 jailed during an Oct. 7, 1963 "Freedom Day," drive in Selma. The two, David Murray and Fred Moss, were released under $500 appeal bond each. Murray was convicted here two weeks ago on charges on "distributing illegal boycott literature."

Negroes Enter Primary

SELMA, ALA. - Two leaders of the Selma voter registration drive have qualified to run for city council position in the March 17 Democratic primary.

They are James E. Gildersleeve, a teacher at Lutheran Academy, and the Reverend Frederick D. Reese, pastor of Macedonia Baptist Church.

They are the first Negroes to seek public office in Selma since Reconstruction.

Workers from the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) began a voter registration drive here in 1962. Only .9% of the voting age Negroes in Dallas County are registered voters.

SIXTY-FIVE STAGE SCHOOL WALKOUT

CHAPEL HILL, N.C. - Sixty-five students staged a one-day walkout from a Chapel Hill high school on Feb. 14.

The students, forbidden to pass out leaflets or talk about "Freedom" on school grounds, attended a "Freedom School" during the day.

Musial Asked To Cancel Banquet Appearance

ATLANTA, GA. - The Chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) has asked baseball star Stan Musial to cancel a Feb. 24 appearance in Jackson, Miss.

Musial was named head of the President's Committee on Physical Fitness on Feb. 14 by President Lyndon B. Johnson.

"Your participation in this gathering which excludes Negro citizens of the state of Mi[illegible]ppi would be an affr[illegible] to them," SNCC Chairm[illegible] John Lewis told Musial [illegible]etter.

Lewis said the Feb. [illegible]agement, sponsor[illegible] by th[illegible] Touchdown Club[illegible] white group, wou[illegible]pen to Negroes.

Atlanta Group Calls Boycott

ATLANTA, GA. - Two large groups of professional men and women demonstrated Saturday afternoon, Feb. 15, to reinforce a call for a "Sacrificial Easter" issued by the Atlanta Summit Leadership Conference.

The day before, a delegation of Negro ministers visited the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce to ask members of the city's "power structure" to make Atlanta an open city.

The professional groups, doctors, dentists and teachers in the Atlanta University Center, marched through downtown Atlanta and around Grady Hospital.

Pickets at Grady carried signs reading "Members of Atlanta University's faculty protest segregation."

The Summit group, a coalition of local and national civil rights groups, has urged Negroes to boycott downtown stores.

Canton Rights Workers Fined

CANTON, MISS. - Two civil rights workers jailed here last week have been sentenced to six months in jail, fined $500 and are being held under $500 appeal bond.

The two, Claude Weaver of SNCC and Ed Hollander of CORE, were charged with "intimidating a family."

Their arrest brought to 11 the total number of civil rights workers held in Canton's jail. Among them is Carole Merritt, a SNCC worker from Cincinnati.

Cash Bail Rejected For Reverend Jones

ATLANTA, GA. - A Fulton County Superior Court Judge has rejected $5,000 in cash offered as bail to free an elderly white man held behind bars in Atlanta since Aug. 28, 1963.

Superior Court Judge Durwood T. Pye said state law requires an appeal bond be made with unencumbered real estate.

Pye, who tried and sentenced the minister, the Reverend Ashton Bryant Jones of San Gabriel Cal., had originally set the 67-year-old clergyman's bail at $20,000.

The Georgia Supreme Court ordered it reduced last month. Pye set a new bail at $5,000, the maximum allowed by the court.

Jones was arrested here last summer when he and two Negro teenagers tried to enter all-white First Baptist Church of Atlanta. He was sentenced to 12 months in prison, six months on the public works, and fined $5000.

His time in jail since Aug. 28 - nearly six months - is "dead time" an attorney said, since he is appealing his sentence and it will not be counted in his favor.

The church where Reverend Jones was arrested has since voted to accept Negroes.

Restaurant Integrates, Withdraws Injunction

PINE BLUFF, ARK. - A Pine Bluff branch of the nationwide McDonald's eatery chain has integrated less than a week before a scheduled hearing to determine whether an injunction sought by the owner against racial demonstrations should be made permanent.

William Hansen, head of the Arkansas Project of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), said the injunction was now dismissed.

William Knight, the owner of McDonald's here, had obtained the court order after two weeks of antisegregation protests.

It names SNCC, the NAACP and the Black Muslims and barred them from sponsoring integration drives aimed at the business.

GREENVILLE SCHOOL BOYCOTTERS EXPELLED

GREENVILLE, MISS. - Twenty students at all-Negro Greenville High School who tried to clebrate Lincoln's Birthday have been expelled. After being told they could not reenter Greenville High, five of the students tried to enroll in Greenville's high school.

They were met by the Greenville Superintendent of Schools who told them he would "have to speak with their parents."

ATLANTA, GA. - An 18-year-old white girl, a student at Connecticut College for Women, was sentenced here Feb. 20 to six months in the common jail and 12 months on the public works.

She was fined $1,000. Her appeal bond was set at $15,000.

The girl, Mardon Walker, formerly an exchange student at Spelman College here, was arrested during a Jan. 13 sit-in attempt at a segregated restaurant.

She was charged with violation of Georgia's trespass law, passed in 1960 after student anti-segregation demonstrations began.

The judge, Fulton County Superior Court Judge Durwood T. Pye, requires that appeal bonds be posted with unencumbered-property located in Fulton County.

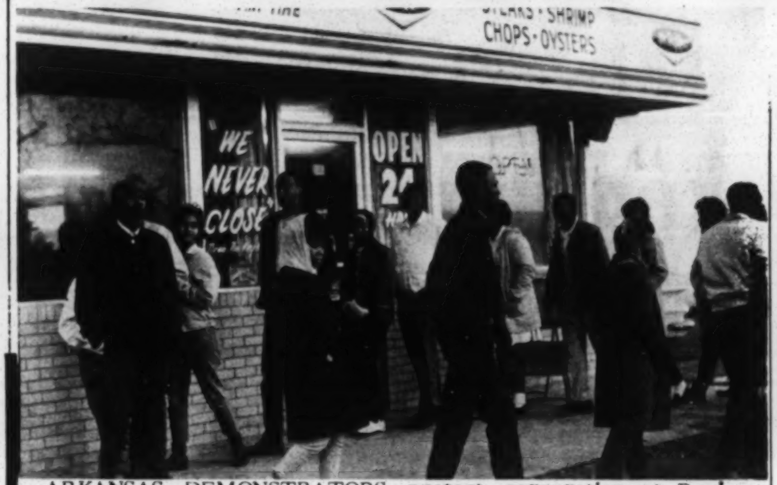
LEADERS CALL 72 HOUR TRUCE



ARKANSAS DEMONSTRATORS protest segregation at Ray's Barbecue, where comedian Dick Gregory and SNCC worker William Hansen were jailed Feb. 18.

Dick Gregory Released From Jail

PINE BLUFF, ARK. - Anti-segregation demonstrations have have halted here for 72 hours while mediators attempt to negotiate a settlement between Ray's Barbecue and members of the Pine Bluff Movement.

Dick Gregory, jailed with SNCC Arkansas Project Director William Hansen on Feb. 17, left the Phillips County jail to make contact with Federal officials and to complain about jail conditions.

"Its like somebody's secret torture chamber," Gregory said.

Demonstrations began here on Feb. 17, when Hansen and Gregory were jailed.

On Feb. 18, 15 people were jailed, and crowds of whites - some identified by newsmen as "professional segregationists" - began to gather at the segregated eating place.

SNCC worker James Jones was punched by a state trooper..

On Feb. 19, 39 others were jailed.

Reverend Benjamin Grinnage, chairman of the Pine Bluff Movement, was fired at during a demonstration on the evening of Feb. 20.

A group of protesters were met by two white men, one - who identified himself as the owner - carrying a 12 gauge shotgun and one carrying a .38 caliber pistol.

The owner told the group "I am the owner. This is private property. Why do you want to integrate me? If you come up on the sidewalk, I'll shoot you. I'm a mental patient, I've killed 1,000 Japs. God didn't mean for it to be like this."

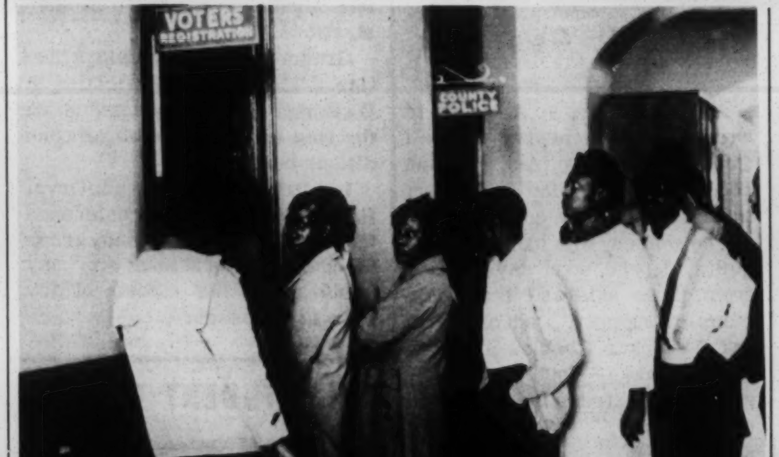
100 REGISTER IN SOUTHWEST GEORGIA FREEDOM DAY



Albany citizens attempt to register at courthouse

SOUTHWEST GEORGIA - A four-county "Freedom Day" Feb. 22 has resulted in "at least 100" attempts to register to vote here.

Vote attempts were made in Terrell, Sumter and Dougherty Counties. In Lee County, where registration books were closed, 150 Negroes gathered at New Piney Grove Baptist Church for a vote rally.

Like Hattiesburg, Mississippi's Jan. 22 Freedom Day, Southwest Georgia's was a victory.

"We have never picketed and leafleted downtown without having arrests before today" SNCC's Southwest Georgia project head Charles Sherrod said in Albany.

COURT HEARS THEIR PLEA -Tougaloo College coeds Ida Hannah, Bette Poole and Julie Zaugg began kneel-in attempts at segregated Jackson churches. They have appealed to the Federal courts in attempt to halt police arresting church integration attempts.

Court To Rule On Police Backed Bias

JACKSONVILLE, FLA. - The United States Fifth Court of Appeals has taken "under consideration" a request made last week to stop Jackson, Miss. police from interfering with attempts to integrate all-white churches.

Attorneys for three students at Tougaloo College arrested in Oct. 1963 during kneel - in demonstrations argued that police powers cannot be used to enforce segregation.

The three, Bette Poole of Chicago, Ida Hannah of Carthage, Mississippi, both Negroes, and Julie Zaugg, white, of Lake Forrest, Ill., were sentenced to a year in prison and fined $1,000.

The defense attorneys argued that a church is a public place and the state cannot use its powers to enforce segregation there.

A white native of Atlanta, who tried to integrate a church there last summer, is still being held in jail under a $5,000 bail. The Reverend Ashton Jones, a 67-year old minister, has been in an Atlanta jail since Aug. 28, 1963.

Sit-ins Begin In Maryland

PRINCESS ANNE, MD. - Anti-segregation protests sponsored by the Student Appeal for Equality (SAFE) at Maryland State College here are growing despite a lack of police protection.

During Feb. 21 sit in SAFE leader John Wilson was "roughed up" by white youths at a segregated restaurant here.

Gloria Richardson, head of the nearby Cambridge Nonviolent Action Committee (CNAC) indicated "all Eastern Shore restaurants are supposed to be integrated."

Mrs. Richardson, a member of SNCC's Executive Committee, said she would join the Princess Anne protests.

Registration Up Since Food, Clothes Arrive

RULEVILLE, MISS. -Since 10 tons of food and clothing - shipped here by the Greater Boston Friends of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee - were distributed last Tuesday, Feb. 11, over 300 people have tried to register to vote.

SNCC worker Charles McLaurin said another 150 Negroes were eager to go but were hindered by a lack of transportation.

McLaurin, and SNCC worker Charlie Cobb, said conditions here are "most desperate."

Cobb said in one area of Sunflower County, home of Senator James O. Eastland, "many people are without clothes and some are starving."

Canton Workers Out On Bond

CANTON, MISS. - Two civil rights workers who were jailed Feb. 7 on a charge of "conspiracy to intimidate a family" were released Friday, Feb. 21 with others held here.

Appeal bond for the two-Claude Weaver, 20, a Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) worker, and Ed Hollander, 23, of the Congress of Racial Equality - was set at $500 each, property or surety.

At the Feb. 10 trial they were accused of telling a Canton woman that if she accepted employment in a store under boycott, they would "harm" her six-year old child.

Weaver a former Harvard University student from Atlanta, testified that he and Hollander had not left their residence at the time they were accused of threatening the woman.

Since Jan. 22, more than 20-odd civil rights and voter registration workers have been arrested in Canton on charges ranging from "burning trash without a permit" to "publishing libel."

Atlanta SNCC spokesman have termed the Canton arrests a "purge, since virtually all SNCC and CORE workers who have gone into the city have been arrested, one by one."

Most of the charges have centered around an economic boycott called by rights workers against merchants who insist on addressing Negro customers as "boy" or "nigger."

Cooperative Set Up In S.W. Georgia

ALBANY, GA. - A group of women from nearby Terrell County have organized a sewing cooperative and plan to support themselves selling quilts.

The women, who hand make the quilts, depend upon any revenue from their sale as "their only mens of support," according to SNCC worker Charles Sherrod.

"This area - Southwest Georgia - is extremely depressed economically," a SNCC worker said.

Orders for the quilts, which start at $17.00, may be directed to Charles Sherrod at the Albany SNCC office, 504 South Madison Street, Albany, Georgia.

BASEBALL STAR CANCELS MEETING

JACKSON, MISS. - Former baseball star Stan Musial has canceled an appearance at a segregated meeting scheduled for Fbe. 24.

Musial, now director of the President's Committee on Physical Fitness, told the members of the Jackson Touchdown Club his new duties with the President's Committee forced him to cancel the date.

John Lewis, Chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) had asked the St. Louis Cardinals vice-president to cancel in a letter.

Musial's message to the touchdown Club made no mention of Lewis' request.

SNCC workers in Jackson were told no Negroes could attend the Touchdown Club's Hall of Fame dinner, at which Musial was to be the featured speaker.

In recent weeks, several other prominent persons have canceled Jackson appearances because of the city's segregation policies.

Pianist Gary Graffman, scheduled to make a Feb. 29 appearance in Jackson, has also announced he will cancel.

Graffman canceled after protests from the Cultural and Artistic Committee at Tougaloo Southern Christian College, headed by Tougaloo student Austin Moore.

Other groups that have canceled include trumpeter Al Hirt, the Hootenanny show, NASA's James Webb, and stars of tv's "Bonanza" and "Beverly Hillbillies" shows.

MISSISSIPPI STAFF TO BEGIN TOUR

ATLANTA, GA. - Seven members of the Mississippi SNCC staff will begin fund raising and speaking tours "across the country" to raise funds for a summer project in Mississippi, according to SNCC Northern Coordinator Dinky Romilly.

Miss Romilly, who coordinates fund raising activities for SNCC, said the four will handle three geographic regions; the East and West Coasts and the Midwest.

"Interested people who would like to sponsor a speaker to raise needed funds for the summer project are urged to contact me at the Atlanta office immediately," Miss Romilly said.

WE NEED YOUR HELP NOW!

ATLANTA, GA. - "SNCC needs funds now more than ever before" SNCC Chairman John Lewis said.

Lewis said SNCC was asked "friends and supporters to pledge a monthly contribution to SNCC." He suggested $1.00 per month for students and $5.00 per month for adults.

"The $1.00 month contribution is about 3 1/2 cents a day for freedom," Lewis said.

SNCC workers direct voter registration and action projects in Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Mississippi, North Carolina and Virginia.

The anti-segregation group depends entirely on voluntary contributions for operating expenses, Lewis said.

"Pledges for freedom will help us through the year," he added.

I pledge $________ to the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

integration attempt last summer. The state Supreme Court ordered Pye to set Reverend Jones' appeal bond at not higher than $5,000. Reverend Jones is still behind bars, however, because Judge Pye, who reset his bail at the $5,000 maximum, refused to accept $5,000 in cash to free the minister.

Miss Walker, who was indicted by a grand jury after her January arrest, complained she was beaten by white female prisoners in the county jail during her last arrest. She had asked Carl Smithwick, the Fulton County jail warden, to place her in solitary confinement for her own protection.

Judge Pye was obviously angered by a petition filed in U.S. District Court here Feb. 17 to remove 17 sit-in cases to Federal jurisdiction. The judge sentenced a character witness for Miss Walker to 20 days in jail for contempt of court after the witness, Melvin V. Drimmer, a Spelman College history professor, was accused by the judge of making remarks insulting to the court.

Miss Walker is the third white person given the maximum sentence in a racial case by Judge Pye.

Reverend Jones and Tom Taylor Tolg, a 24-year-old white college student from Ohio, are the two. Tolg is free on appeal bond.

Trials for 28 others, mostly Negroes, have been rescheduled for March 2.

High Court Hears Boycott Case

WASHINGTON, D.C. - The United States Supreme Court heard arguments on Thursday, Feb. 20 in defense of a worker for the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) charged with encouraging a student boycott at Southern University in Baton Rouge, La.

SNCC worker Dion T. Diamond was arrested Feb. 1, 1962 after two days of speaking on the Southern University campus. He was charged with trespassing, vagrancy and disorderly conduct." Charges of "criminal anarchy," carrying a maximum ten-year sentence, were later placed against him, and he was held for 59 days under a $7,000 bond in the Baton Rouge Parish jail.

Two SNCC workers who tried to visit him there were also charged with "criminal anarchy."

in each county:

Terrell County: Over 40 Negroes went to register in Dawson, where pickets urged Negroes to register. There were no arrests.

Sumter County: Over 60 have attempted to register in the past three weeks, and on Freedom Day, voter registration pickets and leafleteers were downtown most of the day. There were no arrests.

Doughterty County: Leafleting and picketing were carried on downtown and an afternoon rally was held. Two pickets walked in front of the county courthouse, two across the street, and four at city hall. There were no arrests.

Lee County: Registration books were closed, but during the past three weeks, many have tried to register. An evening mass meeting was held here, well attended by 150 Negroes. "It was a real victory," a participant said.

In a surprise move, 25 jailed members of the "Quebec - Washington - Guantanamo Peace Walk" were released from the Albany jail Saturday afternoon Feb. 22. They had been in and out of the jail for several weeks, after they refused to adhere to a parade route set out by Albany Police Chief Laurie Pritchett.

Their release was viewed as another victory here.

The Albany story - and the history of the voter registration drive in Southwest Georgia - has been one of denial of the right to picket, the right to distribute leaflets, and the right to organize.

SNCC workers have had to contend with arrests and intimidations from local policemen in their three- year fight to register Negro voters.

Just as on Hattiesburg's Freedom Day, SNCC workers here Feb. 22 were "allowed" to exercise their rights by local law officers.

MAYHEM IN MISS.

NATCHEZ, MISS. - Sheriff James Anders of Natchez said this week his office has "uncovered nothing" in his investigation into the beating of an elderly Negro by five hooded members of the Ku Klux Klan, as other beatings, two shootings and the arrests of two SNCC workers were reported in the area.

Archie Curtis, 60, an undertaker, said he and his attendant Willie Jackson, were whipped on the night of Feb. 15.

In Atlanta, SNCC asked Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy to investigate "reports of a resurgence of the Ku Klux Klan and terror tactics aimed at Negroes in Mississippi."

Clifford Walker, 34, was found shotgunned to death in his car eight miles from Woodville in Wilkerson County March 1.

Walker was employed at the International Paper Company. Bob Moses, program director for the Council of Federated Organizations, said two other Negroes, Albert Whitney and James Winston were whipped by whites during early February.

"Negroes with decent jobs are being terrorized," Moses said. "There have been 180 cross burnings, five killings, several shootings and at least three whippings since the Ku Klux Klan reorganized shortly after President Kennedy was killed," Moses said.

Moses said three Negroes with bullet holes in their bodies were "stuffed into a car in Wilkerson County with the motor running." The sheriff of the county attributed their deaths to carbon monoxide poisoning, Moses said.

The two vote workers arrested Feb. 29 were released the next day when they posted $100 property bonds each. George Green was originally charged with auto theft and speeding, but the theft charges were dropped. McArthur Cotton was held on vagrancy charges.

Green said a 14-year-old girl, Leona Stills, was shot at Feb. 28 by three teen-aged whites while she was walking along a Natchez street. She was not

Reluctant Judge Releases Coed

ATLANTA, GA. - An 18-year-old coed from Connecticut College for Women, convicted in a racial case and given the maximum sentence by a county judge, was freed Feb. 22 under a $15,000 property bond.

The girl, Mardon R. Walker of East Greenwich, Rhode Island, was sentenced to 12 months in the common jail and six months at hard labor. She was also fined $1,000.

She was the third white person convicted for participating in demonstration by the Judge Durwood T. Pye, who has a history of pro-segregation activity.

He was appointed to the bench in 1955 by segregationist ex-Governor Marvin Griffin. Before his appointment, he was an assistant county attorney and secretary of the Georgia Education Commission, a group created to maintain segregation in Georgia's schools.

DOGS, FIRE HOSES QUELL PROTESTS

PRINCESS ANNE, MD. - Anti-segregation protests, halted by a weekend moratorium called by student leaders after police used dogs, fire hoses and billy sticks to disperse demonstrations, may resume this week.

Fifty - seven Maryland State College students were in the college infirmary as a result of injuries sustained from police treatment, according to SNCC worker Reginald Robinson.

"At least 14" students suffered from police dog bites, Dr. Neville Barron, college physician stated. Others were injured from blows by billy sticks, Robinson said.

Demonstrations were called by the Student Appeal for Equality (SAFE), affiliated with SNCC for more than a year. Twenty-year-old SAFE head, John Wilson was arrested Feb. 26 along with more than 20 other students, for demonstrating against segregated restaurants.

SNCC Chairman John Lewis and Cambridge SNCC leader Mrs. Gloria Richardson, asked into Princess Anne by SAFE, reported no violence from the white community here toward demonstrators. "It's from the state police," Lewis said.

Chicago comedian Dick Gregory addressed a mass rally here Feb. 27 urging students to seek a "completely opened city."

Maryland State students, numbering 600, make up a sizeable portion of this town's 1,300 population.

One student, Marion Brown, 20, who was injured by a police billy club here in a Feb. 22 demonstration, required surgery as a result of a blood clot which developed after being struck on

Gregory, Hansen Sentenced, Fined

PINE BLUFF, ARK. - Negro comedian Dick Gregory and SNCC worker William Hansen were sentenced Feb. 25 to six months in jail and fined $500 for a Feb. 17 sit-in demonstration at a segregated truck stop. In addition, Gregory was fined $50 and costs when he appeared in court one-half hour late. Both posted $2500 appeal bonds.

Their arrests began a series of anti-segregation protests here that have resulted in the court-ordered closing of the eating place, Ray's Barbecue and in the arrest of more than 50 demonstrators.

Gregory described the jail as "somebody's torture chamber" after his release last weekend.

On Feb. 18, 15 people were jailed and crowds of whites - some identified by newsmen as "professional segregationists" - began to gather outside the eating place. SNCC worker James Jones was "roughed up" by a state trooper.

On Feb. 19 39 others were arrested. Reverend Benjamin Grinnage, chairman of the Pine Bluff Movement, was shot at during a protest by the owner of Ray's Barbecue.

Hansen said after his trial that the Pine Bluff Movement would press the city to adopt a public accommodations law. He said the group would continue anti-segregation protests.

The Pine Bluff Movement began demonstrations on Feb. 1 1962.

The owner of the eating place under fire has obtained an injunction against SNCC, Hansen, Gregory the Pine Bluff Movement and several local workers.

ALBANY LEADER RECEIVES 3 YEARS

MACON, GA. - Federal Judge W.A. Bootle sentenced Mrs. Elza Jackson, recording secretary of the Albany Movement, to three years on probation on Feb. 28.

Mrs. Jackson, with five other civil rights leaders from Albany, was indicted and tried on perjury charges.

They were accused of falsely telling a grand jury they could not remembering being present or were not present at a meeting where a boycott of a white merchant was discussed.

Her conviction has been appealed.

CANTON NEGRO CITIZENS face Mississippi law officers as they attempt to enter the courthouse to try to register on Freedom Day.

Miss. Freedom Days Spur Registration

HATTIESBURG, MISS. - Over 500 Negroes have tried to register to vote in Forrest County in the month following a Jan. 22 "Freedom Day."

On Feb. 22, the one-month anniversary of the first Freedom Day here, over 200 Negroes stood in line to take Mississippi's registration test, a prerequisite to voting here.

"The campaign thus far has been a success," according to John Lewis, Chairman of SNCC Lewis, who was here for the Jan. 22 Freedom Day, said civil rights groups "won the right to organize and run a voting campaign in Hattiesburg through the Freedom Day techniques."

The Freedom Day drive has been highlighted by the presence of more than 100 ministers and rabbis from the United Presbyterian Commission on Religion and Race, the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity, and the Rabbinical Association of America. Their participation in the vote drive is sponsored by the National Council of Churches, in cooperation with the cooperation with the Council of Federated Organizations (COFO), a state - wide coalition of local and national civil rights groups.

The vote drive has not been without its setbacks, however, a number of vote workers, including nine ministers, were arrested. The first to be jailed was SNCC worker Robert Moses, COFO program director for the state.

Also jailed was Lawrence Guyot, arrested for "contributing to the delinquency of a minor" and Peter Stoner, jailed when he tried to visit Guyot in the jail. Guyot, a SNCC worker, heads the COFO Fifth Congressional District vote drive.

CANTON, MISS. - A 10 p.m. civil curfew has been set by the city council here after more than 400 Negroes tried to register to vote in two days.

On Feb. 28, only four Negroes were allowed inside the Madison County Courthouse.

Workers for the Council of Federated Organizations, CORE and SNCC said over 400 Negroes stood in line outside both days waiting for a chance to register.

Registrar L.F. Campbell remained inside, while policemen from Canton, Jackson, Yazoo City and Neshoba County guarded the Negroes outside.

Local citizens, deputized especially for Freedom Day, Feb. 28, were transported to Canton via school bus, Volkswagen, and pick-up trucks.

CAMBRIDGE NEGROES RESUME PROTESTS

CAMBRIDGE, MD. - Demonstrations have resumed in this Eastern Shore community as 18 persons were arrested here Feb. 25 for picketing.

All demonstrators on picket lines in front of the Welfare Board and State Unemployment Security Commission offices were taken into "protective custody" by the Maryland National Guard. Troops were sent into Cambridge by Maryland Governor J. Millard Tawes in July 1963 after whites began attacking demonstrators and violence broke out.

According to Mrs. Gloria Richardson, head of the Cambridge Nonviolent Action Committee (CNAC) and member of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) Executive Committee, the "economic situation" in Cambridge is to be the chief target of demonstrations.

"In the second ward which is the Negro ghetto, two-thirds of all families have incomes of less than $3,000, and over 60% of the city's unemployed are concentrated in that area," Mrs. Richardson said. "More than 60% of the houses in that ward have no hot water."

"Twenty-nine percent of the Negro work force is chronically unemployed in Cambridge and more than one-third who do hold jobs work less than 30 weeks of each year. With few exceptions, Negroes in only the lowest paying jobs," Mrs. Richardson stated.

CNAC's demonstrations aim for an overall economic development plan in which Negroes are represented in policy making decisions on any planning commission, according to Mrs. Richardson. CNAC also demands that if no qualified Negroes are available for an "industrial complex" now being developed, "then Negroes must be trained for forthcoming jobs."

SNCC field secretary Reginald Robinson - active in Cambridge last summer - and Mrs. Richardson have stated that demonstrations "will continue as long as the white power structure of this city shows no willingness to correct the intolerable conditions of Cambridge Negroes."

MISS. SUMMER PROJECT SET

JACKSON, MISS. - Plans for a summer Peace Corps type operation for Mississippi" have been announced by SNCC officials.

"Scores of students, teachers, technicians, nurses, artists, and legal advisors will be recruited to come to Mississippi to staff a wide rage of programs according to Bob Moses , director of SNCC's Mississippi project.

SNCC worker Moses, who serves as program director for the Council of Federated Organizations (COFO) - an alliance of civil rights groups working in this state - stated that this summer's project would "augment the voter registration campaign now underway throughout Mississippi."

The Mississippi Summer Project - under the auspices of COFO will include freedom schools. community centers, research projects, and law student projects in addition to voter registration. A "pilot project" in white communities is also planned.

According to SNCC Chairman John Lewis, the struggle for freedom in Mississippi can only be won through concentrated action within the state and awareness throughout the nation of the need for Federal intervention to insure the voting rights of Negroes."

Plans call for voter registration workers in "every rural county and important urban areas in the state," Moses said.

Daytime and resident "Freedom Schools" will provide remedial work for high school students and "advance adult literacy for the purpose of voting," according to plans.

Community centers will "focus on political education and organization." Libraries, similar to the library in SNCC's Greenwood, Miss. office will developed throughout the state form national book drives.

"Skilled workers are needed to carry out a research project inquiring into Mississippi's suppressive political and economic system," Lewis stated. "SNCC hopes to launch a massive legal offensive against the official legal tyranny of the state," Lewis said.

Lewis and Moses claim the summer program will "attempt to involve students from all over the country." Students over 18 years who feel they are qualified may apply to: Mississippi Summer Project, 1017 Lynch Street, Jackson, Miss.

ATLANTA, GA. - "SNCC needs help now more than ever before" SNCC Chairman John Lewis said.

The SNCC Chairman asked "Freedom lovers everywhere" to make regular pledges to SNCC's direct action and voter registration programs.

Lewis said the Atlanta-based anti-segregation organization needs funds "if we are to carry out existing programs and expand into new areas."

U.S. SUPREME COURT UPHOLDS CONVICTION

BATON ROUGE, LA., - A SNCC worker, arrested here over two years ago, must serve a 60-day jail term, the United States Supreme Court has ruled.

The Court refused to overturn a Louisiana conviction for Dion T. Diamond, arrested Feb. 1, 1962 on trespassing, vagrancy and disorderly conduct charges.

Charges of criminal anarchy placed against him then were later dropped, and he was released - after 59 days in jail - on a $7,000 appeal bond.

COED RELEASED

Shortly after his appointment he imposed a $25,000 fine on the Atlanta branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, because of the group's refusal to comply with a request for its financial records from the Georgia Revenue Department. In July 1963 he instructed a Fulton County grand jury that the state's anti-trespass law - used to arrest anti-segregation demonstrators at eating places in the state- was being "flouted, defied and violated."

He ordered, and obtained, indictments against 101 persons arrested in racial demonstrations here dating back to 1961

During the summer, he tried two of these cases both involving white persons. Both were given maximum sentences, and one defendant, the Reverend Ashton Jones, is still in jail.

GREENWOOD, MISS. - Librarian Barbara Johnson inspects new books in a section of the library set up in the SNCC office in Greenwood, Miss.

"Establishing libraries and community centers is an important part of our program," SNCC worker Dick Frey said. Frey said there are approximately 50,000 volumes in Greenwood now. Most will be shipped to other libraries throughout the state." The Greenwood library, according to Frey, offers "thousands of reference books, school texts, books and periodicals about politics and civil rights, an excellent selection of modern fiction, and a wide variety of children's books. Greenwood is serving as a receiving point for books which SNCC intends to spread over Mississippi in the form of small libraries in all the Congressional Districts of the state," he said.

Freedom Libraries are already operating in Columbus, Canton and Meridian.

The other, Thomas Taylor Tolg, a white Ohio youth who worked for SNCC, was released under a $5,000 appeal bond. Judge Pye has refused to accept $5,000 in cash to free Reverend Jones, who has been behind bars since Aug. 28, 1963.

During Miss Walker's trial, Judge Pye ordered one witness, a former professor of hers who testified in her behalf, to go to jail for 20 days for contempt of court.

He said Lee Moon, a cab driver was beaten in Natchez Feb. 18, and a Negro was beaten in Amite County by white men. He said at one spot in nearby Franklin County, whites have drawn a line in the road and forbidden Negroes to cross it.

"Amite, Wilkerson and Adams Counties are involved in a reign of terror," Moses said. A Negro man who had witnessed the 1961 slaying of another Negro was killed in Amite County Feb. 1.

Moses said that over 180 crosses had been burned in southeast Louisiana and southwest Mississippi before Christmas. He said vote workers in Louisiana said the cars of the people who set crosses on fire there had Mississippi license plates.

"The civil rights bill doesn't begin to touch the problem of organized racist terror," Moses said.

Moses said the NAACP, SCLC, CORE and SNCC were "issuing a call for 1,000 students, ministers and educators to participate in a "Mississippi Freedom Summer" program. (see summer project story)

"Does the country have the courage to confront Mississippi?" Moses asked.

According to Robinson, reports that a student threw acid at a policeman are "incorrect." One student who arrived at the demonstration with a bucket of lye "persuaded to leave it in the street" by Robinson. "Later a policeman walked into it," he said.

"Innocent Negro bystanders were drawn into the demonstrations when police turned the fire hoses on Negroes standing on the sidewalk," Robinson stated.

DEDICATED TO STATES' RIGHTS...

THE RABBLE UNDERGROUND

VOLUME I NUMBER 1 MARCH 1964

WHITE MAN OF THE MONTH

Awarded monthly to those white men in Mississippi who have proven themselves to be stalwart men of vision and intelligence. Among past recipients of the Award are Baron La Beckmit, Charles Ills of the Jackson CARRION-WEDGER and Freddy Boss of the welfare department. We will continue to recognize men like these who are outstanding personalities in their respective fields.

This month we are pleased to award the honor of White Man of the Month to a distinguished member of the state legislature, Representative Weak of Porupa, Mississippi. Representative Weak was selected by the judges in recognition of his efforts to place illegitimacy on an illegal basis.

The bill introduced by Mr. Weak in the House would make the birth of more than one illegitimate child a felony. This felony would be punished, under his bill, by either three years imprisonment in the state penitentiary or sterilization of the offending parent - presumably the mother, since the child would not be illegitimate if the father could be found.

As introduced, the bill has been lauded by fellow legislators and prominent lawyers as being "tolerant and fair." Spurred on by the enthusiasm created by the bill, Representative Weak now has plans afoot to amend it slightly in order to go a few steps further in this area, in order to promote the general welfare of the citizens of the state.

Representative Weak stated to the awards committee that he and Representative Earl Mammon from South Mississippi were now drafting several proposed amendments. He explained that the bill now only punishes the results of unlawful cohabitation. He said that he felt a slight increase in the authority of the expanded police powers bill asked by the governor would enable the state to set up a special department that could get to the very root of the problem.

On further questioning, Representative Weak declared that a department for the investigation of suspected illegal procreation could be created. His plans call for the head of the department to be appointed by the governor for a two-year term of office. The department, officially known as the Police Examiners for Errant Procreation (PEEP), would be empowered to make investigations into suspected violators and to apprehend and bring to trial these enemies of society. The crime of illegal procreation would be punishable as a felony. The burden of proof would fall on the defendant to show non-intent to procreate. It has been suggested that the punishment of first offenders would be a one-week all expense paid trip to Sunflower County, Mississippi and the second offense would bring a two-week trip into Humphreys County. A third offense would constitute a ruling of habitual procreation. The offender would be held at the University Medical Center in Jackson to be used for lung, heart, and brain transplants for experimental purposes, in lieu of a shortage of prisoners from the state penitentiary.

Ideas for a special school in the new police academy for the PEEP department were also revealed. It was quite self-evident that advanced criminology methods would be needed to catch this latest loathsome criminal. Advanced courses in Kama Sutra and Kinsey Reports would be offered to those outstanding officers who show special promise in this field. A knowledge of sensitive electronic devices would also be required.

These thoughtfully laid-out plans were essentially the brainchild of Representative Weak, with invaluable assistance from Representative Mammon. We are sure that Mississippians will feel a new burst of pride for their American Way of Life [illegible]

WHITE MAN OF THE MONTH (continued) andguardian of our precious liberties. Again, we salute you...Representative Weak! Your type of vision is what has made and kept Mississippi great!

O SOVEREIGNTY

O Sovereign State!
Dear Homeland!
Stand ye firm in these crisis days.
Let not Truth confuse thee;
God is on our side...

O Sons of Mississippi...
Remember your mothers!
Remember your fathers and grandfathers.
Remember your greatgrandfathers and great aunts.
Remember and salute...

How, in this wilderness, they sowed
And we reap what they sowed.
It is all for us, the Sovereign
State
Of flowing rivers and happy
Delta land.

Across thy fertile plains,
tall mansions rise;
Built with foresight and gentility
Every tiny crumbling shack has a flowering rose bush.
We are an happy people.

O Sovereign State, pure and white.
O Sovereign State, where might... makes right.
O Mississippi...our words are trite
But Thou art precious in his sight.

Overheard in Dr. Silver's classroom and dutifully reported to the white citizens council:

"If Vandenburg wants to see what a real undernourished junior college looks like, he should see Rust."

THE PASSING SEEN

Politics today is a pale imitation of its former excellence. Our Pa's remember back in '17 when Vardaman was running for office - that he once had himself towed into Jackson clad in solid white, by twelve solid white oxen, surrounded by numerous vestal virgins.

Seems to us that if the campus administration would get smart, they would take their requests for appropriations...not Hat in Hand to the legislature...but with drama, thusly:

WHY NOT stage a pageant...re-enacting uh annually the glory and honor of Ole Miss students as they took their stand against federal rape of the campus?

The law students and future state politicians could play SOUTHERN TRADITION, nobly defended by the flower of southern manhood

AH...but where would we get marshals???

REPRINTED FROM CARRION-WEDGER, March 17 quite without permission...

Dear Editor:

My heart is filled with pride and hope after reading the excerpts from the "Rebel Underground" papers from Millsaps and Ole Miss in Mr. Hill's column. It is good to know we have youth who are dedicated enough to speak out their beliefs and to expose those persons who are seemingly trying to destroy even our belief in God. It is sad to think that we have to depend on our young people to initiate and fight this fight for our adults who are either afraid of what someone might think of them or too busy with selfish trivial things to be concerned.

I am very proud of the students who are risking so much to expose these facts and sincerely hope and pray that all adults will join them in ridding these two schools of these professors. I only wish I knew of something more I could do to actively join in the fight."

"I am a member of the rabble...in good standing." -Hitler from the pen of Johnny RAB...

Now that the liberty amendment is sure to pass, giving private enterprize a crack a federal boondoggles, we can see already the line forming for purchase of the TVA, the Post Office, etcetera.

BUT Johnny Rab's been saving his coins to purchase a little curio that has glittered in his mind's eye for some time now: THE F B I

BECAUSE the FBI would compete with the JUSTICE DEPARTMENT, which he assumes would be grabbed up by PBJ for a song, and naturally wishing to avoid any conflict with hose boys, he would use his newly purchased toy to investigate certain Goin's On at Ole Miss.

THE CAMPUS HANKY PANK is not news any more. A certain intrepid journalist in the capitol, ever vigilante, has exposed the role of the administration in the Howard K. Smith "infamy."

NATURALLY all us Right Thinkers assumed they would fire those responsible for the "black mark" on our fair institution. We anticipated the yelling and kicking and trying to hide behind ACADEMIC FREEDOM AND INDEPENDENCE FROM POLITICS.

WHO CARES if the accrediting board takes away our accredited status and makes our degrees worthless? Or if the Medical School, which even some Yankees admit is one of the best, is destroyed because of state politics? We never want to leave Mis'sippi anyhow.

NAW. We don't need accredited colleges. There aren't but one or two accredited Negro colleges. The State will take care of that in time and then nobody will have accredited colleges. That will be fine. We demand separate but equally non-accredited.

This brings ole Rab right back to the point. Since PBJ'S Man on Campus couldn't get to the bottom of the dastardly deed, this looks like a job for Super-Fed.

AND IF we are judicious, boys, private enterprise...that's us...can gain control of the FBI. We can then clean up this campus and go ahead with our normal carefree pursuits of drinkin', fraternizin' and jes' general liberty-lovin'.

yores.....JOHNNY RAB

LET THE CHIPS FALL

Alas! Where will it end? First, the faculty. Then, the administration. Now, the students - defacing our campus reputation.

How many of you innocents know that the Journeymen, so warmly praised by no less a vessel of truth than the Mississippian and cancelling out their appearance at Ole Miss March 19, were also the first in a series of entertainers who cancelled engagements in Jackson because of segregated seating policy?

Recollect that it was around last Thanksgiving when the Journeymen, along with Glenn Yarborough, et. al., instead of performance as scheduled in Jackson, went about 8 miles north to the Mix. And, we hear, a good time was had by all.

Nice work, ASB. We always knew that beneath that bluff exterior beats a heart as pure as Silver.

PLEASE...O PLEASE...BRER RABBIT

As R. U. goes to press, we contemplate our future in Mississippi belles-lettres.

Will we receive recognition as budding young Mississippi Authors, and take the consequences of our proper place in the Mississippi Room?

We frankly feel a little wistful about the prospects of Arrival. Trapped, what? By a giant man-eating plant, yes...we are to be like a tiny insect...inside the hot house? Like all hardy perennials who hope to survive unstunted, we prefer the fresh air...of the outside.

TO TELL THE TRUTH, we are nervous because fame may come too soon and spoil what might have been a promising literary future.

THE RABBLE UNDERGROUND

Charlie Hill down in Jackson has said better than anybody, why the Underground has to stay underground. It's because.. we are an unpopular minority.

The minority always has to respect the rights of the majority.

SO, EVEN IN MISSISSIPPI, where there is free speech and all that, you can't just go around saying and thinking things the majority don't like. Out of respect for THE MAJORITY, we'll stay Right where we are. (Besides, what do you take us for???Idiots??????)

Dear Mrs. Long:

Because of the great success of the first touring season of the Southeastern Shakespeare Festival, we have been encouraged by many educators throughout the State to extend the scope of the project.

Last year, over 15,000 high school and college students in the Atlanta area saw our productions of TAMING OF THE SHREW and MACBETH. We would like to make this experience available to students throughout the entire State as well as improve the level of the annual Summer Shakespeare Festival.

In order to accomplish this, we have written to Governor Sanders requesting some assistance from the State to launch the program.

The 23rd of April marks the quadricentenial celebration of Shakespeare's birth. The establishment of such a program would not only be a fitting commemoration to the world's greatest playwright, it would also display to the nation as a whole the positive steps that our State is taking to raise the educational opportunities of our youth.

We would greatly appreciate any effort on your part in making this dream a reality. One way in which you can help immediately is by writing to the Governor indicating your support of the program. The Governor must be made aware of the great number of citizens who are seriously interested in improving the standards of education in Georgia. Your immediate response in this matter would be of invaluable help.

Thank you for your time and interest.

Sincerely,

Frank Wittow

"CIVIL RIGHTS VICTIMS IN HATTIESBURG NEED HELP," SAYS OPERATION FREEDOM WORKER

Cincinnati, Ohio - April 13, 1964 - An Operation Freedom worker in the Hattiesburg, Mississippi area reports that many people who have taken a stand for freedom are now being subjected to "loss of jobs, economic boycotts, and other harassments."

The Operation Freedom worker, Jack McKart, said: "A minister lost his job as a schoolbus driver for the county, lost small plumbing jobs, lost his credit with Hattiesburg merchants, lost some church members, and was the victim of shots (fired into his house) - all because he had registered to vote.

"A woman who worked as a maid was fired when she told her employers she planned to attend the street rally of Rev. John Cameron, a Negro Baptist minister running for Congress from the 5th District of Mississippi...A man was fired from his job at a country club after it was learned that he was among the picketeers in front of the courthouse on January 22, 'Freedom Day'...A mother of three children was fired from her cleaning job at a local radio station for her part in voter registration."

Operation Freedom, a national group with headquarters in Cincinnati, was organized more than three years ago to give emergency assistance to people in the south who suffer because of their activity in civil rights. The treasurer of the group, Rev. Maurice McCrackin, said: "Operation Freedom will now attempt to give the same kind of emergency help to the stricken in Hattiesburg as it has given elsewhere. Operation Freedom is attempting to give the type of short range emergency assistance that will enable these people to stay in their area in order that they might try to effect the basic changes necessary for a better life."

Three years ago, Operation Freedom gave major assistance in the Haywood and Fayette county area in western Tennessee when hundreds of people were evicted from their homes because of registering to vote or attempting to register. A newly-published brochure of Operation Freedom begins: "Whereas registering to vote began on a large scale in Haywood and Fayette counties, Tennessee, it certainly did not stop there. Because these people stood their ground bravely, people in other areas of the south began to register and to face reprisals."

Rev. Mr. McCrackin, whose address is 932 Dayton Street, Cincinnati, also said: "Operation Freedom is the only organization devoted solely to carrying on such a program of assistance. It channels money wholly and directly to the people needing assistance. Urgent needs are greater than the dollars Operation Freedom has available."

RELIGION, EDUCATION AND THE LAW

In October of 1963 the Project, Religious Freedom and Public Affairs cooperated in sponsoring, one week apart from each other, two institutes of historic significance: the first brought together for a four-day period 125 school board members and school superintendents from the four states of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and Michigan. The second, convened for a three-day period, was composed of 50 eminent professors of law and the legal counsels of major civic and religious organizations concerned with church-state matters.

Both institutes dealt with the same issues: the role of religion in public education, and the use of public funds in support of church-related education.

At one institute educational problems received major attention; at the other legal issues. But at both institutes there was an overlapping of concern. This issue of Background Reports provides a summary of the most important papers delivered and discussed at these two institutes. They provide a broad view of these problems with their many complexities and in their many dimensions.

A limited number of the individual texts of these papers are available through the Project, Religious Freedom and Public Affairs, 43 West 57th Street, New York, New York.

INSTITUTE FOR EDUCATORS

Purdue University, Lafayette, Indiana,

October 6-9, 1963

This Institute entitled "Religion and the Schools" was sponsored officially by The Department of Education, Purdue University; it was initiated by faculty at the College of Education, The Ohio State University; it was planned in cooperation with the Graduate School of Education, University of Chicago and the School of Education, The University of Michigan. Jack A. Culbertson, executive director of The University Council for Educational Administration served as Coordinator for the Institute.

Selected school board members, public and parochial school superintendents were invited from each of the four states, at their own expense, to share with each other their views and experiences in handling problems for public education resulting from America's religious pluralism.

FINANCING EDUCATION FOR ALL SCHOOL CHILDREN

The first day was devoted to a discussion of the problems of financing education for all school children. The opening paper was delivered by Dr. H. Thomas James, Associate Professor of Education, Stamford University. Dr. James pointed out that given the wealth of this country, the problem of "financing education is not in the field of school finance at all, but lies in a broader context of social decisions." Pointing to contradictory factors at work as America seeks to solve the problem of paying for education, Dr. James dramatized the need for a broad national consensus in resolution of these two questions: "What expectations for education are defined by the fundamental values of our society?" and "What institutional arrangements will satisfy those expectations?"

The Stamford educator proposed that the federal government undertake a forum to define fundamental values for developing a national policy for education.

He suggested that such a forum would need enough status to receive financial support and backing by the Congress. Also, he indicated, it should be sufficiently

NEGROES RUN IN MISS.

FOUR RUN ON FREEDOM SLATE

JACKSON, MISS. - Mississippi's voters - over 95% of them white - may not elect any of the four Negro candidates running in the June 2 primary but each is determined to go to Washington to represent the state in Jan. 1965.

The four - Mrs. Victoria Gray, and the Rev. John Earle Cameron, both of Hattiesburg; Mrs. Fannie Lou Hamer of Ruleville, and James M. Houston of Vicksburg - asked the state's voters to make a choice they've never been asked to make before to choose between the white, segregationist regular Democrats and four civil-rights conscious Negroes running under the banner of the Freedom Democratic Party.

None of the Negro candidates expects to win Tuesday's election, but all hope to be seated in the House and Senate in Jan. 1965.

Although Negroes are more than 40% of the state's population, only some 20,000 Negroes are registered voters. Registered whites make up 95% of the electorate.

Beating Marks Freedom Day

CANTON, MISS. - A Negro youth was beaten unconscious by eight city police here during a May 29 "Freedom Day," and close to 50 persons were arrested when they attempted participation in the concentrated voter registration drive.

SNCC workers at the Jackson office of the Council of Federated Organizations (COFO), said Negroes who assembled at the Mount Zion Baptist Church and proceeded to the county courthouse were either turned back by police or arrested.

Despite mounting pressure from local law enforcement during the Freedom Day, about 60 persons stood on line waiting to try to register to vote.

"Eight police with clubs beat 24-year-old McKinley Hamblein unconscious in front of many witnesses," assistant COFO pro-

COURT NIXES PEACE BOND REQUIREMENTS

SELMA, ALA. - The Alabama Court of Appeals has denied local law enforcement of one of its most effective legal weapons used here last fall to restrain SNCC vote workers.

The appellate court reversed on May 26 a Dallas County Circuit Court decision which required six Negro rights workers, including SNCC Chairman John Lewis, to put up security for $1,000 peace bonds before they could be released from jail or contest their conviction.

Peace bonds have also been used in Savannah, Ga. and Farmville, Va. to deter civil rights advocates from engaging in further activity. Posting such a bond is tantamount to promising to stop all present activity, since it is immediately revokeable if another charge is added. Traditionally used in domestic and

SUMMER PROJECT READIED

JACKSON, MISS. - On July 1, several hundred white and Negro college students, doctors, nurses, lawyers and teachers will settle at different points throughout the state to begin work on the "Mississippi Freedom Summer."

Under the sponsorship of the Council of Federated Organizations (COFO), the summer workers will teach in "Freedom Schools," man Community Centers, and work on registering the state's 380,000 unregistered, but eligible, Negroes.

"Summer workers are being recruited at 'Freedom Centers' at Northern and Southern college campuses, and from protest groups in the South," SNCC worker Betty Garman said. "We are asking them to bring $150 with them, as well as a list of people we can contact for bail money if they are arrested."

Freedom Centers have been established to serve:

The Universities of California, Michigan, Southern California, Oregon, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, and Illinois; Southern Illinois, Harvard, Yale, Howard, Stanford and Atlanta Universities; and Oberlin, Morehouse, Spelman, Emory, Radcliffe, Queens, Clark, Morris Brown, and Pomona Colleges.

Students accepted for the project so far are largely from the New England, New York - Philadelphia area, the West Coast and the South.

More than half are white, and for most it will be their first trip South. Students are selected on the basis of the skills they have to offer, than for "a missionary spirit or the feeling that the summer will be just another adventure," a SNCC worker said.

They will attend a two-week orientation session at a mid - Western college campus, and will learn from lawyers and teachers and experts what their summer will be like.

SNCC worker Bob Moses, COFO's project director, will direct the summer project. "We still need supplies of paper, school books, pencils, typewriters, tape recorders and mimeograph machines as well as cars and money to make the summer a success," Moses said.

Books should be sent to the main headquarters of SNCC at 6 Raymond Street in Atlanta, Georgia, he indicated, while other materials should be sent to the COFO office at 1017 Lynch Street in Jackson, Miss.

"The success of the project depends on whether Americans are willing to move together against the forces that deny freedom in Mississippi and across the South," SNCC Chairman John Lewis said.

SNCC WORKER JAILED WITH WHITE ATTACKER

LEESBURG, GA.- A worker for the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), released here after 31 days in jail for passing out voter registration leaflets at a Negro public school says he served his time in a cell across from the white man who broke a white SNCC worker's jaw in an Albany, Ga. jail in 1962.

Willie Ricks, 20, was arrested here April 20 after he distributed leaflets urging parents of school children to register to vote. The warrant was served as he escorted an elderly Negro woman to the Lee County courthouse.

"I found out a white man in the same jail with me was the one who beat Bill Hansen and broke his jaw in 1962," Ricks said.

"He told me the reason he beat Hansen was that the sheriff promised to drop six or seven counts of burglary against him if he 'roughed Hansen up good'," Ricks stated.

Hansen now director of SNCC's Arkansas project, was jailed for participating in the massive demonstrations of nearby Albany in the summer of 1962.

SNCC workers first went into southwest Georgia in the fall of 1961. They conducted vote drives in several surrounding rural counties, including Lee County, and now plan to expand the drive into all 22 counties of the 2nd Congressional District.

ADDITIONAL FEDERAL JUDGES CALLED FOR IN MISSISSIPPI

ATLANTA, GA. - A civil rights leader in Mississippi has asked for the appointment of five extra Federal judges in his state to protect voter registration workers during the summer. Five U.S. marshals would be assigned to work under each of the extra judges.

The request was made in a petition by Lawrence Guyot to Elbert P. Tuttle, Chief Judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, who resides here. Guyot acted through Attorneys Joseph Jordan, Norfolk, Va., and Len W. Holt and Simon L. Cain, both of Washington, D.C.

Guyot who lives in Hattiesburg, Miss., told Judge Tuttle that more than 1,000 and possibly 2,000 students and other persons will come into Mississippi to conduct voter education and registration during June, July, August, and September.

Guyot, a 23-year-old SNCC worker, directed the 5th Congressional District project of the Council of Federated Organizations (COFO) in Miss.

"It has been the experience of the petitioner, and his counsel, that all voter registration and political education programs in Mississippi are met with - official and unofficial beatings, shootings, arrests on spurious charges, and other forms of harassment," Guyot's petition said.

"Experience has taught the petitioner that the only protection afforded, and it is minimal, under such circumstances as shall exist this summer, comes from being able to go into Federal courts for relief from 'official' violence and intimidation."

Guyot declared that only three lawyers in the whole state of Mississippi are "willing to handle a racially controversial case and to assert the necessary constitutional defenses. In each instance when an integration worker is arrested the matter is racially controversial."

Guyot asserts that the three lawyers cannot be everywhere in the state to try to protect the voter registration workers He says that even the 50 lawyers being sent into the state by various groups will not be enough to cope with "massive and official repression certain to be inflicted" on the registration workers.

"Many of the local communities have acquired more weapons and are preparing or have prepared concentration centers for imprisoning voter registration and political education workers coming to these cities during the summer," Guyot added.

Because of vacations, Guyot says, there will be only one Federal judge sitting in Mississippi most of the time during the summer, and this is not enough to protect the people who will be working in that state.

Last weekend in Atlanta, the board of the Southern Conference Educational Fund (SCEF) called upon President Johnson to protect the workers in Mississippi with Federal marshals, "augumented by Federal troops, if necessary."

MISS. WORKERS FACE POLICE HARASSMENT

JACKSON, MISS. - "Civil rights workers in Mississippi face arrest almost daily on charges ranging from 'running a stop sign' and 'public drunkenness 'carrying books calculated to incite people to overthrow the government'," according to John Lewis, Chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC).

During an intensive mock political campaign across the state last fall, workers from SNCC estimated that police made over 60 arrests for traffic violations alone during a 21 day period.

"Over 100 incidents of official harassment" were recorded during Nov. 1963, when an integrated slate ran in a mock election for the state's two top offices.

Civil rights workers here have charged police are stepping up arrests as the summer approaches. As examples, they cite:

The overnight jailing in Holly Spring of four workers from the Council of Federated Organizations (COFO) for "investigation";

The arrest of seven COFO workers in Belzoni on May 14. Police said they were arrested "to prevent riots" because the group was integrated;

The arrest in Oxford of six COFO workers May 5. They were charged with "suspicion of carrying materials which advocate the overthrow of the government" when police found college textbooks in a trailer behind their car;

The arrest in Jackson on May 24 of a white COFO worker, Dick Jewett, 20, of New York City. Jewett, was charged with "vagrancy" and "public drunkenness."

The arrest of two University of Pennsylvania Law School students, Alan Lerner and Charles Woll, and SNCC worker Hunter Morey in Jackson May 25. The three, all white, were charged with "being fugitives";

The arrest May 25 of COFO worker Emily Shrader, 20, of Cambridge, Mass., on "vagrancy" and "public drunkenness" charges;

The arrest that evening, three times, of Pennsylvania law student Woll on three different traffic counts;

SNCC workers expect such arrests to increase when 1,000 summer workers arrive in Mississippi July 1 to begin work on a COFO - sponsored "Summer Project."

NURSE WINS SUIT, GA. YOUTH ARRESTED

WARRENTON, GA. - A Negro nurse who was forced from an interstate bus here in 1959 and was beaten by white attackers has won $5,000 in damages from the bus company while a Negro youth faces a jail term for entering the "white" side of the Greyhound Bus Terminal in Rome, 175 miles away.

The nurse, 42-year-old Mrs. Florence Blaize Ephriam, was given $5,000 damages from Safeway Trails, Inc. on May 25 after a March trial held in New York City. She had refused to move to make room for three white Passengers and was attacked. She suffered a cerebral concussion and cuts and bruses.

The Rome youth, Clifford Ralph Roberts, Jr., was jailed on May 4 at the Rome Greyhound Bus Terminal.

A trial set for May 11 was postponed, the youth said.

The Atlanta - based Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) has asked the U.S. Department of Justice and the Civil Rights Commission to investigate Roberts' arrest.

Hamilton was beaten on the lawn of the church in full view of observers.

The Canton drive gained momentum when SNCC and CORE workers conducted the first Freedom Day here Feb. 28.

Canton, located in Mississippi's 4th Congressional District, is the territorial focus of CORE's participation in the COFO statewide program. SNCC workers man the 1st, 2nd, 3rd and 5th districts through COFO.

FREEDOM SLATE

If and when the four Negroes lose, they plan to challenge the right of the all-white regular Democratic Party of Mississippi to claim to represent all of the people of the state.

Since Negroes are excluded, not only from voting but from participating in any phase of the party machinery, the four hope the National Democratic Convention in Atlantic City will refuse to seat the regular Democrats and will extend recognition to the Freedom Democrats instead.

The four have been waging active campaigns throughout the state. Mrs. Hamer, Rev. Cameron and Mr. Houston have confined their speechmaking and politicking to their respective districts, but Mrs. Gray, who is running for the Senate seat of John Stennis, has been covering the whole state.

They will also run in a Freedom Election that will coincide with the official election. In a similar mock campaign last fall, an integrated slate running for the state's two top offices polled 80,000 votes.

The campaigns grew out of voter registration drives conducted throughout the state by the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) now joined by the Congress of Racial Equality, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, and the state branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People under the Council of Federated Organizations (COFO).

other disputes, peace bonds were used by Southern lawmen last civil rights worlers last summer.

The Alabama Court of Appeals ruled on March 6 that the vote workers were entitled to release from custody. Last week the court denied the state's request for a rehearing.

Prior to the March ruling the six had been released from jail, but their plea asked that they be freed from posting peace bonds in addition to fines and bonds already imposed by lower courts as a result of last October's concentrated vote activity.

Two of the vote workers were convicted in juvenile court here of contributing to the delinquency of a minor. The Rev. Benny Tucker , a SNCC worker, and Henry Will Shannon were sentenced to 12 months in jail and a fine of $100. That charge has often been used by Southern law officers where youth were involved in community civil rights work.

The other four, including SNCC's Lewis, Worth Long, and Wilson Brown, were convicted of their charges charges in county court and sentenced to six months and a fine of $300.

SNCC conducted an intensive vote drive here last October which met resistance from city and county officials. The campaign of Mrs. Amelia Boynton for U.S. Congress grew out of that effort.

SELMA REGISTRATION, TESTING TO CONTINUE

SELMA, ALA. - Organized testing of public facilities here and a stepped up voter registration drive will continue, a Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee spokesman announced this week.

On July 10, an injunction prohibiting assembly of more than three people, meetings where violations of law are suggested, or encouraging impeding justice, was issued against SNCC, CORE, COFO, NAACP, the Southern Regional Council, Alabama Council on Human Rights, the Dallas County Voter's League and Improvement Association, SNCC Executive Secretary James Forman, SNCC Chairman John Lewis, SNCC Selma Project Director John Love, the Reverend Ralph Abernathy, SNCC workers Benny Tucker, Alvery Williams, Karen House, Willie C. and Charles Robertson and James Austin, attorneys Bruce Boynton and Charles Chestnut, 27 local residents and the Ku Klux Klan and the National States Rights Party.

Only SNCC has had an active program in Central Alabama. The National States Rights Party has been holding meetings in the Selma area.

Over 60 people, including John Lewis, SNCC Chairman, have been arrested here since July 3, when the rights bill was signed into law. City and county policemen and members of a special Sheriff's posse, under the direction of Dallas County Sheriff Jim Clark, beat and jailed Negroes making integration tries on Saturday, July 4. Clark's men also arrested four members of a SNCC - aided Literacy Project here.

Thomas Brown, 24, a SNCC worker, said organized teams of Negroes would test whether Selma's eating places and movie

PROJECT GOES ON DESPITE BOMBING

McCOMB, MISS . - Despite three blasts that rocked a Negro home here July 8 and a history of violence, a Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) voting and educational project will continue.

Ten voter registration workers in the home at 702 Wall Street here were not seriously injured. One, Curtis Hayes, 22, a SNCC worker, was cut by flying glass. Another, SNCC Mississippi Summer Project Volunteer Dennis Sweeny, 21, of Portland, Oregon, suffered a mild concussion.

Others in the home were SNCC workers George and Freedye Greene, 20, and 19, both from Greenwood, Mississippi; SNCC worker Julius Samstein, 25, of New York City; SNCC worker Jesse Harris, 22, of Jackson, Mississippi; SNCC worker Sher-

Court Order, SNCC Drive - Registration Jumps from 1 to 237

BATESVILLE, MISS. - A federal court has erased double standards for Negro and white voters here.

Two SNCC workers helped 237 Negroes register at the Panola County Courthouse here in one week.

The current registration drive began after the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals overturned a decision by the District Court of North Mississippi "opening" registration books to Negroes. In effect, the court said the same standards that had been applied to whites must be applied to Negroes.

The court ruled registration applicants must be 21 years or over, may apply for registration without paying a poll tax, may try to register without the registrar or his deputy being present, and that as many applicants

SANCTIONED TERROR HINDERS COMPLIANCE

ATLANTA, GA. - Successful attempts to integrate formerly all-white public places in four deep South states were reported this week by SNCC.

But the SNCC said "a clear pattern of extra-legal and officially sanctioned violence, condoned or initiated by local policemen, is evident in Arkansas, Alabama, Florida, Georgia and Mississippi where Negroes have tried to exercise their rights under the 1964 Civil Rights Act."

The SNCC office here reported the following incidents:

Georgia establishments in Atlanta, Albany, Thomasville, Tifton, Savannah and Americus integrated quietly on July 3, but on the days following, SNCC worker John Perdew, 22, of Denver, Colorado, was beaten in Americus four times by a white mob on July 4 after leaving a newly integrated restaurant; mobs of whites drove through Americus' Negro neighborhoods shooting and throwing bricks; four SNCC workers, Donald Harris, Randolph Battle, Roy Shields and Dale Smith and nine other Negroes were arrested on July 5 for trying to enter a public swimming pool in Albany; a mob of 250 whites and police chased Negroes away from an integrated movie theatre in Americus.

In Laurel, Mississippi on July 4, a group of Negroes attempting to enter a restaurant were repulsed by a white mob and two Negro youths were slashed with razor blades.

In Selma, Alabama, Negroes peacefully integrated a movie theatre on July 4 until the owner stopped selling tickets. Mobs of whites and policemen attacked the Negroes waiting outside.

In Pine Bluff, Arkansas, members of a SNCC testing team were served in two of four places they entered. At one, Ray's Ruleville, June 28 - The mayor of Ruleville prevented a white Stanford University chaplain from attending services at a white church here.

Jackson, June 28 - A summer volunteer was kicked from behind by a local white youth at the train station here as he arrived from Oxford, Ohio.

Hattiesburg, June 29 - Two cars belonging to SNCC volunteers were shot at outside the SNCC office here. SNCC worker Pete Stoner was arrested for reckless driving and failure to signal.

Biloxi, June 29 - Several white volunteers working in SNCC 's pilot white community project were turned away from two hotels here.

Holly Springs, June 30, - A white man assaulted SNCC worker Larry Rubin and threatened to "shoot up" the SNCC office.

Harmony (Carthage), June 30 - The (white) county superintendant of schools suddenly announced a special session for Negroes only, two days prior to the scheduled opening of a Freedom School here.

Harmony, July 2 - Local citizens were told they could not use the Freedom School by the sheriff and county school superintendant. A cross was burned and six pounds of large roofing tacks were spread across roads of the Negro community.

WILLIAMS CHAPEL CHURCH IN RULEVILLE, the site of voter registration meetings sponsored by SNCC, was damaged by fire on June 25.

Meridian, July 3 - The 11-year-old brother of missing rights worker James Chaney received a broken arm when a white man's car ran a red light forcing the cars to collide.

Hattiesburg, July 3, - A Negro grocery store and teen spot was hit by dynamite.

Harmony, July 3 - A "No Trespass" sign was posted on the Freedom School here by the Leake County sheriff.

Tougaloo, July 3 - An integrated car en route to Canton was chased by two white cars.

Clarksdale, July 3 - A store manager told his Negro employees they would be "discharged" if they went to the courthouse.

Batesville, July 3 - A Negro man was struck by a white man as he left the Panola County courthouse.

Laurel, July 4- Two brothers, part of a group of seven Negro teenagers who attempted to test the public accommodations provisions of the civil rights law, were wounded by a mob of 25-30 whites.

Batesville, July 4 - A local citizen and summer volunteer were chased in their car for thirty miles.

Laurel, July 5 - Two white SNCC volunteers were held by police for questioning and a SNCC staff member was detained when she went to investigate.

Jackson, July 5 - A white car hurled bottles at the project office here cutting a local woman's leg.

Clarksdale, July 5 - Two white volunteers were denied entrance to the (white) First Christian Church.

Jackson, July 6 - A local Negro was told he faced $311 in fines and three months in jail on unspecified charges after he was visited by a summer volunteer.

Clarksdale, July 6 - Civil Rights workers were "nearly forced off the road" by a car of whites.

Gulfport, July 7 - The tires of a summer worker's car were slashed after she drove local citizens to the courthouse to register to vote.

Vicksburg, July 7 - White youths threw a bottle, breaking a window, at a car waiting to pick up Freedom School students.

Moss Point, July 7 - Three Negroes, but no whites, were arrested here when they followed a car of whites believed to have shot into a mass meeting here. The shots had injured a 17-year-old girl who was hospitalized for stomach wounds.

SNCC WORKER JESSE HARRIS surveys damage of SNCC FREEDOM HOUSE in McComb, Miss. A SNCC worker and summer volunteer were injured.

Walthall, July 7 - Police officials in two counties refused to give information - supposed to be public - to the Greenwood SNCC office on the whereabouts of a missing rights worker arrested earlier in the day. James Brown had been arrested for forfeiture of bond despite removal of his case to federal court.

Hattiesburg, July 8- The Rev. Robert Beech of the National Council of Churches was arrested on a false pretenses charge for allegedly overdrawing his local bank account. Bond was set at $2,000.

McComb, July 8- A SNCC worker and summer volunteer were injured when the SNCC Freedom House was bombed. The house contained ten project workers, six of them SNCC staff.

Columbus, July 8 - Three SNCC voter registration volunteers were arrested and charged with trespassing while canvassing for potential voters.

Ashland, July 8 - SNCC staff member Cleve Seller was arrested for reckless driving.

Ruleville, July 8 - A summer volunteer was "thrown out" of the Sunflower County registrar's office when he accompanied a local woman to register to vote.

Laurel, July 8 - A SNCC executive committee member, Lester McKinnie, was "missing" for close to 24 hours. Both city and county police, who finally acknowledge he was in their custody, claimed he was in the jurisdiction of the other department and refused to give information.

McComb, July 9 - A car with four white males is reported to have fired on the only Negro on the McComb police force following a SNCC mass meeting.

Gulfport, July 9 - Three SNCC summer volunteers were arrested in front of the Harrison County courthouse as they accompanied local citizens to the voting registrar's office.

Greenwood, July 10-Phil Moore, a SNCC volunteer, reported he was beaten and hit with a club by a representative of the Interstate Insurance Company who told him to "get out of town."

Hattiesburg, July 10 - Three summer volunteers were assaulted by two white youths with metal bars and beaten on their way to SNCC canvassing headquarters. All three, including a rabbi, were released after hospital treatment.

Greenwood, July 10 - SNCC worker Fred Mangrum was singled out of a group of 12 SNCC workers and arrested for profanity.

Hattiesburg, July 10 - SNCC worker reported interference by the telephone company with their phone lines after they made repeated calls to the FBI.

Jackson, July 10 - FBI director J. Edgar Hoover told newsmen the FBI would give "no protection" to civil rights workers.

PROGRESS REPORT I

SUMMER PROJECT

JACKSON, MISS. - "There are now 1,500 students ranging in age from eight years to 82 years enrolled in 25 Freedom Schools in Mississippi," a SNCC spokesman reported.

Six more schools are planned bringing enrollment to over 2,000 students. By mid-summer more than 900 full-time workers will be engaged in the "Mississippi Freedom Summer Project," a statewide educational and voter registration effort growing out of a pilot voter registration project started by SNCC in 1961 in McComb.

450 summer volunteers are in the state now. 100 additional workers are expected in the next ten days. They are joining close to 100 SNCC staff members and other civil rights groups that make up the coordinating agency of the three-month drive.

Some 150 lawyers and law students, plus 100 clergymen who will serve as counselors to the volunteers, make up a complement of 900 workers in the state.

The second group of volunteers, arriving here June 27 from a training session in Oxford, Ohio, man community centers and teach in Freedom Schools located in cities and towns across the state. The first group, which arrived June 20, is engaged mainly in voter registration.

Each school will have a low teach-student ratio. The "Freedom Schools" will offer courses in leadership development, remedial academic programs (reading, writing, mathematics, history), and contemporary issues.

SNCC STAFF MEMBER DICK FREY (left) explains SNCC's Mississippi Summer Project plans to Representative Augustus Hawkins (D-Calif.), Rep. Philip Burton (D-Calif.) and Rep. William Fitts Ryan (D-N.Y.). The three congressmen and Rep. Don Edwards (D-Calif.) toured Mississippi last week with SNCC staff members to inspect summer project activity.

The first "Freedom Schools" opened Thursday, July 2 in Vicksburg, Clarksdale and Mileston with approximately 30 students each. Schools opening Monday, July 6 included Sharon, with 100 students; Camden, 100; Valley View, 100; Canton, 60; Hattiesburg, 575 (five schools); Greenville, 60: Moss Point, 60; Greenwood, 50 (three schools); and Ruleville, 30. Total enrollment at all schools is expected to top 1,000.

Director for the SNCC "Freedom School" program is Dr. Staughton Lynd, former social studies professor at Atlanta's Spelman College, who will join the Yale University faculty this fall. The United Federation of Teachers assisted in recruiting theatres would obey the 1964 Civil Rights Act. Brown said a "Freedom Week," during which Negroes made registration attempts here in large numbers, would continue, with increased canvassing of Negro neighborhoods for potential voters.

Observers who saw Lewis jailed said police crowded the young integration leader into an alley with others arrested with him and "treated them with excessive brutality." The witness said policeman pushed electric cattle prods under girls' dresses to shock and burn them.

Lewis' arrest here July 6 was his 33rd. He was arrested here September 25, 1963, and again this week while carrying signs urging Negroes to register.

On Sunday night, July 5, posse members and local policemen beat and clubbed Negroes leaving a weekly mass meeting. Four persons were hospitalized, including two white newspaper reporters attacked by the officers.

Law officers refused to let Negroes seeking to register enter the front door of the county courthouse July 6 and made one SNCC staff member, a Selma resident, leave a line at the rear of the building. Fifty other Negroes seeking to register, plus Lewis and three other SNCC staff members, were jailed on charges they interfered with a court session.

Nine Negroes were jailed July 7 while walking down a Selma street.

16 more were jailed July 8, including Ernest McMillian, 19, a SNCC staff member from Dallas, Texas. Police have also impounded two automobiles belonging to SNCC.

as possible may take the test as physical space allows.

Over 85% of the eligible white voters in Panola County are registered voters. Of 7250 eligible Negroes, however, only 1 was registered before the SNCC drive began.

The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals said a Negro Voters League, formed in 1955, had attempted to register 10 Negroes and had only registered one, while local white people could register "without distraction" even when many white voters "were not qualified to be registered according to Mississippi law."

In addition, the court found many Negroes had been intimidated by local whites.

The suit was originally filed against Leonard C. Duke, Circuit Clerk and Registrar of Panola County, and the state of Mississippi.

In other Mississippi voting cases, U.S. District Judge Sidney Mize took under advisement a request from the Department of Justice for a preliminary injunction to halt discrimination against Negroes in Lauderdale County. District Judge Claude Clayton will hear voter discrimination cases against Carroll County registrar George W. Tuberville and Humphreys County registrar G. H. Hood.

In addition, a three-judge federal panel has been appointed to hear a suit challenging the state's election laws, and asking for an injunction preventing all county registrars from giving Negro voting applicants tests not given to whites. The suit also asks the three-judge panel to set aside state Democratic precinct and county meetings and to delay the state Democratic convention until Negroes are assured a greater role in state Democratic party activity.

RIGHTS LAW

Truck Stop, where comedian Dick Gregory and Arkansas Project Director Bill Hansen were arrested earlier this year, a white customer hit a Negro SNCC worker. At another eating place, a white man threatened the group with a shotgun.

In Helena, Arkansas, three Negroes - including two SNCC workers - were arrested July 7 near a swimming pool after integrating a formerly all-white library and restaurant. SNCC worker Hansen reported that two of the arrested men were beaten by Helena police.

In Jackson, Mississippi, Negroes integrated a movie theatre and two hotels. In Texarkana, Texas, four people were injured in an exchange of gunfire over an integration attempt at a beach. In St. Augustine, Florida, 15 white youths attacked five Negroes, including a woman and a child, while they were fishing. In Ocala, Florida, four restaurants served Negroes but a fifth refused to serve an all- Negro group. A Fort Smith, Arkansas swimming pool was peacefully integrated by eight Negro boys. In Baton Rouge, Louisiana, a white government worker hit a Negro who took part in integrating a cafeteria at the state capitol.

In other Georgia incidents, Negroes were admitted to a previously all-white pool in East Point and five eating places in Warner Robins, but were turned away from three eating places in Perry and a Winder movie theatre by mobs of whites. The East Point pool was later closed after a fight at the pool's parking lot. In Brunswick, city and county pools were closed down.

NEWS ROUNDUP

GOULD, ARK. - The Arkansas SNCC project has expanded its voter registration drive to this small town about 30 miles from the Mississippi Delta, in Lincoln County.

Bill Hansen, 23, of Pine Bluff, who directs SNCC's work in this state, said workers had been based here since May.

The county's population is about 35 to 50 percent Negro.

ALBANY, GA. - A renewed effort at registering Negro potential voters will be made here and elsewhere in the state in connection with recent passage of a new election laws code which reopened registrar's books in Georgia.

Don Harris, 24, director of SNCC's Southwest Georgia project, said SNCC workers in the 22 counties of Georgia's 2nd Congressional District were devoting most of their time to a concentrated vote drive.

SNCC workers have been active in the campaign of Attorney C.B. King, the first Negro to run for U. S. Congress in the state in modern times.

Prior to enactment of the new code, the deadline for registering to vote in the primary elections was May 2. That deadline is now July 20.

CAMBRIDGE, MD. - Maryland Governor J. Millard Tawes ordered the National Guard withdrawn from here July 7 after more than a year of martial law in this Eastern Shore City, scene of SNCC work since December 1961.

BROWNING, MISSISSIPPI - A Negro church, located in the middle of an all-white neighborhood, was burned to the ground after church member refused to sell to a white property owner.

Pleasant Plan Missionary Baptist Church burned while local firemen stood by and watched. SNCC workers Fred Mangrum and Ed Rudd said the cinderblock structure was still burning at 6:00 a.m. on Saturday morning, July 11.

According to reports from the SNCC office in Greenwood, a Browning white man had asked church members to sell him the building and property.

They refused, and the local sheriff told them the church would have to be moved.

The "Community Centers," primarily for adults will each have a library, sewing facilities, literacy and child care classes, health programs and instruction in Negro history.

No more summer volunteers are being accepted for the summer project.

"We see the Freedom Schools and community centers as a natural part of our voting program," SNCC Executive Secretary James Forman said. There are more SNCC staff members in Mississippi than other rights groups have throughout the South.

THE NEW MOUNT OLIVE BAPTIST CHURCH in Sasser, Georgia was re-dedicated two weeks ago. The church - and two others near here - were burned down by nightriders two years ago while SNCC was using them for voter registration meetings.

Samstein, Sweeney, McCord, and Walker are white; the others are Negroes.

Three Negro homes were bombed in McComb on June 23. This small southwest Mississippi town was the site of the first Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee voter registration voter registration project in 1961. SNCC worker Bob Moses, now Program Director for the state-wide Mississippi Freedom Summer Project, began work as the first SNCC field worker in August 1961.

The drive three years ago was met with official resistance and terror tactics from local whites, as is the state-wide drive today.

Moses and other SNCC staff members, including Hayes, who joined the anti - segregation group's staff then, were jailed several times by local law officers. Moses was jailed in nearby Liberty on August 15, 1961, as he accompanied three people to the registrar's office there. On August 29, 1961, he was beaten by the son of a Mississippi law officer on a Liberty street.

A local Negro supporter, Herbert Lee, was killed September 25, 1961, by a member of the state legislature, and a witness to that shooting was murdered on February 1, 1964.

The Ku Klux Klan and another racist group, the Americans for Preservation of the White Race (APWR), have begun organizational drives throughout Southwest Mississippi. Arsene Dick, APWR president, says his all-male, all-white group has chapters in 30 Mississippi counties and a membership "in the five figure bracket."

There are more than 15,000 Negroes in Pike County. Fewer than 164 are registered voters.

A NEED RECENTLY MET BY OPERATION FREEDOM

AN EXAMPLE OF THE KIND OF HELP OPERATION FREEDOM HAS BEEN GIVING

The Holmes family: Dock Holmes, 76; Mrs. Maggie Morton, 82 (Mrs. Holmes' sister); Mrs. Holmes, 68.

In a county in west Tennessee there today stands a tent, a tent torn ragged by the wind and rain. Until recently that tent (a leftover from "Tent City," moved to a private farm) had served as the home for three elderly people, the Dock Holmes family. More than four years ago, they had registered to vote. In 1960 they voted for the first time in their lives. Evicted from their house, they had to live wherever they could.

They moved into a tent colony ("Tent City") set up for persons in that county who had been evicted for trying to register. The Holmeses could have left the county, but where would they go? They had lived there all their lives, it was home to them, and they were determined to remain regardless of the outcome.

Registering to vote was of far greater significance to them than to most people. Mrs. Holmes said one day, "Me and my husband sit in the tent and talk about it. Something about it makes you feel uplifted."

Their only income is a monthly social security check. No help of any kind comes from the county welfare department. They have repeatedly been denied government surplus foods.

A few months ago the Holmes family started setting aside part of their social security money for used lumber and nails and other things needed to build a house. They could buy only a little at a time. "We don't know when we'll be able to finish the house," Mrs. Holmes said, "May not ever be able to finish it."

It was at this point that Operation Freedom learned of the Holmeses' plight and gave money necessary for the completion of the house, which meant putting the siding and roof on the house and putting up the inner walls and ceiling.

House almost ready to move into.

Tent where Holmes family had been living.

Just before they moved in, Mrs. Holmes said, "We learned to do without after registering." Even before registering to vote, they had lived poorly enough. Mr. Holmes had worked other men's land all his life. "Some years we didn't make anything," he said, "some years we didn't even make the rent." What he earned was never more than enough to buy necessities.

Today, as people come by to visit the Holmes family in their new house, Mr. Holmes laughingly tells how when it thunders Mrs. Holmes, still thinking of the time in the leaky old tent, grabs up a newspaper and runs to fill up the holes.

We are glad that for them the holes are there no longer.

– AND NOW HATTIESBURG

OPERATION FREEDOM NOW TURNS TOWARD THE HATTIESBURG, MISSISSIPPI AREA WHERE MANY PEOPLE ARE MEETING ECONOMIC REPRISALS AND PHYSICAL VIOLENCE

Whereas registering to vote began on a large scale in Haywood and Fayette counties, Tennessee, it certainly did not stop there. Because these people stood their ground bravely, in the face of severe opposition and reprisals, people in other areas of the south began to register and to face reprisals.

People in the Hattiesburg area recently tried to register. Even though the registrar was ordered by the federal government to stop discriminating against Negro applicants, he did not do so. On January 22, "Freedom Day," an intensive vote drive began. Arrests, loss of jobs, economic boycotts, and other harassments followed - all the things which had occurred in west Tennessee and other places where people joined the voter registration movement.

Operation Freedom will now attempt to give the same kind of emergency help to the stricken in Hattiesburg as it has given elsewhere - short range emergency assistance that will enable these stricken people to stay in their area in order that they might try to effect the basic changes necessary for a better life.

An Operation Freedom representative working in the Hattiesburg area reports the following:

¶ A minister lost his job as a county schoolbus driver, lost small plumbing jobs, lost credit with merchants, lost some church members, and was the victim of shots (fired at his house) - all because he had registered to vote.

¶ A maid was fired when she told her employers she planned to attend the street rally of Rev. John Cameron, a Negro Baptist minister running for Congress from the 5th District of Mississippi.

¶ A man was fired from his job at a country club after it was learned that he was among the picketeers in front of the courthouse on January 22, "Freedom Day."

Operation Freedom channels money directly from you, and other donors, to people suddenly in dire straits. All of the money which you send goes to the people you are trying to help, none of it going for defraying administrative costs.

Operation Freedom, which has been functioning for more than three years, is the only organization devoted solely to carrying on such a program of assistance. Operation Freedom has already channeled more than $100,000 - in form of loans (and in a few cases gifts) - to scores of families and individuals. Even though this seems a large amount of money, it must be stressed that the urgent needs are greater than the dollars Operation Freedom has available.

Although Operation Freedom now concentrates on the emergency-type need in the Hattiesburg area, it will also continue to respond to emergencies presented to Operation Freedom's national board by local committees in any area which was once as "hot" as Hattiesburg, but which now naturally has fewer cases of this desperate kind of need.

MISSISSIPPI SUMMER PROJECT

VOTER REGISTRATION

The struggle for freedom in Mississippi can only be won by a combination of action within the state and a heightened awareness throughout the country of the need for massive federal intervention to ensure the voting rights of Negroes. This summer's program will work toward both objectives.

Voter registration workers will operate in every rural county and important urban area in the state. These workers will be involved in a summer-long drive to mobilize the Negro community of Mississippi and assist in developing local leadership and organization.

Forty thousand dollars must be raised for a Freedom Registration campaign. The registration campaign which was launched in February will be implemented by summer workers. Freedom Registrars will be established in every precinct, with registration books closely resembling the official books of the state. The Freedom Registration books will serve as a basis for challenging the official books and the validity of "official" federal elections this fall.

Finally, voter registration workers will assist in the summer campaigns of Freedom Candidates who will be running for congressional office.

FREEDOM SCHOOLS

An integral part of SNCC's voter registration work is the development of leadership for politically emerging communities. Freedom Schools will begin to supply the political education which the existing system does not provide for Negroes in Mississippi.

The summer project will establish ten daytime Freedom Schools and three resident schools. The daytime schools will be attended by 10th, 11th, and 12th grade pupils; the schools will operate five days a week in the students' home towns. Instruction will be highly individualized—each school will have about fifteen teachers and fifty students. The program will include remedial work in reading, math and basic grammar, as well as seminars in political science, the humanities, journalism and creative writing. Whereever possible, studies will be related to problems in the students' own society.

The three resident schools will be attended by more advance students from throughout the state. The program will be essentially the same as that of the day schools, with emphasis on political studies.

The students who attend the schools will provide Mississippi with a nucleus of leadership committed to critical thought and social action.

COMMUNITY CENTERS

In addition to the Freedom Schools, Community Centers will provide services normally denied the Negro community in Mississippi. Staffed by experienced social workers, nurses, librarians and teachers in the arts and crafts, the centers will provide educational and cultural programs for the community. Instruction will be given in pre-natal and infant care, and general hygiene; programs will provide adult literacy and vocational training. The thirty thousand books now in SNCC's Greenwood office library will be distributed to these centers, and others will be obtained. The centers will serve as places of political education and organization, and will provide a structure to channel a wide range of programs into the Negro community in the future.

RESEARCH PROJECT

The program of voter registration and political organization will attempt to change the fundamental structure of political and economic activity in Mississippi. In order to accurately picture this structure, extensive research must be done into Mississippi's suppressive political and economic life. Skilled personnel are needed to carry out this program both from within and outside the state.

WHITE COMMUNITY PROJECT

The effort to organize and educate Mississippi whites in the direction of democracy and decency can no longer be delayed. About thirty students, Southern whites who have recently joined the civil rights movement, will begin pilot projects in white communities. An attempt will be made to organize poor white areas to make steps toward eliminating bigotry, poverty and ignorance.

LAW STUDENT PROJECT

A large number of law students will come to Mississippi to launch a massive legal offensive against the official tyranny of the state. The time has come to challenge every Mississippi law which deprives Negroes of their rights, and to bring suit against every state and local official who commits crimes in the name of his office.

DEVELOPMENT OF THE MISSISSIPPI PROJECT

Although the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee has active projects in thirteen Southern states, it has achieved its most dynamic success in the state of Mississippi. A state where individual political life is nonexistant, where the economic condition of a vast majority of the population is appalling, the home of white supremacy, Mississippi has become the main target of SNCC's staff and resources.

In August, 1961, SNCC went into Mississippi under the leadership of Project Director Robert Moses. Overcoming violence and hardship, SNCC workers have been able to expand their activity into all five of Mississippi's congressional districts. By fall, 1963, SNCC had joined with CORE, SCLC, the NAACP and many voting and civic groups in forming a statewide organization, the Council of Federated Organizations (COFO), and through COFO conducted a Freedom Vote campaign in which 80,000 disenfranchised Negroes cast ballots for Aaron Henry for Governor.

Preparation for real democracy calls for additional programs in the state. Literacy projects have been instituted, and food and clothing drives. But much more comprehensive programs are needed to combat the terrible cultural and economic deprivation of Negro communities in Mississippi.

This summer, SNCC, in cooperation with COFO, is launching a massive Peace Corps-type operation in Mississippi. Students, teachers, technicians, nurses, artists and legal advisors will be recruited to come to Mississippi to staff a wide range of programs that include voter registration, freedom schools, community centers and special projects.

PROGRESS IN MISSISSIPPI DEPENDS ON YOU

The Mississippi Summer Project needs money now to establish and support the activities described in this pamphlet. We are asking the people of America—individuals as well as institutions—to contribute now to assist SNCC in its commitment to the struggle for justice in the state of Mississippi.

A contribution in any amount will be of help. For example:

$5 will supply school materials for one day-student for the entire summer.

$25 will pay the utility bills for one Freedom School for the summer.

$50 will buy office materials for one voter registration field office.

$125 will buy one tape recorder for a Freedom School.

$400 will provide scholarship money for one Southern Negro college student, enabling him to return to school after working in Mississippi for the summer.

$2000 will rent and remodel a building for one Community Center.

$3000 will buy one used bus for transporting vote workers and registrants.

WORK-STUDY PROJECT

The Work-Study Project

The Work-Study Project is sponsored by the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and Tougaloo College.

The project was begun because many students wanted to work in the movement but were afraid they would not be able to go back to school. The Work-Study Project gives these students a chance to work on voter registration and attend school also. It is called a work-study project because people in the project will do voter registration work for one month, then attend institutes for one month.

During the voter registration work, people in the project will go to different parts of Mississippi to work in a SNCC voter registration drive with the Council of Federated Organizations (COFO). They will be SNCC field secretaries. During the study period, all of the work-study people will come together for discussions, lectures and classes on many things that are not taught in Mississippi's schools. They will learn about Negro history, the government of the state and the country, and many other things.

Who Can Come?

Only thirty people can join a Work-Study Project each year. They must:

- live in Mississippi, and
- plan to go to Tougaloo College.

The Field Foundation will provide a one-year scholarship to Tougaloo.

How Can You Become A Part?

To become a part of the Work-Study Project, you must:

- send an application to Tougaloo College, Office of Admissions, Tougaloo, Miss.
- be accepted by Tougaloo before you can be accepted by the Work-Study Project. But do not wait until you are accepted by Tougaloo to apply to the Work-Study Project.
- file an application with the Work-Study Project. You can get an application at any COFO office or by writing to:

FREEDOM RALLY

DICK GREGORY

SNCC FREEDOM SINGERS

Songs of the Southern Freedom Movement

Like the civil rights workers themselves the songs of the movement bring news of freedom and justice to the South. They protest white-only restaurants and hotels, vote discrimination, economic pressures and deprivation, and intimidation and brutality by white citizens and police . . . and they strengthen the spirit and drive that is changing all this. They ring out from . . .

the farmers' shacks
and dusty roads of the South . . .

the county churches . . .

the sit-ins . . .

the picket lines . . .

the southern stockades and prisons . . .

the freedom rallies . . .

the voter registration drives . . .

. . . Without them the movement would lack a vital and enriching force which brings depth and meaning to the cry for FREEDOM NOW. They are the songs that will not be stilled until the struggle for freedom and dignity is won.

DICK GREGORY

Dick Gregory's activities in the civil rights struggle dates back to his high school days. As a track star at Sumner High School in St. Louis he led a march on the Board of Education because the athletic records at the segregated Negro meets were not included in official record books. This demonstration helped to contribute to eventual desegregation in St. Louis public schools. While at Southern Illinois University he helped lead successful protests against restricted seating of Negroes in the balcony of the Varsity Theatre.

After gaining national prominence as a comedian, Gregory continued in the freedom struggle, giving numerous benefits and speaking tours for various civil rights groups. At a mass rally in Jackson, Mississippi, a voter registration worker whose wife had died while he was in jail, told Gregory of his experiences. The comedian decided then to become more directly involved in the struggle. This decision led him into direct action in cities in which he has been arrested at least eight times, posted bonds totalling $2,000.00, served a total of two months in jail and lost more than $100,000.00 in canceled engagements. In one week alone he canceled $42,000.00 in performances to participate in demonstrations.

Despite the risk to his career, his family, his earnings and his life Gregory has vowed to remain in the fight for human rights. He has already spent more than one-half of his earnings as a professional entertainer in the cause. His wife, Lillian, who has participated in drives beside her husband and has gone to jail in Alabama and Georgia (sometimes while pregnant), supports Gregory's conviction and action with her own.

Dick Gregory appears today as part of a 30-day fund-raising tour for the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

SNCC FREEDOM SINGERS

THE FREEDOM SINGERS appear today representing hundreds of freedom fighters who are struggling to bring a new hope of democracy to the South. Theirs is the story of voter registration drives met by snarling police dogs, of picket lines turned back by fire hoses and of sit-ins ended with electric cattle prods. Theirs is also the story of a determination and commitment which has given Americans everywhere a vision of freedom.

MARSHALL JONES, 26, is from Knoxville, Tennessee. He is a graduate of Florida A. & M. University and became involved in the civil rights movement while studying for his Master's degree at the University of Tennessee. He has been arrested twice for civil rights activity. He was a prize winner at last year's University of Tennessee Folk Festival and has sung with the Knoxville Civic Opera.

EMORY HARRIS, is 20 years old and from Albany, Georgia. He first came into the movement while still a high school student during the time of massive demonstrations in that city. He has worked in SNCC vote drives in Terrell and Lee Counties in southwest Georgia, and has been arrested seven times in connection with that work.

JAMES PEACOCK, 28, is a native Mississippian who first became active in voter resistration work in South Carolina. He returned to Mississippi and has worked for SNCC in Greenwood, Vicksburg and Jackson. His civil rights work has led to three arrests.

CHARLES "Chuck" NEBLETT toured with the first Freedom Singers group, appearing at Carnegie Hall, on television and on campuses throughout the country. Twenty-two year old Neblett left Southern Illinois University to work with SNCC in Cairo, Illinois and Missouri in the summer of 1962 and has since worked in Mississippi.

MATTHEW JONES, 27, is from Knoxville, Tennessee. He has been arrested 20 times for civil rights participation and was active in SNCC's Danville, Virginia, drive in the summer of 1963. A former school teacher, Jones has lost work in Macon, Georgia and Tennessee because of his civil rights work. He has composed many freedom songs, some of which the Freedom Singers will present tonight.

On February 1, 1960 four Negro college students sat down at a lunch counter in Greensboro, N. C. and asked that they be served. These four students have today been joined by hundreds of young people who work for the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee. They form the front lines of the freedom movement which has shaken the conscience and social structure of the South and of the entire country.

Today over 130 SNCC workers man voter registration and direct action projects throughout the South. Now located in some 60 counties from Texas to Maryland, SNCC field secretaries will also be based in all 82 Mississippi counties by mid-summer.

SNCC workers, most of them college students taking time out from studies or recent graduates delaying professional careers, receive subsistence wages. They live in homes of the people with whom they work and take part in the rural life of the Black Belt South. Food, clothing and their $10.00 weekly pay is shared among all, for their constituents are among the most impoverished in the land. As a part of their daily work, SNCC staff members conduct classes in freedom schools which augment inferior state education, organize the distribution of food and clothing sent for emergency relief and, above all, inspire in the community a sense of hope for a future of dignity and freedom.

SNCC workers daily risk their lives in the face of police suppression and local terrorism. They are convinced, however, that democracy will have its test in the most resistant areas of the hard core Black Belt South. They cannot continue without your help.

On two of St. Augustine's murky nights, after state troopers in large numbers had been called in to stop beatings, brick and acid throwing, and other violence against non-violent demonstrators, white people bearing anti-Negro signs, led by racists, marched in a demonstration procession of their own through the main Negro neighborhood of the city. The troopers in a line longer than the procession of 170, walked beside them to protect them, as they had also done for the Negros. The white marchers include persons recognizable as members of the mob which had waited nightly to shout at and attack the Negro demonstrators. There were also children and women. Two boys, of the age for Boy Scout hikes, shambled along, side by side, eyes excited.

When this strange procession, with the armed troopers flashing lights to the sides, their police dogs barking, reached the entrance to the neighborhood, a sign greeted them: "Welcome. Peace and brotherhood to you." On the first night, as the column of whites moved by the sign along a dark street of Negro store fronts, a trooper whispered to himself: "God damn. It's dynamite." There was no violence either night.

The second night, when the procession filed into the same street, it was lined on both sides by Negroes. Some held signs: I am an American" ... "Equality for all in '64..." They extended the length of street, a good three blocks, outnumbering the white marchers probably three to one. They were still, almost motionless. And as the procession of whites, with Confederate flags and a big American flag, and their own signs - "Kill the Civil set italics Rights Bill"..."Put George Wallace on the Supreme Court"..."Don't Tread on Me" -- went by, the Negroes sang their battle song: "I love everybody." Slowly, mournfully, softly, along the whole street, as the silent procession went by, they sang. An old Negro man and woman stood, arm in arm, staring at the white procession with eyes of loathing pain. "I love everybody..." they sang. A second floor porch over a store was filled with Negroes, staring down, singing. "Look up that Nigger's dress," one in the march said. Others shushed him. The song continued:

"I love everybody. I love everybody. I love everybody. I love everybody in my heart...You can't make me doubt him. You can't make me doubt him. You can't make me doubt him in my heart."

Down the darkened streets of residential sections, the procession moved, by a yard full of blooming flowers, by a shack with jazz blaring tinnily out, by the solemn, sorrowful faces of a family on a porch -- two children, a woman, a young man, his face angry. Most of the houses were darkened. Children's eyes peeped from behind curtains drawn in a window, visible in the darting beams of the troopers flashlights.

Near the end of the march a short line of Negroes stood on a corner, singing, "We shall overcome." Another was at the next corner. The song echoed in silent, dark streets, against the cadence of the marching feet. "We are not afraid," a slim Negro woman standing alone on her front porch joined in.

Along the last street, tension gone, jokes stirring in the ranks, the procession went.

The police lights kept flashing, and two of them caught a woman in slacks standing on her porch, holding a baby, looking out. As the two lights held in a cross on her face she bent it to kiss her baby.

"Let's give a hand," shouted the leader in a speech at the end of the march, "to our law enforcement officers for protecting us from th~~e~~ose black savages."

St. Augustine was the South's last great demonstration campaign against ~~[illegible]~~ legally supported segregation of public accommodations, the struggle continuing right up to signing of the civil rights law, as though to illustrate daily the desperate need for the law.

It showed, in counterpoint to violence broken loose in Negro ghettos of the North, once more the majesty of the non-violent movement, its mood and meaning, and the ~~[illegible]~~ sadness of American failures to respond in kind.

And beyond the struggle over race, it contained ingredients of what many are coming to discern as a larger national conflict emerging, involving freedom and justice and their opposites.

St. Augustine is regarded as the oldest city in America; ~~it~~ it is on the Atlantic coast, 30 miles below Jacksonville, and has a population of 15,000, of which 23% are Negroes.

The first-wave student sit-ins made no dent there. Dr. R. W. Puryear, president of the all-Negro Florida Memorial College, told a story about what happened in 1961 which conformed to observable patterns of 1964. Negro youngsters were locked in a variety store where they attempted to get service. ~~Men identified as sheriffs' deputies allowed~~ ~~a~~ A gang of local white toughs were allowed to come into the store, and they set upon the demonstrators, beating them badly.

Another round of demonstrations occurred in the summer of 1963. They succeeded in removing discriminatory signs in public facilities, and in desegregating lunch counters at two chain variety stores.

With ~~Threat of~~ a court suit threatened, ~~succeeded in desegregating~~ local schools were voluntarily desegregated to the extent that six Negro children were admitted in the fall of 1963.

Such progress was against a backdrop of such severe law enforcement as arrest of Negroes for distributing handbills, and the sentencing of four young demonstrators by Juvenile Court Judge Charles Mathis Jr. to what amounted to an indefinite term in the State reformatory. Their parents had refused to agree that they would demonstrate no more, and even when they did agree, six months later, it took a state board to free them. Bitterness about this still rankles.

The progress was also in the midst of waves of violence against Negroes. Ironically, the only fatality was a white man, shot to death in the fall of 1963 while riding with a shotgun through a Negro neighborhood where homes had been fire-bombed and shot into. Three Negro leaders were arrested.

In early 1964, during a lull in violence after the act of Supreme lawlessness which killed President Kennedy, there were signs of conciliation, a move toward a biracial committee. But violence, more fierce than before, intervened.

There were beatings and rifle fire into homes. Two Negro families had supplied the children who desegregated schools. One had its car burned while the parents were at a PTA meeting. The other had its home burned up.

Rifle slugs ripped into the home of Dr. R. N. Hayling, as his wife and two daughters slept. A boxer dog in the living room was killed. Dr. Hayling, a young dentist and Korean War veteran, had led the NAACP action during the summer. But after a severe beating by the Ku Klux Klan, and a rebuff by federal judge William McRae in an unsuccessful civil rights case over demonstrations, he had declared himself out of civil rights activity. The early 1964 violence apparently brought him back in; he soon emerged as head of a St. Augustine branch of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, which led the spring and summer demonstrations in 1964.

No arrests were made during this siege of violence. ~~As in other parts of the South, accusations were whispered that Negroes did it.~~

The impact of terriorism in the specific human situation is easily glossed over. Out of the mouths of children, one gets a fleeting impression of its feel. "Does this mean," asked one of the school desegregation youngsters, whose home was burned, "that I can't go back to my school?" Said one of Dr. Hayling's little girls: "Daddy, they didn't understand about our dog. He looked real mean but he wouldn't hurt anybody. They shouldn't have killed him."

The beating of Dr. Hayling and three other St. Augustine Negroes occured in September, 1963, at a Ku Klux Klan meeting half a mile off U.S. Highway 1 just outside St. Augustine. The Florida Council on Human Relations published an eyewitness account by the Rev. Irvin Cheney of Daytona Beach written without notes immediately after he was there. It included an oration by a [redacted] Klan preacher, [redacted] the content of which helps in understanding the emotional climate of later events.

"But anyhow," [redacted] the Klan preacher is quoted as telling the crowd of 250 people, some robed and masked, "They [FBI] came by and said, 'Now you don't really advocate violence do you?' And I said, 'The hell you say. The niggers has declared all-out war on the plan of God and on God's family, the white man, and in war you shoot.' Then they said to me, 'Do you know who bombed the church in Birmingham?' And I said, 'No, and if I did, I wouldn't tell you.'

"But I'll tell you here tonight, if they can find those fellows they ought to pin medals on them. Someone said, 'Ain't it a shame that them little children was killed.' Well they don't know what they are talking about. In the first place, they ain't little. They're 14 or 15 years old--old enough to have venereal disease, and I'll be surprised if all of 'em didn't have one or more. In the second place, they weren't children. Children are little people, little human beings and that means white people. There's little monkeys, but you don't call them children...There's little dogs and cats and apes and baboons and skunks and there's also little niggers. But they ain't children...And in the third place, it wasn't no shame they were killed. Why? Because when I go out to kill rattlesnakes, I don't make no difference between little rattlesnakes and big rattlesnakes...So I kill 'em all, and if there's four less niggers tonight, then, I say, 'Good for whoever planted the bomb.'"

Such "preachers" were on hand during 1964's summer crisis, exhorting the mob.

Dr. Hayling, in an interview, told about the beating. He and the other three Negroes, apparently hoping to listen to the meeting from a side road, were caught and carried before the crowd. A stunned silence greeted their audacity, broken finally by a woman's scream: "Kill 'em. Castrate 'em."

They were beaten unconscious. Dr. Hayling said he heard someone say: "Work on his right hand; he's a right handed dentist." He said he regained consciousness to find himself piled upon the other three men, "like firewood." "Did you ever smell a nigger burn?" he said he heard a Klansman say. "Just wait until Klan brother so-and-so gets back with five gallons of gasoline and then you can. It's a mighty sweet smell."

Upon this scene, St. Johns County Sheriff L. O. Davis finally arrived. He arrested four Klansmen. St. Augustine justice found them innocent of assault on the Negroes - who had had to be given hospital treatment from the beatings. Subsequent charges of assault were placed against the Negroes, this based in part on discovery of a gun in their car. They were found guilty, and have appealed.

Before the beating, in August 1963, the Florida Advisory Committee to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights held hearings in St. Augustine, and issued a report which forecast much of what was to come.

It recommended that the federal government not grant a requested $350,000 to the city for celebration of its 400th anniversary in 1965. (So far it hasn't, and local officials seem reconciled that it won't.) The planning of the celebration, keyed to attracting tourists and Latin American cooperation, stood out among exercises in unreality during the crisis.

A planning dinner in the early summer of 1963, at which then Vice President Johnson was honor guest, barely averted embarrassment from demonstrators. Local Negroes still feel promises made then toward reconciliation were not kept. A dinner for the Pan-American Union Committee interested in the celebration had to be moved in the spring of 1964 to Washington to avoid demonstrations. Dr. Hayling, in some bitterness, some hope, still keeps in his office a document on the Pan-American Union, and quotes some of its ideology: "All men are born free and equal in dignity and in rights, and being endowed by nature with reason and conscience, they should conduct themselves as brothers, one to another..."

Earle W. Newton, executive secretary of the local quaddricentennial commission, a transplanted New Englander, blamed both embarrassments on "Radical elements" among Negroes trying to get "publicity." Blandly, he described plans of the commission to restore ancient buildings, to hold a year-long pageant in 1965, and to establish a great, "Inter-American Center" as a link to Latin America. Asked if he honestly conceived of these things happening in a city so committed to segregation (an anomoly among the state's resorts), he said he realized the "racial problem" would have to be solved.

Then he said: "With all the sympathy I have for the Negro cause, I think their problems are two. One is a demand for basic human rights. The other is a demand for publicity. And I'm not sure if they did get the first, the second would be satisfied."

White?

So much for the Negroes' sympathizers in St. Augustine. The Advisory Committee had also recommended the suspension of federal contracts for Fairchild Stratos Corp., "until it ends discriminatory practises and the intimidation of Negro workers," and remedial steps against the union there, the International Machinists, Local 1224.

Fairchild, whose sole business in its St. Augustine plant is repairing government planes, came up in testimony in federal court during the crisis. James Hauser, an employe, testified that he was beat up on company property (the parking lot) by six men, three of whom were plant employes. He also said that Klan symbols and epithets were chalked on plant equipment and washrooms.

In an interview, ~~In his office at the plant,~~ W. N. (Buck) Hall, plant superintendent, explained that the old advisory committee charges of discrimination in the plant had been a misunderstanding, and that all had been cleared up. About the beating, he said Mr. Hauser should have sworn out a warrant and let a jury act~~ on the beating~~. (Mr. Hauser had been one of the four victims of the earlier Klan beating and its subsequent legal action.) "We're in a tough spot," Mr. Hall said, without elaborating. He said he talked to Mr. Hauser the day after the beating, and his face showed no signs of ~~Yet~~ his having been hit. He said Mr. Hauser's statements previously had been false. Asked if he was still an employe, he said he was. Later reports indicated that one of Mr. Hauser's assailant, Holstead Richard (Hoss) Manucy, was fired from the plant over the beating.

Mr. Hall denied the charges about the Klan in the plant. Then he said a peculiar thing for an "old Southern boy," as he called himself. He said he just didn't know much about the Ku Klux Klan, not enough to say anything about it. "They might have a good cause, as far as I know..."

Having cited two of the three major outside influences on St. Augustine (the third is tourism), the advisory committee (whose hearing was not attended by city officials) called the city "a segregated superbomb aimed at the heart of Florida's economy and political integrity--the fuse is short."

The bomb burst first during Easter week of 1964. With 40,000 on hand for a big "Easter parade," featuring Mother Goose and Alice in Wonderland characters, Negro pickets turned out carrying signs more attuned to the religious significance of the season. Sit-ins were resumed. Participants included prominent New Englanders, the most prominent, Mrs. Malcolm Peabody, mother of the governor of Massachusetts, and wife of a retired Episcopal bishop.

This 72-year-old lady was among scores arrested for attempting to get interracial service in various of the luxurious motel dining rooms of the city. She was placed in the St. Johns County Jail ~~jailed~~, (and later described crowded conditions in it.) ~~the St. Johns County jail~~. ~~From a long lifetime of valuable good works at home, she had come to know the~~

~~special venom of the racist stricture to concerned Americans from without the South that they cleaned up their own [illegible] before protesting southern outrages.~~

Between this episode and the last week in May, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference picked St. Augustine as the site of its first big campaign of the "long, hot summer." The locale was considered appropriate to set a tone for the fateful summer, the tone in such a small-town southern Negro community reliably predictable as non-violent and movingly spiritual, and, as it turned out, the tone of the white reaction typifying the worst of excesses.

On the night of May 26, Negroes began the non-violent protest marches which kept up for a month as the symbolic confrontation of the crisis.

The marches moved from Negro churches in a generally Negro residential area southeast of the downtown area. The "slave market," which sits at one end of one of the old city's block-long, middle-of-the-street parks, became the center of ~~one of the~~ a non-sequitor argument~~s~~ of the type which rise amid the emotion of such situations. Negroes claimed it as a rallying point on grounds that in it, ~~was a site where~~ their ancestors were sold as human chattel. White residents stoutly maintained that its name came from a less brutal aspect of the peculiar institution, the use of it by slaves to sell produce and handicrafts in olden times.

Whatever its antecedents, the slave market became a strategic goal. The first march attained it with no opposition, about the only contrary voice being that of a man in a store-front headquarters of gubernatorial candidate Haydon Burns, a segregationist. It was election night, and the man shouted: "If our man's in, you niggers have had it." (His man was in.)

The next night, a gang of white toughs---from then on to be omnipresent in crisis developments--was ensconsed in the slave market. The Negroes, with word going down the line that the Klan was up ahead, marched up to them, and by them. There was no violence, but reporters observed such weapons among the whites as bicycle chains and iron pipes.

Such weapons were used by the same gang of white toughs the next night--not as much on demonstrators as on newsmen. Local police with police dogs were between the marchers and the mob, but got out of the way. Cameras and tape recorders were snatched and smashed. Someone hit NBC cameraman Irvin Gans on the back of the head with a bicycle chain. He was put in the hospital. Other cameraman were chased.

"Niggers ain't got no God," a member of the mob shouted when the marchers tried to kneel and pray. One demonstrator, a Negro man, was clubbed on the head ~~by the mob~~.

Harry Boyte, 52, a white official of SCLC, attempted to take a picture of the violence. A tough jumped on him, and a policeman with a dog moved in, They all rolled to the ground. A television reporter flung himself over Boyte to protect him.

Later that night, a shotgun was fired at Mr. Boyte and his college-age son as they drove into their motel. Neither was hit.

Still later that night, eleven rifle bullets and a shotgun charge were pumped from three directions into a beach cottage rented by Dr. King. A light was burning in the cottage, but it was not occupied that night. Dr. King and SCLC officials had been in it on previous nights.

There were no arrests in any of these acts of violence. There were however arrests that week and subsequent ones of demonstrators seeking service at St. Augustine public accommodations. They were charged with violating a Florida private property law.

After such a night, the St. Augustine Record in an editorial initialed by A. H. Tebault Jr., general manager and son of the owner, declared: "Most solid citizens who believe in strong law enforcement and general adherence and respect by the public are rapidly becoming 'fed up' with minority groups that flaunt the law and then cry 'police brutality.'...Both the city and county law enforcement officers have done an excellent job in prohibiting serious violent actions during the latest period of unrest..." In its news columns, the paper said newsmen "set off" the violence by their presence.

By contrast, the Daytona Beach Morning Journal commented: "All hurlers of invectives and brandishers of sticks and clubs should be arrested.

"And then the leading citizens should get together in a spirit of calm determination to work out rational solutions to the city's problems.

"The tolerance of violence can lead only to more violence and a bad name for St. Augustine and for Florida."

On the following night, local police and some state troopers blocked a march on one of the city's narrow streets. The sheriff had the night before told Negroes that night marches would be forbidden. The Negroes knelt to pray, police dogs bayed, and a man in a sport coat walked up to a photographer taking available light pictures of the scene and knocked his camera from his hands with a billy club. ~~breaking the photographer's knuckle.~~ A uniformed deputy looked on, and did nothing, and the photographer held his injured hand.

At this stage of things, newsmen reported seeing for the first time J.B. Stoner on the scene, riding around in a car with two other men, one of whom was armed with a pistol and a leather blackjack. Stoner is an Atlanta attorney long known to Southern police as an influence in extremist anti-Negro and anti-Jewish causes. He has defended Klansmen and others in cases involving racist violence. He has been designated as the vice presidential candidate of the National States Right Party, a fringe-element organization formerly concentrating on anti-Semiticism, more recently virulently anti-Negro. He later led the white marches, walking, as it was described in federal court, with a slight limp. A Florida legislative investigating committee said he and Connie Lynch, a Californian, were instrumental in provoking strife.

Negroes went into federal court on Monday asking an injunction against the ban on night marches on grounds that it violated First Amendment rights to free speech and to petition for redress of grievances, and Fourteenth Amendment protection of these rights. This was the first of three hearings in the court of District Judge Bryan Simpson in Jacksonville, all remarkable for what they revealed about conditions in St. Augustine.

Judge Simpson, a tall, gray-haired native Floridian, in this first hearing frequently directed questions from the bench to the officialdom of the city as one by one (police officers, Police Chief Virgil Stewart, Sheriff Davis, Mayor Joseph A. Shelly, City Manager Charles P. Barrier, and newspaperman Tebault), they gave greatly similar sworn testimony. The case they presented was essentially contradictory -- that the situation was dangerous enough to warrant abridgement of constitutional rights, but that law enforcement had not been wanting; stories of violence were exaggerated, and rather than an armed mob of hoodlums beating demonstrators, it was merely a group of high-spirited teen-agers. ~~had beset demonstrators.~~ While such an argument suited St. Augustine self-interest which is focused on attracting tourists from over the nation, it did not get far in meeting the simple demand of federal law in such a case--that proof of a clear and present danger against the safety of the community is the only legal excuse for abridging first-amendment rights.

Repeatedly, Judge Simpson asked these city officials, including Sheriff Davis, who was in charge of law enforcement, whether efforts had been made to get identification of armed whites gathered at the slave market, ~~and armed,~~ and whether efforts had been made to arrest them when they had committed violence. The answer was obviously no. At later hearings, the judge kept asking with the same insistence, and getting the same negative response, whether any responsible citizens had spoken out against violence , and for calm.

Testimony of Sheriff Davis indicated that state troopers had been assigned to St. Augustine. The Sheriff, as chief law officer of the county, was in charge of them. Judge Simpson began asking about emergency and "special" part-time deputies. The following is from the court transcript of his questioning of Sheriff Davis:

☐ The Court: And what is the number of these special deputies?

The Witness: Well, I had around forty for fifteen days in Easter.

The Court: Forty for fifteen days in Easter.

The Witness: During the Easter period and I have a total now of about, I'd say thirty--thirty-thirty-five special deputies.

The Court: Well, what is the source of them? Where do you get them?

The Witness: Well for instance, I have eight or ten from Fairchild.

The Court: Where is Fairchild? Oh, from the Fairchild Plant?

The Witness: Yes, Sir, and they, when I need them, I call the plant and ask for the foreman and he goes in and gets them and sends them right to me.

The Court: All right, where are the rest of them? Where do you get the rest of them?

The Witness: Around town, I have some from Diesel Sales and some businessmen. I have an engineer there.

The Court: Do you recruit them from the Ku Klux Klan there in St. Augustine, Sheriff Davis?

The Witness: No sir:

The Court: Are some of them Klansmen, some of these special deputies?

The Witness: No sir, not to my knowledge, if they are.

The Court: Are you a Klansman?

The Witness: No Sir.

The Court: What is the Ancient Gun Club?

The Witness: That was formed by a man there that's a ---he has a forestry outfit there...

[The name of the organization was later determined in court to be the Ancient City Hunting Club.]

...

The Court: Are you acquainted with the activities of the Ku Klux Klan in your county either officially or through unofficial observation?

The Witness: I don't think we had a klan there until last year when we had an incident south of town.

The Court: I ask you this, isn't the Ancient City Gun Club just the local name for the Klan down there?

The Witness: I--I don't think it is, your Honor. I've questioned everyone that I've had contact with. In fact, I've --

The Court: When you go to recruit these special deputies or somebody tells you to put on a special deputy, how carefully do you look into the background of the people that you put on?

The Witness: At that time, I couldn't look into it when I put them on.

The Court: You say that now there are about thirty-five or forty?

The Witness: Yes sir.

The Court: I suggest you have around a hundred special deputies, men that you have deputized and told you may call on them...

The Witness: I had --

The Court: At this time. I suggest that to you.

The witness: I don't know judge, I really don't --

The Court: Don't you know how many you've got?

The Witness: No sir, I don't.

The Court: I would like to satisfy myself about this matter I've asked Sheriff Davis to report to me about. I think as a law enforcement officer, Sheriff, you can appreciate the danger in a situation where you have the members of the klan or allied organizations as I know and understand their purposes, if you have thee people in your organization as deputies, whether you call them special deputies or auxiliaries or whatever you call them, in this situation.

At Judge Simpson's order, the sheriff produced in court the next day a list of his special deputies, and read the names off--well over a hundred. At the name, Holsted Manucy, Judge Simpson exclaimed: "Why that man's a convicted felon in this court!" Later, Holsted Manucy, known as "Hoss", emerged as the leader of the violent gang which ran roughshod over law officers to get at demonstrators. His men with two-way radio aerials on cars were omnipresent, as were young men and teenagers who followed him about. He made inflammatory speeches and granted interviews, explaining that his federal conviction was for nothing more than bootlegging, and denying affiliation of his gang with the Klan, although praising the Klan. A short, barrel-bodied man who wore a big black cowboy hat, he was strutting and making pronouncements about "niggers" to the end at the crisis. And to the end, he was ~~often~~ seen doing this in the Sheriff's office.

Judge Simpson asked for a cessation of demonstrations while he deliberated on the decision. Negro leaders had to debate it in the court corridor before reluctantly agreeing.

"This is a very important thing," said William M. Kunstler, one of the attorneys representing the Negroes, congratulating them. In one of those many overestimations of the public's ability to make such discernments, he went on: "This will show the nation that you are responsible."

During the truce which lasted all that week, Dr. King returned to St. Augustine on Thursday. At a press conference, he said that even including Albany[16] and Birmingham, "This to my mind is the most lawless community that we've ever worked in in the whole struggle over the past few years..."

And in one of the packed, steaming-hot mass meetings in a Negro church, where the real truth, infrequently perceived, of the southern Negro movement is to be found, with all of America's and the West's philosophical, political, and religious fundamentals spoken out in a great folk outpouring of song, prayer and speech, Dr. King said to the audience of typical ~~small southern~~ small-town Negro Southerners:

Corny!

"I want to commend you for the beauty [YES crackled a deep bass response of a kind always heard in such audiences] And the dignity and the courage [YES LORD] with which you carried out demonstrations last week. /applause/ I know what you faced. And I understand that as you marched silently with dignity and with a deep commitment to non-violence, you confronted the brutality of the klan. You confronted the brutality of individuals who feel thay can block our righteous efforts toward a just and free society by beating Negroes--and not only Negroes but by beating white people who are here to give objective coverage to what is taking place in this community. But amid all this you stood up...This was a beautiful witness...So I want to commend you, the heroes of St. Augustine...Soon the Klan will see...that all of their methods or all of their violence will not stop us for we are on the way to Freedom Land and we don't mean to stop 'til we get there.../fervent applause/

"Now they do other things. You know they threaten~~ed~~ us occasionally with more than beatings here and there. They threaten us with actual physical death. They think that this will stop the movement. I got word way out in California that a plan was underway to take my life in St. Augustine, Florida. Well, if physical death is the price that I must pay to free my white brother and all of my brothers and sisters from a permanent death of the spirit, then nothing can be more redemptive. /applause/ We have long since learned to sing anew with our foreparents of old that before I'll be a slave, I'll be buried in my grave and go home to my Father, and be ~~safe~~ saved... /applause/.

(The mass meetings have their own special heat, a physical presence in the South's sweating, cloud-brooding nights, and they have their special fervor, and their special beauty of simple people caught in something bigger than themselves, than present time, than even their nation: An old woman with thick-rimmed glasses far down on her nose, singing of freedom, and a big woman in a long flowered dress and a big sun hat, nodding vigorous assent to the cry to go to jail, and a young woman with a poodle cut, her baby in her arms, and a middle-class lady in a pink dress, and a teen-age girl in a yellow blouse and a young man in a blue t-shirt, and an old man with a farmer's lean face and long hands wearing black and white shoes, and two boys, solemn, one's head an African sculpture of clean, blue-black lines, all nodding, singing, clapping, shouting a belief bigger, still, than anything the earth has yet known. The Rev. C. T. Vivian, a tan-faced man with a thin moustache and liquid eyes, reported to them about the court procedure: "L.O. Davis was on the hot seat." They cheered, and cheered again when he described the reading of the deputy's list. And then they cheered as the Rev. Mr. Vivian broke off and introduced Attorney Kunstler, pointing to him, as heads turned to see him, coming in the rear door. He is a [redacted], vociferous spirit out of New York City, [redacted] a creature of a culture of much sophistication and tough-mindedness. He came forward, arms outstretched, grinning, and the Rev. Mr. Vivian moved down from the pulpit to meet him, and these two men, white and black, embraced each other there in front of a church full of people who had not seen this sort of thing before, and in the silence of seeing it, a sweet, soprano voice rose and the others joined in, and they sang to it, this sight saying so much of the meaning and truth and simple hope there in the church.

like hellin, I'm crying again

(Later, a speaker, making the numerous announcements of such meetings, said that Mr. Kunstler had not expected the case to last so long, and had not brought enough clothes, and would the ladies send up a volunteer to clean up his clothes, because he had to look "real nice" in court the next day. The ladies came forward.)

No move was made by the officials of the city during that week of truce to try to end the demonstrations by ~~the simple act of~~ sitting down and negotiating. SCLC invited this, and instead of demands set out "suggestion" in a letter to leaders. By then, the economic effect was being felt. The city depends upon the tourist trade; the figure most often used was that it supports 80 % of business. This is in a ~~way~~ manner different from most of Florida'a vacation resorts. Rather than visitors coming to stay their allotted week, two weeks, month or season under the sun, St. Augustine seems satisfied to attract ~~them~~ people briefly, for a night or an afternoon or an hour or two. The city's Chamber of Commerce has a list of 21 "attractions" in the city, most of them charging admission, and this sort of stop-and-look (and pay) traffic is the staple of the city's tourist industry. Tourists clip-cl~~a~~op in horse-drawn surreys through an incredible jumble of authentic historical sites and beautiful Spanish-Colonial architecture and tasteless side-show commercialism. When demonstrations were in full swing, the sight-seeing guides, some of them elderly Negro men wearing top hats, began including sites of conflict and terrorism, like the slave market, in the tours. This attitude seems closest to the truth that holds such a city together, along with the remark attributed to a "tourist attraction" owner. When he saw that police had put in arc lights at the slave market park as a control measure against the rock and acid-throwing mob, he is supposed to have declared: "Good we'll build a grandstand and charge the tourists admission."

Probably the best indication of the negative effect of the racial conflict on tourism, ~~the willingness of vacationers to spend time and money there~~ was the count of paying visitors at the ~~[illegible]~~ Castillo de San Marcos, the old Spanish fort which dominates the downtown and, under the U.S. National Park Service, is the outstanding attraction ~~at~~ and the most reasonably priced. Business was off as much as 50 % compared with the previous year. The government forecast had been for an increase during all of this period.

One of the notable things about the St. Augustine story is that despite the awareness of this ruinous effect on money-making in a community which gave every indication of being interested in little else, the people directly affected, motel, restaurant and "attraction" operators, were unable to do anything about it, paralyzed by fear or prejudice or both.

Some of the reasons for this paralysis were evident in what one restaurant owner, James Kalivas, told about his own attempt to desegregate the previous month. In an accent still ~~fainy~~ pretty? quite? rather? thickly indicative of his Middle-East origins, he stressed his lack of interest in the race question, his lack of involvement with Negroes, his concern only to make a good profit from his restaurant. He said he had urged the restuarant association ~~to see~~ to see that the sensible way to handle desegregation was to let those who wouldn't be hurt by it do it, and let the others use the kind of discouragements common in New York City to avoid it. He was encouraged by their response, and soon afterward, he found himself confronted by Negroes seeking service. They were clean, well dressed and orderly. "I couldn't refuse them," he said. He served them. A police car was outside, he said. That night the windows of his business, his car and his home were broken. He ~~[illegible]~~ served no more. "People are scared," he said. "They are banded together. You need to survive. You don't argue with them."

He told of growing up in ~~[illegible]~~ war-torn Europe, seeing the war, partisan fighting and occupation. Never once, all through this, he said, was he afraid. "But now, I have to come to this peaceful, pretty little place in the United States of America, and I find, walking down the street, for the first time in my life, I'm afraid."

The truce ended on June 9 when Judge Simpson entered his orders in the case. This judge--who did ~~tedious~~ skillful wood carving; during the tedium of testimony, taking blocks of wood from a stack of them on the bench--~~[illegible]~~ is not considered necessarily a sympathiser with the integrationist cause. In an interview with a Jacksonville paper, he stressed his assessment of his duty--to follow precedent, not to innovate in such cases. There was through the hearings in his court a Faulknerian atmosphere, Sartoris contempt and scorn for Snopesian aspects of the affairs revealed about St. Augustine.

He enjoined the city from banning night marches on First and Fourteenth Amendment grounds. And he enjoined the sheriff from imposing higher than ordinary bond on demonstrators arrested, and from keeping them in cruel and unusual places of confinement.

One such place, mentioned in his order, was an outdoor compound behind the city jail. Local citizens referred to it as the "chicken coop." It was a roofless area about 30 by 30 feet, enclosed with hurricane fence. Demonstrators white and Negro, were kept in it during daylight hours, which under the Florida sun are by 10 a.m. above 90 degrees. ~~in heat.~~ On one morning there, about 20 demonstrators were in it, most of them seated in patches of shade provided by blankets stretched across the corners of the fence. They said no one had stopped them from bringing the blankets out, and so using them. Had they not had this protection from the sun, there could have been serious illness or death. As it was, they said, one girl had passed out the previous day. Even in the shade, the sun tanned the white inmates. "We wont be white long if this keeps up," one laughed. He was, as most whites there, a student from Florida State University. These prisoners were quiet and seemingly resigned, and morale under the circumstances seemed good. Some were reading, the titles of their books as always in such scenes, touching, and by contrast with the treatment afforded them, a [redacted] commentary: The Nature of Prejudice, The Human Condition.

Florida Southern?

Their chief complaint was about the toilet. It was a shallow hole in the ground, Both sexes used it. A plywood enclosure hid occupants from the outside but not the inside of the compound. It stank.

Judge Simpson's order included these words: "The defendant, L.O. Davis, as sheriff has inflicted cruel and unusual punishment upon each of the plaintiffs in connection with their detention awaiting trial...The use of this compound in Florida's ninety-degree-plus June temperature and in one severe storm was sought to be justified by the defendant, Davis, as compliance with three successive grand jury reports that the jail must be equipped with an exercise yard...

"Further punishment devised by the sheriff was the crowding of nine or ten male plaintiffs together into concrete sweatboxes seven feet by eight feet. The females, 21 in number, on the other hand, were forced on one occasion, for an hour and 18 minutes, into a circular padded cell ten feet in diameter. This group included one polio victim...on crutches and unable to stand without them.

"More than cruel and unusual punishment is shown. Here is exposed in its raw ugliness, studied and cynical brutality deliberately contrived to break men, physically and mentally."

The sheriff is a surfacely genial man, his deeply-tanned face lined with the marks of many years of loud laughing, and sardonic grinning. He had just been re-elected, was in his 16th year as sheriff of St. Johns County. Bald and burly, he grinned when asked about the compound. He said he had tried keeping demonstrators inside the jail all day, but they had sung and cheered until 2 a.m. Other prisoners had complained. "People at the jail are entitled to their sleep." So the demonstrators were taken out to "exercise."

"If they're out taking exercise all day, they're ready to sleep at night."

Every time you approach them, he complained, "they fall on their knees and pray for you. It's a big help."

He said he was born and raised in At. Augustine, had played high school and college football. Mr. Tebault of the newspaper, hovering about the interview, pointed out that the sheriff had once coached the Negro high school football team when its own coach was incapacitated. The sheriff nodded, beaming. "They always field a good team." On the wall was a picture of him in a Santa Claus suit.

He said he had never thought much about integration until demonstrations started last summer. "Then I became a segregationist. There are hundreds and hundreds like this. Talk about building up resistance---these people do it."

He went on to say without batting his hard little eyes that the FBI had told him that Dr. King is a Communist. (The local paper carried a full-page ad which skirted the laws of libel by implying this same canard with statements that Dr. King has "communist associates," and a smear-sheet along the same lines published in Georgia was circulated around the town.) The sheriff then told of a rumor around town that the Communists planned to kill Dr. King. "When his usefulness is over, he'll be a martyr." This same sinister story--the same that has been brought forward by right-wing extremists as the explanation of the Kennedy assassination--was reported by another resident as being whispered around town.

At mention of martyrs, Mr. Tebault [redacted] spoke up: "Medgar Evers was just a two-bit local philanthropist, and now he is a martyr. We dont want that to happen here."

His newspaper ~~besides its strictly~~ hews to a segregationist and generally right-wing editorial policy. ~~has included in its news columns; such meticulous details in [illegible] coverage as addresses of the parents of children applying to desegregate schools, and the badge number of a police officer who arrested one of the white toughs.~~ An indication of the attitude of such a journalist toward the Negro part of the community served by his paper was his federal court testimony about a mass meeting going on in a Negro church directly behind his printing plant. He said he could hear all the hollering. He was asked the name of this church. "I don't know," he answered.

/ In the reception room of the sheriff's office was a bulletin board containing letters from over the United States, and a telegram from the local chamber of commerce, praising him for his handling of the Easter demonstrations. Pictures of employes' sweet-faced children were on desks. And on a table was a stack of pamphlets charging a conspiracy to discredit local police forces. It bore the imprint of the John Birch Society.

Negroes marched on the night of the court order assuring their right to do so, and on the next night; on both nights the white gang inflicted violence on the marchers. The first night there were beatings, the second, bricks and acid. By the third night of that week, more than 100 state troopers were on the scene (in all more than 200 law officers) to march in a column in eerie silence through the hot darkness with the Negroes ~~to~~ into the purplish glare and rabid shouting at the slave market park.

(Its name, among the ironies, is Constitution Square. A wax museum, with Gandhi in its window at the time, faces it. The adjacent bay is the Innlet of Menendez, which means slaughter. Playing at the movie across the street that week was "Law of the Lawless.")

The reinforced police contingent kept the peace just barely that night, and on the next two nights managed to do the same while the whites conducted their own marches through the Negro section.

The tension of such confrontation prompted the state of Florida, in the person of Attorney General James Keynes, to return to Judge Simpson's court, asking that the ban on night marches be allowed. This time, there was no effort to double-talk on the "clear and present danger" issue. The state tried forthrightly to prove that there was.

Start

Again, Judge Simpson and attorneys for the Negroes kept asking law officers, including this time, Major J.W. Jourdan, in charge of the state troopers, whether efforts were made to identify suspicious looking persons, ~~were identified,~~ and whether persons doing violence were arrested. Again for a very large part, the answer was no. Major Jourdan testified to one incident where an automobile was found during a demonstration which contained a shotgun and five pistols, all loaded, and "probably five bushels" of ammunition. Troopers got the names of two white men to whom they belonged. The weapons and ammunition were seized and turned over to the sheriff's office which in turn informed the two men they could have them back the next morning. There were no arrests. Major Jourdan said that since the weapons were not concealed there was "no legal way" to make a case. Tobias Simon, ~~a white~~ an American Civil Liberties Union lawyer from Miami, a young white man, who represented the Negroes, asked how this could be if a "clear and present danger" of riot existed. When there were objections to his question, Judge Simpson commented drily that the attorney had merely been expressing "surprise and incredul~~i~~ousness" that the guns were not seized and men were not arrested. He ~~also~~ commented that allowing guns to be brought into such a situation was like allowing kerosene to be brought to a fire. Testimony made clear that Sheriff Davis was still the final authority over law enforcement, including the state troopers. It hinted at dissension between the state and the county police.

At the end of the day-long hearing, which was on Saturday, June 13, Judge Simpson again denied that there was clear and present or St. Augustine? [illegible]?

danger sufficient to warrant abridgement of First Amendment rights. Among the ironies, this last serious seige of demonstrations before the Civil Rights Act had the kind of Fourteenth Amendment protection all, ~~but~~ ~~few in the South~~ ~~no others,~~ should have had, but few others, if any, in the South did,

"I suggest," Judge Simpson said icily, "rigid law enforcement and some arrests and real charges against the hoodlums everybody down there seems afraid to procede against. If local law enforcement officers won't, maybe it is time for the state to step in. The state of Florida surely has the power to police a little town like St. Augustine." ~~He said he would remain assured that the state would protect lives and property and First Amendment rights.~~

A Negro woman from St. Augustine, leaving the court that warm afternoon, said fervently: "Thank God for blessings in disguise. Thank God."

Thus St. Augustine entered its final phase of crisis, the most bloody, the most revealing. There followed two weeks of increasing violence. The nation saw it in quick television shots and in the flat language of news accounts: Negroes jumping into the Monson Motor Court swimming pool, and Manager James Brock (the president of the Florida Hotel and Motel Association) rushing up to throw acid (a harmless solution, it turned out) into the water. Brock shoving rabbis from over the nation along to a paddy wagon after they tried to eat with Negroes at his dining room. Negroes again and again attempting to swim in the Atlantic Ocean, only to be met by the mob and violence, tableaus of strange, slow sluggings in the water.

White marchers met Negro marchers at night, and there was more violence. Old women and teen-age girls, unresisting, were among those ~~set upon and~~ beat up by groups of grown men. A reporter told of coming upon a teen-age Negro girl, hurt and bleeding, who in terror begged him to save her from further beating. He stood up to the whites chasing her, and she ran to safety. They knocked him down and kicked him. Newsweek described how a state trooper watched a white ~~thug~~ slug a Negro, and then offered the thug his billy club.

Troopers arrested whites at one such melee, only to turn them loose when the mob shrieked its rage. Nineteen Negroes required hospital treatment after police stood aside and allowed whites to attack them. Three whites were injured when, in this once instance, Negroes fought back, according to the New York Times.

This was on June 25. On June 26, Governor Farris Bryant imposed a ban on night marches. He was promptly ordered by Judge Simpson to show cause why he should not be held in contempt of his court order. Hearings were ~~not~~ held, but by the time for decision, Negroes had dropped the case.

For the civil rights law ~~was in~~ had gone into effect July 2, and there were promises to obey it. A secret biracial committee had been set up, apparently at the behest of the governor and three powerful local men. Demonstrations were called off. Hoss Manucy, according to the Associated Press, "advised his followers not to engage in violence during this truce period." Such, still, was the state of law enforcement.

Behind ~~the~~ this was fear ~~were~~ of the forces of terrorism and intimidation commonly referred to in St. Augustine as the Birchers and the Klan.

The far-right mentality and modus-operandi were alarmingly clear. From the top of society, ~~a~~ the absurd conviction was spread to its lowest elements that a demand for the most basic of American, Western rights may be equated with Communism.

The new dynamism of the Ku Klux Klan and Klan-type organizations, with indications of a rather well organized underground terrorist mechanism, was constantly apparent. This was symbolized by the long, whip-lash antennas on cars equipped with citizen-band radio. Such a car waited, alone, at the beach to alert the mob when Negroes came to try to swim. There are indications of interest by the Federal Communications Commission in such uses of the air waves.

Against such forces, law enforcement failed. Time after time, superior forces of police failed to prevent a relatively small crowd from doing violence. It was only in the last phase of demonstrations that arrests in any effective sense were made, and these were by state, not local, police. The strong indications, in federal court and by simple observation, of police alliances with lawlessness showed in classical outline the processes by which the ~~order~~ security of civilization itself collapses.

Behind all this was a city whose every institution for a year, marked by serious violence, had refused to exercise full responsibility or recognize reality in dealings with its Negro community, awakened to American rights. A rationale which insisted on local control and at the same time insisted on severe restrictions of that control ended with amelioration possible only from without, most spectacularly from the federal bendh, and behind the scenes from the governor's office. A nation hearing anew the old cry of state rights might consider the pattern.

Why So Many Bombings Unsolved? Because Justice Dept. Nullified The Law

Senator Keating of New York the other day suggested an on the spot Senate inquiry in Birmingham to determine why "not one" of 21 racial bombings there had been solved "despite adoption of a Federal anti-bombing statute in 1960." He can get the answer closer home by questioning Justice Department officials. He will find that for two years after the law was passed, it continued to hold that bombings were primarily a local matter.

This is the hitherto unpublished story: That the Act was being nullified first became apparent after Clarence Mitchell, Washington representative of the NAACP, wired the Department on Jan. 7, 1962, asking for action in three church bombings. The response, on Jan. 25, from Bourke Marshall, head of the civil rights division, was that "in view of specific provisions contained in the (1960) Act, matters of this kind fall within the primary jurisdiction of local law enforcement agencies."

Mr. Mitchell replied that the wording and intent of the Act was exactly to the contrary. This elicited a reply dated March 1, 1962, in which Mr. Marshall said, "I think I should make it clear that the policy of the Department is not to defer to local authorities in all cases" and "It will be my practice to initiate Federal investigation in appropriate circumstances."

Just what the appropriate circumstances are was not spelled out but the Department was still moving on reluctant feet when the NAACP earlier this year asked it to investigate the bombing of Medgar Evars' home shortly before he was killed. The response was that since the bombing was done by Molotov cocktail, it did not come within the terms of the act. The NAACP pointed out that the Act defined as explosive any "mixture" that could be detonated by "concussion." But by then Evers had been killed and the Department therefore classified that bombing as "moot"! This correspondence is available to the Senator whenever he wants to see it.

The Wasteland In The White Man's Heart

It's not so much the killings as the lack of contrition. The morning after the Birmingham bombing, the Senate in its expansive fashion filled 35 pages of the Congressional Record with remarks on diverse matters before resuming debate on the nuclear test ban treaty. But the speeches on the bombing in Birmingham filled barely a single page. Of 100 ordinarily loquacious Senators, only four felt moved to speak. Javits of New York and Kuchel of California expressed outrage. The Majority Leader, Mansfield, also spoke up, but half his time was devoted to defending J. Edgar Hoover from charges of indifference to racial bombings. His speech was remarkable only for its inane phrasing. "There can be no excuse for an occurrence of that kind," Mansfield said of the bombing, in which four little girls at Sunday school were killed, "under any possible circumstances." Negroes might otherwise have supposed that States rights or the doctrine of interposition or the failure of the Minister that morning to say "sir" to a passing white man might be regarded as a mitigating circumstance. Even so Mansfield's proposition was too radical for his Southern colleagues. Only Fulbright rose to associate himself with Mansfield's remarks and to express condemnation. There was more indignation in the Senate over Nhu's pagoda raids in Saigon.

No National Day of Mourning

If four children had been killed in the bombing of a Berlin church by Communists, the country would be on the verge of war. But when four Senators (Hart, Kuchel, Humphrey and Javits) framed a resolution asking that the Sunday after the Birmingham bombing be set aside as a national day of mourning, they knew their fellow Senators too well even to introduce it. They sent it on to the White House where it was lost in the shuffle. Despite the formal expressions of regret, the sermons, the editorials and the marches, neither white America nor its leadership was really moved. When Martin Luther King and six other Negro leaders finally saw the President four days after the bombing, it was to find that he had already appointed a two-man committee to represent him "personally" in Birmingham, but that both men were white. This hardly set a precedent for bi-racial action. If Mr. Kennedy could take a judge off the Supreme Court to settle a labor dispute, he could have taken one of the country's two Negro judges off the Court of Appeals to dignify a mission of mediation. He might have insisted, for once, after so terrible a crime, on seeing white and Negro leaders together,

Another Fact-Evading Mission

Five months after his inaugural, President Kennedy sent Vice President Johnson to Vietnam on a fact-finding mission, where the latter haled Diem as "the Churchill of today!" Five months later Mr. Kennedy sent General Taylor and Walt W. Rostow. Every few months, the White House sends another fact-finding team to Vietnam. Now it is sending Secretary McNamara and General Taylor. To the future historian, these missions will appear not as efforts to find the facts but to evade them. One fact is that a clique of rich Catholic mandarins can't go on ruling a Buddhist country. Another fact is that you can't go on pouring napalm on villages and poisons on crops, uprooting people and putting them in prison-like compounds, and expect to be liked. A third fact is that you can't stabilize Southeast Asia without coming to terms with its biggest neighbor, China. A talk with Sihanouk in Cambodia, or de Gaulle in Paris, with a view to mediation—this is what the occasion calls for, not another frantic mission to Saigon.

The Test Ban Treaty — Move Toward Peace or Russian War on China?

The violence of Sino-Soviet controversy may cast a different light on the test ban treaty. It may represent Moscow's willingness to sign on the West's terms in order to protect itself in Europe while it prepares for a basic struggle in Asia. The tone of the Soviet press is now worse than that of Stalin's time in the attack on Tito, for it has moved to the most crass propaganda against the Chinese people themselves, picturing them as ill-mannered barbarians, urinating on Russian railroad platforms and spitting on the floor of the Lenin Institute. This has the smell of emotional preparation for war.* It may well be that huge Russian wheat purchases reflect this as much as the poor crops all over Europe (too wet in Western, too dry in Eastern Europe).

The Test of Co-Existence

Moscow rightly rebukes Peking for its border disputes with India but itself engages in equally irresponsible bitterness with Peking over the poorly marked Asian borders between them. The detente with the West may merely be a byproduct of Khrushchev's personal struggle with Mao. It would be a disaster for a large section of mankind if the two Communist giants were to engage in war, and the peace movement ought to keep clear of the propagandistic exaggerations of both sides and stir up pressure for mediation. Moscow is right in its co-existence line, but the test of that line is its willingness to co-exist with China, as the test of ours is a willingness to co-exist with Cuba.

The possibility that we are the victims of euphoria in the atmosphere created by the test ban treaty is strengthened by the President's speech to the United Nations. His prose has improved, but the substance is vague. Indeed one suspects that the joint moon proposal was put in at the last moment because without it there would be nothing concrete in the speech "to make a headline." The failure of the Russians to mention it in their press seems to indicate that their military like ours are fearful of giving away military secrets in such an enterprise. Even better than a Russo-American agreement to go to the moon arm-in-arm would be a Russo-American agreement to give up this billion dollar boondoggle altogether and spend the money jointly here on earth for less favored peoples.

In our opinion, U.S. policy continues to move along a hard line. The clearest indication of its basic direction may be found in W. W. Rostow's speech at Dayton, Ohio, Sept. 18 on "The Role of Germany in the Evolution of World Politics." This marks a new stage in the rewriting of history to make Germany our No. 1 ally in Europe. We must be, says this key presidential adviser, not only Germany's "reliable ally" but its "true partner." This means that "the problems posed for us by negotiations with Moscow looking towards control of atomic weapons touch vital interests of each nation of the Atlantic community, which require resolution within the family." That means a German veto. In the meantime, over British objections, we go ahead with our plans for a nuclear Polaris fleet in which the Germans will play a major role. The line still is to stand fast in the hope that the Russians will some day throw in the sponge and give up Eastern Germany. Serious trouble with China might speed that day. Sept. 23

 There is the smell of coming war, too, in the appearance of Life Magazine Sept. 13 with a special issue on Russia, portraying not only Khrushchev but Malinovski and Suslov as fine fellows while Time of the same date has a cover story on China as "The Arrogant Outcast." Does Luce's sudden pro-Russianism reflect hope of an attack on China?

Brazil Suggests The Next Step

In opening general debate at the United Nations 18th session, Brazil's de Araujo Castro recalled that his country first suggested the idea of a limited nuclear test ban and proposed the next step—a treaty which would forbid underground tests above the limit of detectability, to be revised downward as the capacity for detection improved. This proposal was ignored by the press but ought to be taken up by peace organizations. Attention should also be focussed on Brazil's renewed call for "a unanimous agreement bringing into effect the de-nuclearization of Latin America." The State Dept. is cool to this because it fears the precedent for Central Europe and because "unanimous" would include Cuba. Also attention worthy: Brazil's suggestion that an agreement to divert a mere 1 percent of world arms expenditures to a UN Capital Development Fund would give it $1,200,000,000 a year.

U.S. Officials Begin to Feed Out A Milder Line Toward Communist China

Some warmer currents in the icy relations between Washington and Peking deserve notice. For the first time in the long and frozen-faced series of meetings between the U.S. and Chinese Ambassadors in Warsaw, news and camera men were allowed in (AP in Washington Post, Sept. 12) to record an exchange of curt bows and half smiles when the 119th session opened Sept. 11.

U.S. sources have been feeding out a milder line toward Communist China in talks with newsmen. Bernard Gwertzman, Soviet specialist of the Washington Star reported Sept. 12 State Dept. officials were worried lest the (in their opinion, incorrect) Russian description of the Chinese leaders as "nuclear madmen" take so strong a hold on U.S. opinion as to "inhibit future U.S. policy toward the Chinese." The Wall St. Journal Sept. 17 carried a similar Washington article saying that Mao's bark was worse than his bite and reporting "U.S. analysts" also disputed Indian charges of an aggressive border buildup. The same note was struck by Joseph Kraft in his Washington Star column Sept. 20, concluding that "in time it might prove fruitful to deal with Peking on Southeast Asia, where Soviet influence has evaporated."

Whether such talk had something to do with the visit here by Chiang's son is not known but several days later, Col. Ray Cromley, with good Pentagon connections, reported (Washington Daily News, Sept. 19) that there was a split between Chiang and Kennedy. He said the former wants to step up mainland raids while the latter wants to cut back military aid and make Formosa a showplace "of what free enterprise can accomplish."

Against this background the advocacy by U.S. Chamber of Commerce President Nieland of trade with mainland China no longer seems merely the voice of a business maverick. The outlines of a wiser policy are faintly visible.

We have always believed that Chinese extremism in part reflected U.S. imposed outlawry.

"In this country one contemporary journalist has over a period of many years distinguished himself in reporting and interpreting the news — that less glamorous part of it, at least, which has not to do with crime, communism, sex, and baseball. The exception is I. F. Stone. The qualities of the exceptional man pervade and inform all that he has written and have kept the bulk of the pieces in this collection very much alive."

You'll Dip Again and Again With Pleasure Into These Memorable Pages

From The Haunted Fifties

"The two contenders for mastery of the earth, the 'communistic' Russians and the 'capitalistic' Americans have this in common. Their rulers equally distrust the 'intellectual.' The intellectual, like a special breed in a hive, is well-fed so long as he devotes himself to the tasks allotted him by his masters: the fabrication of new weapons, the inculcation of ideas to keep the human herd submissive. But let him begin to speak his mind and he gets into trouble. At the least, he may find himself deprived of livelihood; at the worst, he may be imprisoned as 'subversive' or 'counter-revolutionary.' The intellectual on both sides is prized and yet suspect, favored but subjected."

"What is missing from the debate is easily discernible. The Negro has his champion in the Senate, but no spokesman. Amid the sterile legalisms and the courtly compliments what is missing are the realities only a Negro can know and only a Negro Senator could express. The Senate appears not merely as an exclusive club but as a white man's club in which a younger group faces up reluctantly to the task of enacting regulations painful to some of its oldest members. Even through the speeches of those most devoted to the Negro's cause there runs a tone of supplication, apology and tenderness. Rarely has so much tact been expended on the oppressor by those who are supposed to be rescuing the oppressed."

"These bargaining sessions have the spurious ferocity of a wrestling match, in which the mountainous contenders make up by groan and grimace for the essential unreality of the contest. The lords of industry look forward eagerly to being pinned to the mat. Trade unionism has become their profit escalator. Every extra dollar in wages gives them an excuse for several dollars extra in price increases."

Here is a book in which journalism becomes literature. You'll want it as a bedside companion and as a gift for your most thoughtful friends

The Moral Sore of Our Cuban Policy Tainted JFK's Appearance at the UN

On Students, The Right to Travel and the Right to Disagree

A week after the leaders of the student trip to Cuba went before the Un-American Committee, the Free Cuba News here put out a special report on the visit. It said a student group in Cuba succeeded in smuggling a letter into the men's room of the Havana Riviera while the Americans were there and then phoned their leader, Levi Laub, to tell him where it was hidden.

If the American students have a sense of humor, this letter must strike a sympathetic chord. For the Cubans complained that they had "no right to unrestricted travel abroad" and could not speak freely at home. Maybe they and the Americans ought to form a joint committee.

Hardly Pure Essence of 1776

For the leaders of the American students have been taken before a grand jury in New York. Their indictment is sought for breaking the travel ban. Our dissident student leaders are also charged—as no doubt their opposite number are in Cuba when they speak up—of being "foreign agents." Apparently—to echo the President's own words to the UN—Cuba is not the only country where "the fruits of the revolution" have been "falsely betrayed from within." Denial of freedom to travel and denial of freedom to disagree are not exactly the pure essence of 1776.

Cuba can defend its restrictions as a necessity so long as the CIA infiltrates the country and provides planes and bombs for attacks from Nicaragua. But our restrictions are a moral sore. Our policy toward Cuba taints all our pretensions, as it did Mr. Kennedy's appearance before the United Nations. Didn't his advisers realize that when he warned against "chronic disputes" and said "the badge of responsibility in the modern world is a willingness to seek peaceful solutions," many at the UN would ask—under cover of the applause—"Well, what about Cuba?"

Even as we relax elsewhere, the noose on Cuba is being tightened. Secretary Rusk in a TV interview on Issues and Answers Sept. 15 said that while Russian troops were being moved out of Cuba "the problem is not so much (military) units now as technicians and advisers." Our attempt to strangle Cuba undercuts those Marxists, from Khrushchev down, who stake their future, in the titanic Sino-Soviet split, on a declaration of faith in America's good intentions.

Why I Withdrew from The New York Meeting

"After listening Thursday night in Washington to a panel discussion by the students just back from Cuba, I felt that if I went on as moderator with such a panel Sunday at Town Hall in New York I would be compelled either to engage in prolonged argument with the participants or appear to acquiesce in their views. These views seem to me a mixture of naivete, Negro nationalist distortions (understandable enough in the light of the Negro's anguish but still distortions) and out-of-this-world leftism. I defend their right to speak I believe they performed a public service in breaking the travel ban. I think it a joke at the expense of our country when a Congressional committee regards it as un-American to fight for freedom of travel. This is why, before realizing the narrow range of opinion represented, I originally accepted the invitation to be their moderator. But I do not wish to be identified with what I regard as hysterical exaggerations hurtful to an honorable settlement between the United States and Castro's Cuba." —Statement issued Sept. 13.

It is natural under the circumstances that the few pathetic and hounded pro-Castro organizations in this country have tended to be under pro-Chinese line leadership. This is true of the student trip to Cuba which was organized and led by a small ousted pro-Peking offshoot of the U.S. Communist Party, the so-called Progressive Labor Movement. Its tactics before the Un-American Committee made good reading in Peking but bad politics in America. It gave the Committee a chance to associate peace with Cuba and freedom of travel with pictures of screaming beatniks being hauled out by the police.

The police were brutal. The Committee is an abomination. But I don't want to carry coals to Newcastle. I want to talk sense in the bosom of the family. The student leaders had a chance to make fools of the Committee; its oafish informer had nothing really damaging to say about them or the trip. They could easily have turned the scales of opinion against the Committee as did Women's Strike for Peace. They chose instead to make an old-fashioned agitprop demonstration in the fashion set by Moscow in the early 30's.

The PLMers really believe peace with Cuba is impossible until capitalism is overthrown in America. Neither Cuba nor the rest of the world can wait that long. The same crowd is organizing a new trip to Cuba. We hope more sensible students will wrest leadership from them. The cause of peace and travel deserves advocates with better sense.

Business Week, After On-The-Spot Survey, Finds Economic Upturn in Cuba

"Los Angeles, Sept. 20 (AP)—A high State Dept. official said today that an unrelenting squeeze from the U.S. isolation policy and massive Castro mismanagement has made a shambles of Cuba's once-healthy economy. Edwin M. Martin, Ass't Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, gave this assessment in a speech on Cuba and Communism in Latin America before the World Affairs Council."

—Washington Post, Sept. 21.

"Far from being in a state of collapse, Cuba's Soviet-supported economy now is showing signs of an upswing. . . . This is the conclusion that was reached by a Business Week reporter after a tour of the island. . . .

"Cuba boasts these achievements on the industrial front: About 25 light industry plants have been put into operation . . . manufacturing everything from picks and shovels to sulphuric acid. . . . Despite a U.S. embargo on spare parts, the Cubans have managed to keep in operation oil refineries seized from Americans and the Nicaro nickel plant. . . . With Japanese and Soviet help, Cuba is rapidly expanding its commercial fishing industry. . . .

"This progress refutes any notion that Cuba's economic situation might generate all-out opposition to the Castro regime. There are still shortages of food and many consumer items, particularly in the cities. But no one is starving in Cuba, and many Cubans—including students and peasants who form the backbone of Castro's support—are eating better than ever."

—Business Week, Sept. 14.

For Black Birmingham, It's Martial Law With Insult and Carbine

instead of giving a separate audience four days later to a white delegation from Birmingham. It is as if, even in the White House, there are equal but separate facilities.

The Negro leaders, facing the TV cameras outside the Executive Offices that Thursday afternoon, looked like men pursued by despair, afraid that at the slightest misstep they might be trampled under by the hopeless fury in the ranks behind them. The white delegation, the following Monday, had underling written all over it. The President of the United States could take time out to hear white Birmingham, but the Mayor was too busy and sent his secretary. With him were neither the Big Mules nor their Northern capitalist overlords; it is as if they had assigned their office boys to see the President. If what they told the press afterward was a sample of what they told the President, he too must have despaired of finding a solution. Even these supposed moderates could not shake loose from the mythology of white supremacy: if only outside agitators like Martin Luther King would stay away peace and quiet could be restored; many Negroes favored segregation, but apparently were afraid to say so except privately to their white friends. Hire a Negro policeman? That was a "profoundly difficult," "almost impossible," problem. Just why was never explained; perhaps Negroes do not look good in blue, with brass buttons.

Our Ancient Double Standard

Four centuries of white supremacy have left their indelible mark in the double standard we whites instinctively apply to race relations. The Attorney General, rejecting a Negro appeal for Federal troops, said hearts could not be changed by bayonets. But few stop to think that the alternative is to leave the Negro community of Birmingham to the bayonets of the State troopers. Gene Grove in the New York Post Sept. 20 vividly pictured how the Negro community is ruled. When one reporter approached Col. Al Lingo of the State police "with a question, the only reply was a shotgun in the belly. Wednesday night the troopers beat an aged man in the Negro district of East Thomas and a young boy in the Negro district of Parker Heights, both for failing to move off the street fast enough. Yesterday morning they rode down the street with carbines perking from every window, shouting at Negroes sitting on their porches to 'get back in the house, niggers, get your ass the hell off the street'." The Mayor's Secretary looked surprised when a reporter asked him if he thought the manners of the State troops toward the Negroes were not provocative. He found no fault with it. Such ways and language, after all, are accepted institutions in the South, the way "peace and quiet" have been preserved.

A Problem in Race Mixing

When the civil defense bill passed the House the other day, a first term Republican Congressman from Louisville, Ky., a Mr. Gene Snyder, tried to attach an anti-discrimination amendment to it. His amendment would have denied funds to any State or institution which failed to give "satisfactory assurances" that no one would be excluded from fallout shelters "because of race, color or creed." He was defeated 93 to 53. This will be reassuring to the South. Whatever happens to the country in a nuclear holocaust, everything possible is being done to keep white supremacy intact. The problem, however, may prove complex. Going in, it will be easy to solve; separate entrances, plainly marked, may be provided for white and colored. But afterward—can anyone be sure of ever sorting them out?

When I was in Germany, I felt the empty wasteland of the German heart. I feel the same way about the hearts of my fellow white men in America, where the Negro is concerned. The good people there as here are in the minority and weak. Just as many Germans feel it was somehow the fault of the Jews that they got themselves cremated, so many whites here North and South, feel that the bombing wouldn't have happened if the Negroes weren't so pushy. As a white housewife in a Birmingham supermarket told Robert Baker of the Washington Post (Sept. 19), it was "terrible" but "that's what they get for trying to force their way where they're not wanted." Worse than the bombing is this inhuman chill.

VOL. XI, NO. 20 OCTOBER 14, 1963 WASHINGTON, D. C. 20 CENTS

The FBI's Indifference to Civil Rights

The most important single omission in the latest report of the Civil Rights Commission is its failure to make any mention, much less study, of the FBI's relationship to the struggle for civil rights. J. Edgar Hoover's firm position as the capital's No. 1 Sacred Cow makes the omission understandable. The poor harassed Commission has enough on its hands. But sooner or later this question will have to be opened up. This becomes clearer when one takes note of the clear and inescapable, though unspoken, implication of the latest findings. This is that the Negro cannot count on litigation but must resort to wider measures of non-violent demstration in the streets if he is to win freedom from discrimination within the measurable future. Nearly ten years after the school desegregation decision, only 8 percent of the Negro pupils in the South attend schools with white children. After six years of Federal suits, the number of registered Negro voters in 100 of the worst counties in the South has risen only from 5 to 8.3 percent; in the Louisiana, Mississippi and South Carolina counties, the number of Negroes registered is actually less than it was six years ago. More demonstrations mean more clashes with the police. The police in the South, insofar as the Negro is concerned, are not upholders of law but the main instrument of a police state designed to maintain whites as the master class. This is evident from the listing of suits pending; many are against Sheriffs and other police officials for the beating, intimidation and baseless arrest of voter registration drive workers.

FBI Still 99¾% Lily-White

We seem to have obtained the first exact figures on the number of Negro FBI men. This is how our unexpected scoop came about. The 1963 report of the Civil Rights Commission says a questionnaire was sent out to local and State police officials to determine how many employ Negroes. "The Commission's statistical survey," the report declares, "establishes that law enforcement agencies throughout most of the nation are staffed exclusively or overwhelmingly by whites." We were puzzled by the failure to give figures on the racial composition of the Federal government's own police, the FBI.

When we telephoned the Civil Rights Commission to find out why, an official suggested that perhaps the figure was kept secret to protect the FBI's confidential informants. This didn't seem very plausible, unless the FBI was using bleached Negroes to infiltrate the Ku Klux Klan. We pressed for a definite answer. Later we were informed that a staff report showed that as of the end of 1962, the FBI had 10 Negroes among its 6,030 special agents and 3 Negroes in another category, known for some unexplained reason, as Special Agents, Limited. Could this mean that, like some Negro deputy sheriffs in the South, they couldn't arrest white men? My informant was sure it was nothing like that. He added that "as of today" and since the staff report, the FBI had hired 5 more Negroes as special agents. This still leave the FBI almost 99¾% lily-white, or neck-and-neck with Ivory Soap.

Too Fraternal With The Cops

This is the most overt form of civil rights violation by law enforcement officials. But the FBI has long been notoriously reluctant to impair its fraternal relations with local and State police officials by a too vigorous inquiry into civil rights infractions. In past years, the figures given by Mr. Hoover in the annual appropriations hearings have tended reassuringly to show the police and their friends in Congress how few complaints ever reach the stage of prosecution, much less conviction. In recent years, as the civil rights struggle became politically potent, fewer figures have been supplied lest this furnish ammunition to Mr. Hoover's critics. Even the number of complaints is no longer given. Thus last year Mr. Hoover provided a table showing that the number of "bombing or racial matters" had risen to 4,077 in the fiscal year 1961, or 37% above 1960, while "civil rights" cases were up 29% to 2,903. But no figures were given to show in how many cases arrests were made or convictions obtained. Even the number of complaints were not given in this year's hearings. Indeed it would have been very embarrassing to show how many "bombing or racial matters" had occurred in fiscal 1962 when the Justice Department now claims that it did not apply the anti-bombing provisions of the 1960 Civil Rights Act for two years because there were no important bombings until those in Shreveport, La. early this year. The anti-bombing provisions of the 1960 Act were intended to bring the FBI into the picture at once in racial bombings but the FBI has shown as little enthusiasm for getting into these as into civil rights cases.

Every year, in the appropriations hearings, Mr. Hoover presents a chart "to refute what we hear so frequently, criticizing the use of confidential informants." This shows the amount of stolen property recovered and the number of fugitives arrested through the tips of confidential informants. But Mr. Hoover has yet to report tips leading to arrests in the mounting toll of murders and bombings in the civil rights struggle. The day after the Birmingham church bombing in which four little girls were killed, Joseph L. Rauh, Jr., of Americans for Democratic Action, sent President Kennedy a telegram in which he said the increasing number of such outrages made more shocking "the failure or reluctance of the FBI to infiltrate right wing subversive elements." This was not the first time the Administration was asked to step up

The No. 1 Menace to Internal Security Are the Armies We Finance and Train

The Only Sure Way to Stem the Anti-Democratic Trend in Latin America

The surest way to end the epidemic of military take-overs in Latin America would be to end our military aid program in the hemisphere. The original excuse for the program, when it began in 1946, was hemispheric defense. But "the great majority of civilians," Edwin Liuewen wrote in his book, "Arms and Politics in Latin America" (Praeger) have been led by experience "to fear their own armed forces far more than they do the Russians." Lately the excuse has been internal security and "civic action." But militarism is plainly the No. 1 menace to internal security in Latin America, and the kind of civic action to which the military gravitates is to take over the government and the Treasury whenever they can. These armies are now the largest single source of graft in the hemisphere and the biggest single obstacle to the reforms the U.S. claims it wants. In a foolish speech (see adjoining box) to a hemispheric military conference in the Canal Zone last July, Teodoro Moscoso disclosed that Latin American military expenditures are now running at one and a half billion dollars a year, or more than our government made available last year to the Alliance for Progress of which he is U.S. Coordinator. This literally takes bread from the hungry. The excuse, according to the report on the foreign assistance program sent Congress by the President last August 28, is that "well-trained and effective armed forces" provide "the stability and internal security necessary during the critical period of economic and social reform." The overthrow of democratic regimes in Honduras and the Dominican Republic by the military we financed and trained is only the latest evidence of how untrue this is.

Just Before The Roof Fell In

"The trend clearly is away from 'personalismo', from coups and revolutions which bring a mere change of faces without any change in policy, away from the suppression of legitimate opposition elements; away from callous disregard for the real problems of the majority of the people. With few exceptions, the military in Latin America today are showing a greatly increased sense of political, economic and social responsibility, including their prime duty of supporting constitutional civil government."

—Teodoro Moscoso, Coordinator of the Alliance for Progress, at the 1963 Conference of the American Armies, Panama Canal Zone, July 19.

The Lesson Fidel Taught

The only country in Latin America with a stable and free society is also the only one without a standing army of any kind—Costa Rica. Fidel Castro taught the hemisphere an invaluable lesson when he at once dissolved Batista's army and sent our military mission packing. Our first move where democratic regimes appear—as they did in the Dominican Republic and Honduras—should be to withdraw our military missions, and encourage the new regime to cut the army down to size. Our military tend all too often to share the tough guy attitudes and political backwardness of the Latin military, particularly the tendency to see as Communistic any proposal for social and economic reform; such attitudes by our military encourage local take-overs. Senator Humphrey in 1957 and Senator Gruening in August of last year warned against military aid and the military mind in Latin America but to no avail. Working with the military were rightist Catholic parties in both Honduras and the Dominican Republic, and behind both were U.S. interests hostile to reform, United Fruit in Honduras, Standard Oil of New Jersey and Puerto Rican Sugar Company in the Dominican Republic. Standard Oil has been lobbying against Bosch in Washington because he resented the terms of an oil refinery contract hastily entered into after his election but before he took office. Puerto Rican Sugar Company hostility, like that of the native capitalists, becomes understandable when one notes that the 30 cents a day which used to be paid common labor under Trujillo had gone up under Bosch, in some cases to $2 a day. These forces drove out the most gifted democratic leader Latin America has had in a long time.

Those liberal Senators like Gruening and newspapers like the Washington Post which advocate a kind of Eisenhower Doctrine for the Caribbean, with interventions like that in Lebanon to support democratic governments, seem to us well-intentioned but deluded. It is not accidental that the only government against which we have taken strong measures was Castro's; even our action against Trujillo was motivated by the desire to set a precedent for a blockade of Cuba. Support for really democratic governments and for social reform in Latin America is at best lukewarm, half-hearted and confined to a fringe element of thoughtful liberals and some businessmen. United action is only possible against the menace of communism, real or imaginary; only then does the country and the Congress really spring to arms. Under such circumstances, any new doctrine of intervention, whatever its origins, will soon be used to stiffen U.S. support for gendarme government. Latin American democrats will instinctively and wisely fear us most when we come bearing such gifts. It's not more intervention that Latin America needs but less—and the first step should be to end military aid altogether. That billion and a half spent on armies would do more good spent on roads, schools and shoes.

Dominican Republic Got More U.S. Arms Aid Per Capita Than Any Other Latin Land

"The U.S. supplied the Dominican Republic during fiscal year 1963 far more military aid for its size than any other country in all of Latin America. . . . We have built up the power of the military junta. . . . American military aid in Latin America has built up in country after country a powerful military caste, nondemocratic in its ideology, nondemocratic in its philosophy and nondemocratic in its tactics, for military castes the world around are not noted for their belief in the institutions of democracy. . . .

"It (U.S. military aid) is responsible for building up the power of the Fascist regime of the military which has taken over under Col. Elias Wessin y Wessin. Who is he? He is a man with a sordid record of Fascist police state leanings in the Dominican Republic. . . . The President of the Dominican Republic . . . sought to remove this Fascist-oriented police state Colonel. . . . When he (Bosch) tried to exercise his constitutional power, the military took over."

How can we expect the poor Latin Americans to control their military when we do so poor a job with our own? The Senate had just finished ratifying the nuclear test ban treaty when the leadership called up a $47 billion military budget and in little more than an hour obtained its approval 77 to 0, with 23 not voting. These astronomical annual totals are usually approved in cursory fashion. This year McGovern of South Dakota dared question them and put his challenge to a vote though he knew he would be snowed under. McGovern followed up his August 2 speech on "overkill" by moving for a 10% or $5 billion cut in projected additions to weapons and nuclear stockpile. His argument: that we were wasting on "overkill" resources which could go to build a stronger America and a more stable world. His cut, he argued, would still leave the new Kennedy military and atomic budget ten billions higher than Eisenhower's last! The Democrat, McGovern, in attacking arms spending, found himself quoting Eisenhower against the sharp rise under Kennedy. But no Republican rose to support him. Only another Democrat, Randolph of West Virginia, backed him on the floor and in the vote. Two others, Nelson of Wisconsin and Morse of Oregon were paired for the motion. Peace groups ought to use the McGovern speeches of Aug. 2 and Sept. 24 as ammunition and get ready for the next round. Sooner or later the country will wake up.

A Little Evangelism Needed

A little moral leadership, a little evangelism, would help. But Kennedy, like Eisenhower, lacks taste or capacity for it. The Administration's hesitations about selling wheat to Russia are another indication of Mr. Kennedy's unwillingness to take the risks of leadership for peace. His idea as always is not to mobilize the latent idealism of the country—he has no real faith in it—but to make a deal behind the scenes with Dirksen and Halleck. Maybe he will feel himself stronger now that Eisenhower has spoken out in favor of a wheat deal if "it is a good horse trade." Characteristically, Ike is anxious to disavow any deeper moral or political purpose. He doesn't want us to be "altruistic." He sees "no principle" involved, only "material gain." Thus small minds reduce great occasions to their own dimensions. In the Senate Oct. 3 Javits of New York in a comprehensive discussion of East-West trade pleaded that the possibility of reducing "tensions among nations through mutually beneficial economic relations has been demonstrated over and over again in history." Humphrey, in despair over the hesitation, told the Senate he thought we had already missed the boat on a wheat deal and provided a succinct answer to objections from the right: "I never have heard of a people who have become more placid, more pliable or more reasonable because they were hungry." A "world peace through world trade" campaign is his objective, but Kennedy holds back. He doesn't like to venture beyond sure things—a treaty against nuclear testing when both sides are satiated with testing, and now perhaps an agreement not to put bombs in orbit, a step neither side considers militarily worthwhile anyway.

From Khrushchev's point of view, the scene is a bitter one. With Kennedy as before with Eisenhower, he staked his political position on the possibility of a detente with the United States. Now he sees it may even be impossible to buy U.S. wheat for gold without undergoing a humiliating political debate, with the possibility of rejection. Leading the fight against the sale of U.S. wheat to Russia is his old opponent, Adenauer. To us he says "only the stupidest calves choose their own butcher." But extensive tables put into the Congressional Record by Javits show that Western Germany enjoys by far the biggest Western trade with the Soviet bloc—almost $1.5 billions in 1962. A survey on the financial page of the New York Times Oct. 6 showed that one third of the 100 million bushels of wheat equivalent in flour bought by Russia from Western Europe recently came from West Germany, the bulk of it being milled from U.S. wheat. Oct. 8

Hoover Admits He Spies on Negroes, But Silent on Racists surveillance of racist and rightist organizations. A similar proposal was made privately by Walter Reuther to Attorney General Robert Kennedy in the Fall of 1961.*

A Wide Range of Snooping

In the annual budget hearings, Mr. Hoover boasts a network of informers in liberal and Leftist organizations. A minuscule Communist Party is his excuse for surveillance over a wide spectrum of opinion. "Since the Communist Party," Mr. Hoover told the House Appropriations Committee this year, "carries on many and varied activities to infiltrate and manipulate various segments of American life, we must have broad and penetrative coverage so that we may be aware of the plans and tactics of this subversive organization." Just how "broad and penetrative" this coverage is may be gathered from Mr. Hoover's boast that the FBI had "approximately 165 known or suspected Communist front or Communist infiltrated organizations under investigation." It takes hard searching to find a half dozen genuine Communist front organizations nowadays. Mr. Hoover met this objection by explaining that while "some of these organizations are created by the Communists" many are "legitimate non-subversive organizations" which the Communists have urged their members to join. This admits that many "legitimate non-subversive" organizations are among the 165 watched by the FBI. Among them, according to Mr. Hoover's presentation to the House Appropriations Committee, are "organizations in the peace, youth, political, trade union, Negro, disarmament, and nuclear testing fields." This list indicates how far the FBI reaches into respectable organizations with legitimate purposes, many of them shared by the Kennedy Administration. Notice that Negro organizations are included among those over which the FBI keeps watch. In the fiscal 1962 budget hearings, in explaining that the FBI had "some 200 organizations . . . now under investigation" Mr. Hoover said that the Communists were exploiting the Negro sit-in demonstrations. It is clear that the FBI watches the Negroes closely. It is not at all clear that they watch anti-Negro organizations.

One Way to Solve the Race Problem

> "Many military commanders are aware of the plight of Negro personnel. With few exceptions, however, their policy has been to yield to the racial practices of the community. One [military] installation in Alabama is faced with a delicate problem because it trains foreign nationals as well as Americans. The military authorities have solved it by issuing 'passports' to colored foreigners to enable them to travel unmolested in the community. For the American serviceman no such protection is afforded."
> —1963 Report of the Civil Rights Commission.

Mr. Hoover dwells at length each year on internal security, but the menace is always on the Left. In this year's hearings, Mr. Hoover took time out to dwell on the insidious dangers behind the Communist campaign for peaceful co-existence. But he never seems to see any danger in the paranoid racist propaganda that has created a sickness in the South which may erupt into the worst menace to internal security since the Civil War. Mr. Hoover is not only incapable of seeing this but shares the pathological obsession with the Red Menace characteristic of racist and Fascist groups. His power and influence are rarely turned against these kindred mentalities. In this year's hearings, he said he had only 95 telephone wiretaps in operation, and that these "are utilized only in cases where the internal security of the country is involved, or where kidnapping or extortion may bring about the jeopardy of a human life." We are as opposed to wire-tapping as we are to political espionage, right or left. But it is Mr. Hoover who makes and applies the rules. We wonder how many, if any, of those wiretaps are used to protect internal security or human life against well known hate groups which breed the madness that ends in these bombings. It is time a group of representative citizens asked the President to set up a Commission to investigate the role of the FBI in the civil rights struggle. It is serious when the Federal agency on which Negroes must depend for investigation of civil rights cases, is so indifferent to them.

Will New Chances for Peace Be Another Lost Opportunity?

The history of Indochina since the war has been a history of lost opportunities. Ho Chi Minh's Viet Minh worked closely with the OSS during the second World War, and took FDR's promises of colonial liberation seriously. So pro-American was its orientation at one time that, as Oliver E. Clubb, Jr., writes in his The U.S. and the Sino-Soviet Bloc in South East Asia (Brookings, 1962), "Vietnam's declaration of independence began with lines from America's own Declaration of Independence and its first constitution more closely resembled that of the U.S. than that of the Soviet Union." Hopes of American support were dashed when the Truman Administration acquiesced in France's effort to restore colonial rule. Ellen J. Hammer in her book, The Struggle for Indochina (Stanford, 1952) tells the story of another blasted Vietminh hope. Ho Chi Minh risked his political leadership to reach a moderate agreement with the French on March 6, 1946, accepting a limited independence within the French Union. Because of this agreement the Viet Minh permitted the French to reoccupy Hanoi without a shot being fired. The French troops "fresh from the liberation of Paris" were hailed "as the incarnation of Free France." But French promises were broken, and a war began that was to cost France $5 billion dollars and the blood of many of her best young professional soldiers before Dien Bien Phu and the Geneva agreement marked her defeat 8 years later.

Ho Ready to Accept An Independent South

Another of these opportunities is now being lost. The international situation makes this a favorable moment to negotiate an end of the war with China and North Vietnam. The latter would like resumption of its normal trade relations with the South; it fears expansion of the war would risk destruction of its resources by American bombardment and end its precarious independence of China. The most important revelation in Bernard B. Fall's forthcoming book The Two Viet-Nams (Praeger, 1963) is that the North Vietnamese leaders in three interviews given Westerners last year (the London Daily Express in March, Dr. Fall in July and Col. Jules Roy of L'Express in December) made it obvious to all three that North Vietnam "had backed away from outright conquest of South Vietnam and was veering toward a negotiated solution embodying the existence of a neutral South Vietnamese state that would not be reunited with the North for a long time to come."

A representative of the National Liberation Front of South Vietnam in a clandestine interview with Georges Chaffard of Le Monde (Aug. 24) during his visit to Saigon last summer also set forth a program for an independent South Vietnam to be established in free elections. "We have not fought all these years, in the worst conditions," he told M. Chaffard, "to end by replacing one dictatorship with another. None of us can accept a relation of dependence on the North." The domestic program outlined was a moderate one, with a friendly attitude toward foreign investments. "We wish to be realists," M. Chaffard was told. "We know the difficulties of our compatriots in the North, and we have also studied the example of the states of Black Africa. There is no question of wishing to install systematically a Popular Democracy in the South. . . ." The desire is for a neutral regime which can deal with both sides in economic development. Both Peking and Hanoi last year called for reconvening the Geneva Conference to make peace in South Vietnam. For North Vietnam a neutral regime in the South would enable it again to exchange its coal and industrial products for the rice of the South. If East and West Germany can do an enormous trade, despite sharp political differences, why not North and South

Another Official Myth

Those Lovely Strategic Hamlets

"The strategic hamlet program is producing excellent results. . . . The hamlets are governed by councils elected by secret ballot. In addition . . . the government is supplying the hamlets with schools, medical aid, cheap fertilizer, low interest agricultural loans. . . . Morale in the countryside has begun to rise. . . ."

—Secretary Rusk's April 22 speech on Vietnam.

"Not far from the town of Vinh Long is the model strategic hamlet of Phuoc Nguon. . . . Life is regimented in Phuoc Nguon. As in every other strategic hamlet, those who know what is good for them join the regime's National Revolutionary Movement, the only political organization permitted in the hamlets. . . .

"The lack of democratic rights exercises the villagers only to the point that they rarely appreciate the appointed village chiefs. But the evidence suggests that they do resent the demands made upon their time and labor. The average peasant today is required to spend almost as much time on unproductive and unpaid government work as he spends in the fields. His basic freedoms may be no less than they were in the past, but he is now obliged to suffer an almost commune-like regimentation. . . .

"The peasants need permits to leave the hamlets. They are watched, spied on. . . . Like the peasants in Viet Cong villages, they are required to listen to hours of political indoctrination each week. The rice they grow fetches a low price and is sold by the government for a high price. . . . The result has often been unhappy. 'Too many lessons are being copied from the Communists in the strategic hamlets,' said one Westerner who had come to Vietnam to help Diem win the war."

Vietnam, especially since such trade would go a long way toward ending the trade deficits of both? For China, looking for new ties in the West to fight off the isolation imposed on her by Russia, the ending of the war in South Vietnam would remove one major obstacle to better trade relations with the West. This is an ideal time for the West to negotiate.

Two Different Policies Toward Communism

Unfortunately we still have two basic policies for dealing with Communist regimes. In Eastern Europe we seem to have given up containment for conciliation. We reward the Kadar government in Hungary for liberalization at home by resuming relations. We continue to give support to Gomulka in Poland as a means of encouraging some independence of Russia. Ever since Tito's break with Stalin, we have moved away from the notion that the Communist world is a faceless monolith run from Moscow, and sought to foster centrifugal forces within it. But in the Far East, as in our dealings with Cuba, we still cling to the older view that the only way to deal with a revolutionary movement is to do all in our power to starve it out. If we were treating East Asia as we treat East Europe, we would be actively exploring the differences between China and Russia, and those between North Vietnam and China, for leverage with which to end the costly uprising in South Vietnam. But we still think of China and of North Vietnam, as we did in the twenties of Russia, as untouchable regimes.

The lack of a constructive policy in East Asia becomes more understandable when one looks back and sees that the change in our policy toward Eastern Europe was a reaction to events in that area rather than the result of any diplomatic initiatives on our part. Churchill, after Stalin died, flew to Washington and urged us to negotiate with Melenkov, but the State Department insisted nothing had changed. It was not until the 20th Congress and the upsurges to which it gave rise in Hungary and Poland that we began to recognize belatedly that something was happening in the Soviet world. The policy of detente in recent months was largely made in Moscow, and our continued freeze in the Far East also shares the made in Moscow label. For suddenly the conflict between the Chinese and Russian ruling bureaucracies has led the latter to seek the isolation of China. Thus Russian policy and the policy imposed on us by our China lobby converged. The path of least resistance was to accept Russian overtures in the West—while pursuing the old rigid cold war policy in the Far East.

Where Do The Viets Get Their Weapons

Q. General, does Viet Cong get its recruitment and arms at this point mainly through infiltration through Laos or Cambodia or mainly from inside South Vietnam?

Gen. Earle G. Wheeler, U.S. Army Chief of Staff: It is a combination. . . . They get arms from about three different sources. One, stuff that is actually toted in from up in North Vietnam. For example, we found 57-millimeter recoilless rifles made in China as far south as the Delta. They also have some local production of weapons. These are usually rifles of a kind. They are very crude. Single-shot affairs, but if they hit you they will kill you. There is no doubt about that. Then, of course, some of the stuff is captured from the Vietnamese.

To answer a question I know someone will ask, we are now capturing more weapons from the Viet Cong than they are capturing from the Vietnamese.

—Briefing at the Pentagon, Feb. 4, 1963.

Compare This The Official Myth With the Box Below

It should be obvious by now that problems arising in territories contiguous to China can no more be settled without her than Caribbean prolems can be settled without the United States. The Chinese taught us a lesson at the 38th parallel in Korea which we seem unwilling to acknowledge at the 17th parallel in Vietnam. China in effect warned us that if we crossed the 38th parallel it would intervene; its "volunteers" forced us back to the parallel. To end the Korean war, we had to negotiate with China. The West had to negotiate with China to settle the Laotian conflict. There will have to be negotiations with China again to end the South Vietnamese war.

The primary obstacle to the negotiation of such a settlement lies in Washington. Kennedy cannot afford to go into the campaign next year and face a Republican cry that under the Democrats we "lost" Vietnam, whether by withdrawal or negotiation. The politically safest course is to "stand firm," i.e. to follow the line of least resistance, though this means continuation of a war that most observers agree cannot be won, and could at any time expand dangerously. As in

McNamara Blushes To Learn that Captured Viet Cong Rifles Are U.S. Made

Saigon, Vietnam, Oct. 13—When Robert S. McNamara was inspecting South Vietnamese defenses recently, he paused curiously before a display of weapons captured from the Communist Viet Cong. Pointing to one in the pile, the Secretary of Defense asked, "This one's from Communist China, isn't it?"

"No," replied a Vietnamese officer. "It's an American 57-millimeter recoilless rifle, seized by the Viet Cong and recaptured by us."

McNamara, blushing, turned to Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor, chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, and said, "My God, I didn't recognize it." McNamara had reason to feel embarrassed. For the biggest supplier of modern weapons to the Viet Cong guerrillas is the United States. An official American breakdown of a cross-section of arms taken from the Viet Cong in recent weeks shows that nearly one out of three was marked "made in the US." And only one in 50 came from the Communist bloc. These were mostly Chinese but included some dated Czech and Soviet models.

About half the total weaponry of the pro-Communist forces is what the military lump together as "French and old"—all made before the French evacuated Indo-China in 1954 and some tracing to the World War I era. . . .

The official military line is that the weapons captured by the Viet Cong are not so important when it is remembered that Government troops are taking arms from them, too. For the first six months of 1963 for example figures show that the Government side lost 3,000 weapons and captured 2,700. But the statistics are deceiving in view of the difference in the quality of the arms exchanged. The Viet Cong yields largely outmoded weapons and home-made pipe guns and obtains factory fresh American models.

As one informed observer put it, "the weapons exchange figures would be encouraging only if we were in the plumbing business."

—Louis R. Rukeyser in the Baltimore Sun, Oct. 14.

France, the national interest is to be subordinated to the convenience of the political leadership; we will go on pouring out blood and treasure; we have already sunk some $5 billions in the Indochinese quagmire. The Administration's hope is by a little pressure on Diem, at least for some face-saving reforms, and a lot of flim-flam at home, to keep this tragic comedy going at least until after the 1964 elections. The political realities of Washington, not the military realities in Saigon, explain the Oct. 2 White House statement that Gen. Taylor and Secretary McNamara had "reported their judgment that the major part of the U.S. military task" in South Vietnam "can be completed by the end of 1965," i.e. a year after the elections. Never was a crystal ball more clearly clouded by politics.

Kennedy's Moral Responsibility

The outcry about Diem diverts attention from the policies of Kennedy. The inhumanity which has made a world scandal of South Vietnam has its origin as much in Washington as in Saigon. The uprooting of the rural population and its incarceration in stockaded villages, the spraying of poisons from the air on crops and cattle in violation of the Geneva convention, the use of napalm for attacks on villages suspected of harboring rebels—these policies were all formulated and directed out of Washington. The familiar belief that the end justifies the means in any conflict with Communism was enough to wipe out qualms, if any, about the mistreatment of the Vietnamese. It was only the unexpected clash with the Buddhists which brought relations between Washington and Saigon to a crisis. The spectacle of a U.S. supported Catholic family dictatorship oppressing the majority creed, the international repercussions in the Buddhist world and Kennedy's own Catholicism made this most embarrassing. Above all, in the cant of the cold war, religion is sacred, God being regarded as safely on our side in the struggle against "athe-

How The War Against Diem Started

"What happened in South Vietnam during the next five years deserves to be listed near the top of the success stories of the postwar period. By plebiscite, the Emperor Bao Dai was replaced by a Republic, with Ngo Dinh Diem as President, with an elected National Assembly, and a written Constitution. . . .

"Although North Vietnam inherited most of the industry of Vietnam, and although its population is larger, it fell rapidly behind South Vietnam in food production, the number of children in school, and in standards of living. . . . This was competition which the Communists apparently could not endure. Very likely it was one of the reasons why they decided in 1959 to renew their assault on South Vietnam."

—Secretary of State Rusk, "The Stake in Vietnam", before the Economic Club of New York, April 22, 1963.

Noted French Historian Describes How the Uprising Against Diem Began

The "mistakes" of the South, from 1957 onwards, were to furnish opportunities to Communism and to the movement for reunification which operated under its aegis. As if not satisfied with the re-establishment of calm and security, the Diem regime, haunted by a strange desire to bring back into being the society of former days, when there were no sects and no Communists, and reckoning that it would itself be safe in the future, accentuated its authoritarian and repressive character. There are serious reasons for supposing that it was encouraged along this path by certain American activist milieux. . . .

The Diem government . . . launched out in 1957 in to what amounted to a series of man hunts. . . . A considerable number of people were arrested in this way and sent to concentration camps. . . . This repression was in theory aimed at the Communists. In fact, it affected all those, and they were many—democrats, socialists, liberals, adherents of the sects—who were bold enough to express their disagreement with the line of policy adopted by the ruling oligarchy. . . .

In 1958 the situation grew worse. Round-ups of "dissidents" became more frequent and more brutal. The enemy (those suspected of Communist activities or of being affiliated to the sects) were difficult to apprehend. The areas where they took refuge . . . with their marshes and forests, were not favorable for operations by government forces. Moreover the way in which many of the operations were carried out very soon set the villagers against the regime.

The Communists, finding themselves hunted down, began to fight back. Informers were sought out and shot in increasing numbers, and village chiefs who had presided over the denunciations, village notables and members of the militia who took part, were frequently treated in the same way. The people of the villages, thus intimidated, fell silent. Diem's police and army saw their sources of information drying up one after another. To make good the lack, they resorted to worse barbarity, hoping to inspire an even greater terror among the villagers than that inspired by the Communists. And in that fateful year of 1958 they overstepped all bounds. The peasants, disgusted to see Diem's men acting in this way, lent their assistance to the Communists. . . .

In December 1958 the death of some 20 Viet Cong detainees in the Phu Loi concentration camp served to fan the flames of anger of the guerrillas. . . . In the course of that December and the following January armed bands sprang into being almost everywhere. . . .

What did the authorities of the Democratic Republic of (North) Vietnam do in the face of these sad circumstances? They protested in diplomatic notes. The members of the Viet Minh cadre in the south, who had been promised by Hanoi that unification would be rapidly achieved, had to listen to the bitter remarks that were made to them about the inability of the North to do anything about the Diem dictatorship. The overriding needs of the world-wide strategy of the Socialist camp meant little or nothing to guerrilla fighters being hunted down in Nam-Bo.

It was in such a climate of feeling that, in 1959, responsible elements of the Communist Resistance in Indo-China came to the conclusion that they had to act, whether Hanoi wanted them to or no. They could no longer continue to stand by while their supporters were arrested, thrown into prison and tortured. . . .

The point of view of most foreign governments, especially in the West, is that the fighting going on in South Vietnam is simply a subversive campaign directed from Hanoi . . . it leaves out of account the fact that the insurrection existed before the Communists decided to take part, and that they were simply forced to join in. And even among the Communists, the initiative did not originate in Hanoi, but from the grass roots, where the people were literally driven by Diem to take up arms in self-defense.

—Philippe Devillers. French scholar who lived for some years in Vietnam during the Indochinese war and once admired Diem. His book, Histoire du Vietnam 1945-51 has become a standard work on the causes and early stages of that war. This excerpt is from North Vietnam Today: Profile of a Communist Satellite, ed. by P. J. Honey (Praeger, 1962).

istic communism." Religious persecution could not be reconciled with holy war. So Mr. Kennedy in his interview with Walter Cronkite on CBS Sept. 2 ventured the opinion that "in the last two months the government" of Diem "has gotten out of touch with the people." This ranks with the best understatements of our time; Diem quite obviously has been out of touch with his people a good deal longer than two months.* Mr. Kennedy condemned the repression of the Buddhists but again his choice of words was tepid; he called it "very unwise." The words reflect neither moral revulsion nor human sympathy but only cool calculation. At a press conference a week later he summed up his policy. The test of official action in our government or Diem's was to be whether it might "handicap the winning of the war." This, and not justice for the people of South Vietnam or the establishment of a decent regime there, is our No. 1 aim. All else is subordinate to it. When the main objective is thus military, our main reliance is on the Pentagon and on cloak-and-dagger operations. The government becomes a prisoner of the end and the means it chooses. The type of men, mentality and institution brought into play determines the course of events and constricts the choice of alternatives.

Kindred Spirits

The CIA's dominant outlook, even more under McCone than under Dulles, sees Communist conspiracy in every type of colonial struggle and gravitates instinctively to repressive measures for dealing with it. The alliance between the CIA and Ngo Dinh Nhu, whose special forces—his Storm Troopers—have been getting $3,000,000 a year from CIA, is not accidental but reflects a kinship of spirit; McCone's religious and apocalyptic views are much like those of Vietnam's ruling family. The President has recalled John H. Richardson, the CIA chief in Saigon, under pressure from Ambassador Lodge, but there is no way of knowing what if any changes in CIA policy will be made. A cloak-and-dagger organization is by its very nature hard to control. It is difficult enough for the White House to keep a firm rein on the State Department a few blocks away; it is almost impossible to control a distant underground operation attracting a local entourage of informers eager to jump on the gravy train. The intelligence supplied by such a network is probably a good deal less reliable and perceptive than that which the careful reader can get for himself from the American, British and French press. Certainly no one following the press reports would have been as silly as was Secretary McNamara when he told a Congressional committee that there were three times as many Catholics as Buddhists in South Vietnam, and that the latter constituted only about ten percent of the population. This was a real scoop, comparable to the discovery that Ireland is largely populated by Protestants.

The Situation In the Villages

"The first target was the people themselves. The patient poor farmers were given the choice either of supporting the Viet Cong by providing supplies and recruits or of suffering violence. . . . Another important target were the civil servants of the Republic. . . . Hundreds . . . have been murdered by this Viet Cong terror. Their sacrifice must not be forgotten for it was made for all free men."

—Roger Hilsman, Ass't Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs, at the 1963 Conference on Cold War Education, Tampa, Fla., June 14, 1963.

Compare This The Official Myth With the Box Below

Whether Secretary McNamara was the victim in this of the CIA or of military intelligence no one knows. But the latter, too, must be a rich source of misinformation. Louis R. Rukeyser in the last of a revealing 6-part series from Saigon in the Baltimore Sun Oct. 18 wrote that at the military headquarters of Gen. Paul D. Harkins, "all is sweetness and light. The Viet Cong guerrillas are being licked, one is told, and it is only a matter of time before the assisting Americans can go home victorious." The French had a whole series of such Generals in Indochina; victory was always just around the corner.

The Kennedy Administration, like Eisenhower's and Truman's before it, has carried on its Indochinese policies behind a thick smokescreen of official falsification. The contrast between propaganda and reality is visible in Eisenhower's forthcoming memoirs (Mandate for Change: Doubleday) where Ike begins his part of this story by describing the Vietminh in the customary way as "so-called 'patriots'" and "Chinese supported rebels." He recalls with approval the NATO

 Diem seems to be out of touch altogether. The Australian newspaperman, Denis Warner, in his new book, The Last Confucian, writes, "Diem talks but never listens; he looks but never sees. Any Ambassador who can get in 500 words in a 4-hour conversation with him feels that he is just about hitting par for the course. Diem talks monotonously and repetitively, rambling from one subject to another and never talking a problem through . . . never does he spark with humor. Twin threads of thought provide the only continuity. One is the assumption that he is right and knows best; the other that he is the victim of lies and calumny."

Independent Observers Report Quite A Different Picture from The Villages

"In the countryside many of Diem's officials came to regard their government jobs as open licenses for larceny. They often extorted money from the peasants, demanding protection money from merchants and manipulated the prices farmers got for their crops. Thus the Viet Cong guerrillas could gain popular approval by occasionally murdering a corrupt official. Soon they had thousands of peasants eager to supply them with rice and information."

—Don Schanche: Saturday Evening Post. Jan. 6, 1962.

"Out in the more remote villages of mud and wattle, the government is identified as the man in uniform who comes on a punitive raid, or with a heavy bodyguard, and who always wants something—money, labor or even those suspected, sometimes incorrectly, of working for the Viet Cong.

"The Viet Cong cadre, on the other hand, is barefooted and dressed in black like every other peasant. He makes tax demands, but they are not excessive. He is meticulous about paying for food and lodging, and scrupulous, also, in his relations with village girls and with the villagers' property. To begin with, he does not talk Communism or Marxism, but exploits local grievances, and is at pains to implant the idea that the Vietnamese have thrown off French colonialism only to be saddled by President Diem with American colonialism. It is simple propaganda, but effective."

—Denis Warner: The Last Confucian (Macmillan, 1963)

resolution of Dec. 17, 1952, on the basis of which the Truman Administration next day launched its program of military aid to the French. This resolution said the war "was essential to the defense of liberty" and "in harmony with the ideals and aims of NATO." But Ike himself could not have taken these ringing phrases very seriously. For he confesses that he did not want to intervene in 1954 without at least token forces from other nations to "lend real moral standing to a venture that otherwise could be made to appear as a brutal example of imperialism." This need "was particularly acute" Ike adds, "because there was no incontrovertible evidence of overt Red Chinese participation in the Indochinese conflict." Later in the story Ike makes another admission that the government did its best at the time to keep from the American people. "I have never talked or corresponded with a person knowledgeable in Indochinese affairs," Ike now discloses, "who did not agree that had elections been held as of the time of the fighting, possibly 80 percent of the population would have voted for Ho Chi Minh." What the government said in public was very different from what it knew in private. The truth then and since has been that we were financing a war to impose on the Vietnamese a regime they did not want, first that of the French and then that of Diem.

Our Official Mythology

An elaborate mythology has been built up by the Kennedy Administration to cloak our role in what the French are calling the second Indochinese war. The first article of faith in this mythology is that the war broke out not because of Diem's failure to satisfy his people's aspirations in South Vietnam but because of his success. As Kennedy wrote Diem Oct. 26, 1961, "The Communist response to the growing strength and prosperity of your people was to send terror into your villages, to burn your new schools and to make ambushes of your new roads." This myth was further amplified in the two volume Blue Book on the war put out by the State Department a few weeks later, "A Threat to the Peace: North Vietnam's Effort to Conquer South Vietnam." Here the genesis of the war was spelled out even more glamorously, "The years 1956 to 1960 produced something close to an economic miracle in South Vietnam. . . . The economic and social advances scored by the South Vietnamese up to last year made it plain that Hanoi's program for peaceful takeover had little or no chance of success. If they were to win the Communists had to resort to force. . . . South Vietnam was outstripping the North in the same fashion that West Germany had exceeded the achievements of the 'socialist' East. The leaders in Hanoi apparently could not accept that prospect. They decided on a course of violence. . . ." The State Department has never tried to sell more obvious nonsense. Guerrilla war cannot be stirred up among a contented people. Yet this has been the official line ever since.

Rusk Hails Democracy Under Diem

"Critics have complained that South Vietnam is not a full constitutional democracy and that our aid has been subject to waste and mismanagement. Let us make clear that these criticisms are not merely alibis for inaction. For in passing judgment, let us recall that we are talking about a nation which has been responsible for its own affairs for less than a decade, about a people who have had no peace since 1941 and little experience in direct participation in political affairs. Their four national elections, their thousands of elected hamlet councils, and their forthcoming village council elections show steady movement toward a constitutional system resting upon popular consent."

—Secretary of State Rusk, "The Stake in Vietnam", before the Economic Club in New York, April 22, 1963.

Compare This The Official Myth With the Box Below

In part this myth was made necessary by the position Kennedy took on Vietnam in the 1960 campaign. The book of foreign policy speeches edited by the distinguished historian Allan Nevins for the campaign as Kennedy's "Strategy of Peace" also hailed, and virtually took credit for, "a near miracle" in South Vietnam. One of the speeches was made in 1956 to Diem's sounding board in this country, the American Friends of Vietnam. Nevins said "exceptional interest"

A Leading Authority on Vietnam Describes the Realities of Government by Diem

"On April 26, 1960, 18 highly respected citizens, including several former Cabinet Ministers, submitted an open letter to Ngo Dinh Diem, warning him of the disaffection of the people:

"'A Constitution has been established in form only; a National Assembly exists whose deliberations always fall into line with the Government; anti-democratic elections—all these are methods and "comedies" copied from the dictatorial Communist regimes. . . . Continuous arrests fill the jails and the prisons to the rafters . . . public opinion and the press are reduced to silence. . . .'

"With the progressive destruction of even the hope of institutional reform from within, all opposition to the Diem regime has had to be of a revolutionary nature. The paratroop putsch of November 11, 1960, was the first indication of that new ugly mood, although it was conducted, as its own leaders took pains to point out, in a 'gentlemanly' fashion. . . .

Having survived the putsch, the regime, in a first fright, announced on Nov. 17 a 'sweeping reform program.' But at the same time . . . began a 'purge' of known oppositionists. The Committee arrested the 18 signers of the April 26 manifesto, and coached mobs ransacked the offices of five newspapers that had shown themselves lukewarm towards the regime. . . .

"When the promised reforms were finally unveiled on Feb. 13, 1961 . . . they were hardly of the kind that would win the support of the villages. The bulk of the 'reform' consisted simply of promises that the various judicial and economic institutions embodied in the 1956 constitution would finally be brought to life and that—now that the villages were heavily Communist-infiltrated — provincial, municipal and village councils would be set up again. No promise was made that they would be elective in character, as they traditionally had been in Vietnam before during the colonial era and even in the midst of the Indochina War under the defunct Bao-Dai regime. . . .

"Thus the long awaited establishment of local self-government, widely considered to be essential to the success of the 'strategic hamlet' program, also became a meaningless distortion. In May, 1963, however, Saigon finally yielded to American advisers who maintained that the only way to win over the village population was to give it some real responsibility . . . the new 'reform' will leave the villages about as much leeway as the Communist village administration does."

—Bernard B. Fall of Howard Univ. in his forthcoming book, "The Two Viet-Nams" (Praeger).

Diem's Land Reform

"A land reform program, patterned on the land reforms in Japan and on Taiwan, was pressed forward—123,000 heads of families become small landowners. A comprehensive system of agricultural credit was set up. Thousands of Vietnamese were moved into the highlands to raise industrial crops."

attached to this speech because despite fears at the time—> the faith of friends like Senator Kennedy was actually well founded. The U.S. had the wisdom to grant South Vietnam about $500 million in various forms of assistance. . . . The little republic truly became what Mr. Kennedy calls it, a proving ground of democracy. It has produced in its President, Ngo Dinh Diem, one of the true statesmen of the new Asia. . . . Vietnam is a country of which the West may feel proud.

It would have been embarrassing to admit so soon that our statesman friend was a bust. A second reason for the myth that the revolt against Diem was fomented from outside was to marshal international support against it. In his speech to the UN General Assembly in New York Sept. 25, 1961, Kennedy cited South Vietnam as a threat to the peace. "South Vietnam," the President said, "is already under attack—sometimes by a single assassin, sometimes by a band of guerrillas, recently by full battalions. . . . No one can call these 'wars of liberation.' For these are free countries living under their own governments."

JFK's Own Troubles With Diem

But this picture of a peaceful and democratic regime attacked from outside soon became difficult to reconcile with Kennedy's own troubles with the Diem regime. Two months later (Nov. 29) he was questioned at press conference about the bitter attacks suddenly launched against the U.S. by "the government controlled press in Vietnam, apparently because we are asking for political reforms in exchange for our military and economic assistance." Kennedy in a rather fumbling reply said the U.S. was trying to get the Diem government to take "steps which will increase the sense of commitment by the people of Vietnam to the struggle." If Vietnam was a prosperous and democratic state, why this worry about an inadequate sense of commitment to the struggle by its people?

The truth is that the problem was not one of "inadequate commitment" by the people to the Diem regime but of positive hostility. To go through a pile of books and articles on the revolt against Diem as I have been doing in the past few weeks and to compare these unofficial accounts with the official pronouncements of the Kennedy Administration is a disturbing experience. On each page of this week's special issue, I have given a sample of these official myths and with each an excerpt from some independent scholar or journalist writing on the same subject. The reader will quickly see from these contrasting "boxes" that on every major aspect of the war the ~~Kennedy Administration has sought~~ to deceive ~~the~~ country. To bolster up these myths, it has cooperated with the Diem regime in making it as difficult as possible for independent American journalists to get the truth. Only a few weeks ago the Moss subcommittee on government information of the House of Representatives reported (Sept. 26) that > "In recent weeks the American public has been surprised by developments in Vietnam—developments which have been many months in the making but which the American people are just now discovering. The restrictive U.S. press policy in Vietnam—drafted in the State Department's public relations office by an official with an admitted distrust for the people's right to know—unquestionably contributed to the lack of information about conditions in Vietnam which created an international crisis. Instead of hiding the facts from the American public, the State Department should have done everything possible to expose the true situation to full view."

The final sentence is incredibly naive. In 30 years experience, the writer has never yet known the State Department to expose any true situation to full view. "Papa knows best" has always been its basic attitude. The official criticized, very unfairly, since he was only conforming to the department's tra-

Diem's Land Reform As Summed Up By A Reporter With Long Experience in Indo-China

A meager 1.4% of U.S. aid, or $15 million, went to agriculture between 1955 and 1960. The much vaunted rural help program did not exist. Land reform was a flop. . . .

"In marked contrast to the land reform on Taiwan, where landlords were allowed to keep only 3 hectares (about 7 acres) of medium-grade paddy field or twice that area of dry land, or in Japan, where ten acres of land in the rice areas was a family minimum, South Vietnam's land reform has been anything but radical. A landlord in South Vietnam may retain up to 100 hectares of rice land and another 15 hectares for burial grounds and ancestor worship. . . .

"The program lacked regulatory machinery to control tenant-landlord registration, and all sorts of side arrangements were entered into to defeat its intention. In Central Vietnam, where there are at least 100,000 farms of one hectare or less, each village has public lands which, in theory, it rents out at reasonable rates to the poorest peasants. The idea is that the public lands should provide both village revenue and relief. In practice, the system usually works as yet another means for squeeze and graft by appointed village chiefs and one of the worst forms of land exploitation. No security of tenure is given beyond the crop year, and there is no incentive for crop or land improvement when the poor peasants are allowed on the land. More often than not they do not get a chance at all, and the land goes to the richest and most prominent landlord.

"In areas where a lack of security had for many years prevented the landlords from visiting or collecting rents from their properties, the peasants regarded Diem's land reform as an added tax, or worse. . . . All they knew was that Diem had brought the landlords back. To be sure, they had to pay taxes to the Viet Minh and were liable to compulsory service as porters or as guerrillas, but they knew the money did not go to the profit of absentee landlords. Thus, in September 1957, when they discovered that in addition to the payment of what they regarded as exorbitant rentals, they now faced the payment of high prices (from $7 to $428 a hectare) for land they had once all but regarded as their own they did not often respond with the enthusiasm that Saigon and Washington attributed to them."

ditional press policy, is Carl T. Rowan, now Ambassador to Finland, then Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs. The Moss subcommittee called attention to a speech in which Rowan talked of the public's "right not to know," said that "in a period of undeclared war, we constantly must decide how far we can go in providing the well-informed populace without which a 'free society' becomes a mockery without violating our oath to protect this country" and complained that too few newspapers "are willing to weigh their stories against the national interest." But the Moss subcommittee did not mention that Rowan was only developing ideas put forward a few months earlier after the Cuban debacle by Kennedy in his speech before the American Newspaper Publishers Association. The purport of that speech was that if and when the government decided on a policy of undeclared war, the press ought not to publish matters which would let the public know what is going on. The effort to manage the news has never been more blatant than on Vietnam.

On Spraying Poison From The Air

Q. How successful, General, has your aerial spray program been to destroy rice crops of the Viet Cong and their hiding places in underbrush?

Gen. Earle G. Wheeler, Chief of Staff, U.S. Army: I don't think I'd better comment on that, if you don't mind.

—Briefing at the Pentagon, Feb. 4, 1963.

"Recently there have been efforts [in Vietnam] to pierce this cover in forest areas by having airplanes spray out defoliants—chemicals which will poison and kill the leaves. Such sprays are used commercially along the rights of way of railroads and power lines in America, but their real utility in operations against guerrillas still seems open to question. To obtain meaningful results large areas have to be treated and in the tropics new growth appears distressingly quickly. Then too there are serious psychological and political drawbacks. The government's act of spraying poison from the air, no matter how carefully the flights are directed, is not likely to endear it to the population of the region concerned. . . . The insurgents are certain to blame all subsequent crop failures and epidemics on these tactics and a considerable number of people may believe them."

—James Eliot Cross: Conflict in the Shadows. The Nature and Politics of Guerrilla War (1963).

The Army Prints A Birchite View

In some military circles suspicion of the press seems to have reached Birchite dimensions. Thus Dr. Fall, in his book, "The Two Vietnams," discloses that the U.S. Army's most respected publication, the Military Review of the U.S. Army Command and Staff College, ran an article in its May 1962 by Suzanne Labin "a French socialist with extreme right wing leanings."

The article, according to Dr. Fall, "flatly accuses anyone who does not support Ngo Dinh Diem . . . of being a participant in an immense campaign . . . launched by the Communists and their dupes." A milder variant of the same conspiracy charge was made by Joseph Alsop, always a faithful satellite of the military, in a column of Sept. 23. While generously absolving his colleagues in Saigon of being under Communist influence, Alsop accuses them of engaging in a deliberate campaign to discredit and unnerve Diem. This may help to explain why Also seems to be Mme. Nhu's favorite correspondent: Dr. Fall in his book recalls that even Time once poked fun at her for suggesting creation of a committee of foreign correspondents, preferably headed by Alsop, to hammer out a general line to which they would all adhere, just like the boys on Pravda. This was another glimpse of the mentality Robert Guillian described in Le Monde (April 16, 1961). "One sees South Vietnam," he wrote from Saigon, which has since barred him, "by a strange and fascinating mimicry, borrow part of its methods from North Vietnam and China, and transform itself more and more into a bad copy of a Communist totalitarian regime." The desperate attempt to hide the truth about this hopeless but savage war is pulling our government in the same direction, toward the rewriting of history in an attempt to impose a party line myth on the press and public. Unless there is a counter campaign of pressure to bring home the truth, the war will drag on, poisoning the air of freedom at home, imposing misery on the bewildered people of South Vietnam and risking a wider conflagration.

Civil Rights Compromise Stronger Than Kennedys Wanted

One way to begin an examination of the compromise civil rights bill is with a passage censored out of John Lewis's speech to the August 28 March on Washington by pro-Administration forces. The head of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee had wanted to say:

> We have learned, and you should know, since we are here for Jobs and Freedom, that within the past 10 days a spokesman for the Administration appeared in secret session before the committee that is writing the civil rights bill and opposed and has almost killed a provision that would have guaranteed in voting suits for the first time fair Federal judges. And I might add, this Administration bill, or any other civil rights bill, will be totally worthless when administered by racist judges, many of whom have been appointed by President Kennedy.

Curbing the District Judges

The fact is that among the provisions the Administration did not want but was forced to accept in the compromise bill is the one referred to by Mr. Lewis. The Administration wanted all suits involving the appointment of voting referees heard in the Federal district courts. Many of the District Judges, including some appointed by Kennedy, are racists. The compromise bill would deprive these judges of their power to drag their heels in such suits. It calls for the submission of voting right suits to a 3-Judge court to be named by the Chief Judge of the Circuit with expedited procedure and a direct appeal to the Supreme Court. While the compromise bill waters down the voting provisions of the subcommittee bill by making these applicable only to Federal elections, this new procedure would at last make workable the existing voting referee provisions of the 1960 Civil Rights Act which apply to State as well as Federal polls.

No Thanks to the Attorney General

The day a 3-Judge Federal Court in Georgia declared its incitement to insurrection statute unconstitutional and ordered four civil rights workers held under it set free, Senator Case of New Jersey protested in the Senate against the indifference of the Justice Department to this prosecution. He declared it a "shame" that the Department had not been represented in the court proceedings. He said he had written Attorney General Kennedy to express his disappointment about his "continued reluctance" to act, and received in reply a letter from Bourke Marshall which would be funny if the situation were not so serious. Senator Case said that though it was three months since the original arrests were made and though it had been apparent from the start that the purpose was "to discourage voter registrations by Negroes," the Justice Department was still "investigating." Though few if any papers seemed to report Senator Case's protest, we think it deserves attention. If the students had to depend on the Attorney General, they would still be in jail, facing a possible death penalty under a statute the Supreme Court held void a generation ago in the famous Angelo Herndon case.

The compromise bill, while weaker than the subcommittee bill, is a good deal stronger than the Administration bill. The compromise contains a number of provisions absent from the Administration bill. Among these is a Fair Employment Practices Commission; this FEPC would not be as strong as in the subcommittee version, which would have allowed it like other regulatory commissions to issue orders enforceable in the Courts of Appeal. It must act through the District Courts but it has the option of filing its suits either where the violation occurred or where the company's or union's main office is located. This means that big national concerns can be sued in the North. The Administration did not want a Title III allowing the Attorney General to enforce civil rights of all kinds; Title III of the compromise is stronger than Robert Kennedy wanted though not as strong as the subcommittee bill. The Administration didn't want a permanent Civil Rights Commission, as provided by the compromise. Nor the provisions for a census to reduce the South's representation in Congress if it continues to violate Negro voting rights. Nor the invocation of the 14th amendment as well as the commerce clause, a move which widens the orbit of enforcement.

The compromise bill was sold to the press by the Attorney General as a victory for reason and bipartisanship. The fact is that it illustrates the value of militant action. In the Judiciary subcommittee, the Young Turks like the Democratic Kastenmeier of Wisconsin and the Republican Lindsay of New York by raising the ante forced the Administration to accept more than it wanted. It had to do so because there were enough votes in the full committee to vote out the subcommittee bill; the Republicans, by helping to vote it out, would have put the Administration on the spot. The Administration's strategy is to cut down the Negro's bargaining power by making a bipartisan alliance with the Republicans, and enable itself to stand as a champion of moderation, with the least possible damage to its ties with the Southerners and the least possible risk of a kickback from Northern white suburbia. This strategy invites graceful retreats to get the bill out of the Rules committee in the House and through the Senate, which is unlikely to act this session. Unless a vigorous grass roots organizing campaign is begun now, in the neighborhoods, where effective pressure can be brought to bear on Congressmen and Senators, what finally emerges from the Senate next February or March will only be a shadow of this bill.

The Fateful Question: Call for A Mobilization of Conscience on Cuba and Vietnam

What If The People, After Diem's Overthrow, Vote for Peace?

The state of mind in Washington in the wake of Diem's overthrow was neatly mirrored in two statements, one before and one after the coup, by Rep. Zablocki (D. Wis.), just back from Vietnam as chairman of a Special Study Mission to Southeast Asia. The day before the coup Zablocki warned against any such attempt. "The lesson of Cuba must not be forgotten," he reported. "Batista was bad but Castro is worse." After the coup Zablocki told the House the U.S. should demand definite commitments for free elections and vigorous prosecution of the war. But what if, in free elections, the people were to vote for peace? Or for reunification with the North under Ho Chi Minh? Would we even risk such a verdict by allowing neutralist, anti-war or pro Communist candidates?

Democracy With A Big But

The answer seems obvious to the victorious Generals. On the one hand they said they would not set up a dictatorship because "well aware that the best weapon to fight communism is democracy and liberty." But in the very next breath they also said that they would not allow "a disorderly democratic regime." In Saigon a street rally calling for a neutralist government was forbidden and its banners torn down. Censorship continues. Only prisoners the military regard as non-communist are being released; only parties they regard as non-communist will be allowed. In practice this means that if there is to be a choice between democracy and continuance of the war, it is democracy that will go.

This is the reality the pro-Kennedy liberals will not allow themselves to see. Saigon is like Paris after the liberation; the people dance in the streets. But the Washington Post (Nov. 5) in a leading editorial thinks "the cause of freedom need not sink with the passing of the old government!" This is Orwellianism with a vengeance. "The cause of freedom" is not the Vietnamese desire for freedom from a U.S. supported tyranny; "the cause of freedom" is soap advertising lingo for continuation of cold and hot war. Yet the Washington Post goes on sanctimoniously to say that Diem "refused to respond to the feelings of his own people." The conservative Washington Star's editorial (Nov. 4) was more honest. If the people turn on a new government "force may have to be used . . . we cannot be too squeamish." If the Vietnamese don't want strategic hamlets, prison for those who oppose the war, napalm on suspect villages, we'll back a new dictatorship. This cabal of Generals headed by a weak turncoat who has served any and every regime foreign and domestic will bring neither peace nor freedom to Vietnam.

In the case of Vietnam, as in that of Cuba, we need a Committee to agitate for a truly democratic foreign policy: peace in Vietnam, lifting of the embargo that strangles hurricane ravaged Cuba. Can America's better conscience be mobilized?

Dr. Pauling and The Moon Race

We are sure the Nobel Peace Prize Committee in Norway will not let itself be disturbed by the petulant editorial in Life Magazine (Oct. 25) calling its award to Dr. Linus Pauling "an extraordinary insult to America." On the contrary the award will encourage all those scientists who stood with Dr. Pauling when his campaign to bring home the dangers of fallout was subjected to derision and smear in such publications as Henry Luce's Life and Time, the foremost journalistic supporters of Dr. Edward Teller.

We would like to see a committee of American scientists formed to take up and spell out in concrete terms Dr. Pauling's protest against the race to the moon in his address to the 100th anniversary of the National Academy of Sciences here Oct. 22. Dr. Pauling said we were at the point "when it would be possible, if only the money were available, to determine the structure of an enzyme" which "determines the way the human body functions." Dr. Pauling cited Prof. Wm. Fowler's claim that when we get to the moon we will know whether the 10 isotopes of tin are present in the same ratios as on the surface of the earth. "For the same amount of money," Dr. Pauling said, "we could answer 1,000 interesting and important questions about the human body and about the world we live in for every one question answered about the moon."

"I believe it is a pitiful demonstration of something wrong with our system of values," Dr. Pauling told the National Academy, "when we are planning to spend 20 or 50 billion dollars to put a man on the moon, principally for reasons of national prestige, rather than putting this money into a sort of engineering that would use essentially the same people, the same computers, the same big instruments to decrease in a really significant way the amount of human suffering on earth."

Why not a report which would draw up a balance sheet of what could be accomplished for human welfare with these funds? Better than a Russo-American agreement for a joint trip to the moon would be an agreement not to make the trip and spend the money on earth instead.

Douglas Reveals How Little U.S. Multimillionaires Pay in Federal Income Taxes

"I rise to state the urgent need for tax reform and to protest its slow and quiet strangulation. There are, in the hearings of the Finance Committee on the pending tax bill, some shocking figures . . . furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury . . . showing that in 1959 there were 20 persons in this country with incomes—adjusted gross incomes —of more than $500,000 who paid not a penny in Federal income taxes in 1959. . . . 15 persons having incomes of more than $1 million [and] 5 persons having gross incomes of more than $5 million who did not pay a single cent in taxes.

"Adjusted gross income does not include interest on State and municipal bonds. It does not include write-offs for drilling and developmental costs in the oil and gas industry. It does not include one-half of capital gains. All these were in addition. . . .

"These figures are shocking when one considers that any worker with a wife and two children who is earning just $100 a week . . . pays about $456 in Federal income taxes. . . .

"Of course, not every multimillionaire escapes wholly tax free, as these five managed to do. But the average multimillionaire comes surprisingly close to achieving just that. . . . There were, in 1959, 37 people whose total incomes . . . came to more than $5 million and they paid on the average a little less than 25% of their total income in Federal income taxes. That is only somewhat higher than the first bracket rate of 20 percent. . . . Furthermore the tax cuts passed since 1954 have gone almost entirely to the large taxpayers."

—From a speech by Douglas of Illinois to the Senate Nov. 1 which few papers reported despite its sensational revelations. Douglas said that since there was no chance of getting a tax bill this year anyway, there was no excuse for the Administration's dropping tax reforms for the sake of a speedy tax cut.

Glimpses from The Record: Why Senate Liberals Under Morse Want to Cut Foreign Aid

Eight Democratic Senators See Our Latin Arms Program Menace to Democracy

Foreign aid for many years has been supported by a coalition of U.S. military men (anxious to dump obsolete arms, usually at inflated prices), big business (glad to have the "climate" for investment abroad sweetened by U.S. handouts) and humanitarians (ready to support a program top-heavy with military aid to dictators for the sake of a relative trickle of funds for genuinely humane purposes). That coalition is breaking down. In the Senate an alliance of liberals and right wing anti-spenders led by Morse, is trying to cut down a program in which for every 5 cents which may help the poor, 95 cents goes to crooked allies of our military. Because this debate is being poorly covered, we give some excerpts here. The most important of the foreign aid amendments is that by Gruening (Alaska) to to halt further military assistance to Latin America. This was co-sponsored by Ervin (N.C.), Nelson (Wis.), Proxmire (Wis.), Cannon (Nev.), McGovern (S. Dak.), Morse (Ore.) and Smathers (Fla.). Here, abridged, is a bit of Gruening's Senate speech Nov. 1 on the folly of Latin military aid:

By Senator Ernest Gruening

Recent events in the Dominican Republic and Honduras give added emphasis to remarks I made last year about the dangers we were running in continuing to supply arms to Latin America. A year ago those supporting military assistance to Latin America claimed the following five objectives: 1st, hemispheric defense; 2d, standardization of weapons; 3rd, modernization of weapons; 4th, reduction of force; 5th, indoctrination of the military as to their role in a democracy.

That was last year before I showed on the floor of the Senate Aug. 2, 1962 that not only were none of the objectives achieved, but as to some the exact contrary was the result. So this year there is a 'new look' to the presentation of the military assistance program for Latin America.

Now It's "Internal Security"

The new look was described to the Senate Appropriations Committee by Brig. Gen. W. A. Enemark in these terms:

"It is charged that a threat of direct aggression to the hemisphere is not realistic. We agree. It was precisely for that reason that the primary emphasis of our military assistance program for Latin American was changed from hemisphere defense to internal security. . . ."

But under the guise of internal security and civic action, it is still no less a dangerous program and should be stopped. I am not alone in this. On Sept. 28, 1963, our able and distinguished majority whip, Mr. Humphrey, stated: "We will weaken and perhaps cause the failure of the Alliance for Progress unless something is done to implement an effective arms control agreement in this area." And, indeed, only yesterday Mr. Humphrey said: "I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Alaska and other Senators that in most Latin American countries there is a waste of money in the procurement of military equipment. If it is desired to reduce expenditures in the [foreign aid] bill, that is a good place to start."

Our Secret Deal to Aid Franco

"In payment for bases, the U.S. has, through fiscal 1962, extended $1.173 billion in economic aid to Spain and $524 million in military aid. She is down for tens of millions more in military aid next year.

"A few weeks ago it was announced that a new agreement extending our 'leases' has been reached. What is in that agreement is still unknown to the American people and to most of Congress. It is known to call for an undisclosed amount of military aid to Spain. It has also become known that the agreement does not permit the U.S. to use the naval base at Rota for our Polaris submarines. Since the Strategic Air Command bases in Spain are steadily decreasing in importance, it is very difficult for me to see what purpose has been served by this agreement. . . .

"Imagine the hue and cry that would go up if an executive agreement of this kind were worked out in secret—and held in secrecy—with Indonesia, or British Guiana, or Algeria, or some other totalitarian government of the Left. But little is said about a secret agreement with a totalitarian government of the Right. . . ."

—Sen. Morse Nov. 1 on his amendment to cut foreign aid to Spain, Portugal, Greece and Turkey 25%.

Indeed it is. Hence my amendment. Since the inception of the Latin American military assistance program in 1951, we have poured over half a billion dollars into Latin America. Let us judge the program on the basis of its performance.

Can we point with pride to Peru where a year ago August military hardware supplied by the U.S. was used by the military forces there to take over from the civilian rulers of that country? Can we point with pride to the Dominican Republic? Can we point with pride to Honduras? There again U.S. arms made possible the coup. In the minds of the people of Peru, the Dominican Republic and Honduras, are we not aligned with the military cliques which have thrown out the governments selected by the people themselves?

Always the usurpers claim they come in to fight Communism, but within the last few days other dispatches told how, on taking over, the junta had jailed Communists, expelled them, and driven them from the Dominican Republic, so that presumably that country was free of Communists. Yet now the government of the Dominican Republic has suspended freedom of speech and freedom of assembly, in order allegedly to prevent Communists from subverting public order. The truth, of course, is that it was done to prevent the people from voicing their opposition. This is what we can expect in every such military takeover.

Morse Protests NATO's MLF Plan As Scheme to Give Germans Nuclear Arms

"Unless Congress is firm now, the American people are going to find themselves saddled with the cost of another NATO venture, one of the most expensive and least useful —the Polaris-carrying surface fleet. One would think that at a time when the American government has been trying to persuade our NATO partners to start putting up their fair share of the conventional forces, it would have better judgment than to propose a nuclear fleet for which we are offering to pay 40 percent of the cost!

"What a sham we are making of the notion that NATO is a multi-lateral alliance! It is a German-American alliance, as this proposed nuclear fleet makes embarrassingly clear. . . . I have not heard any clamor from the German people to become a nuclear power. They know, as the world knows, that any step in the direction of nuclear weapons for West Germany is considered by the Soviet Union to be a grave threat to her security. . . .

"Of even greater concern to me is the constant implication in all these discussions that once the nuclear fleet is a reality, the U.S. would be willing to give up the control of its warheads. . . . In my opinion, the time for Britain, France, Holland, Italy and Belgium to indicate their rejection of nuclear weapons for Germany is right now."

—Senator Wayne Morse (D. Ore.) Nov. 1 release to press.

The Story Behind the Raids On An Inter-Racial Lawyers Guild Affair in New Orleans

Eastland and Sourwine Sued for $500,000 in Anti Civil Rights Conspiracy

In South Africa, a brave Judge throws out the indictment of 11 opponents of apartheid for "sabotage" but the defendants are at once rearrested. In Louisiana, another brave Judge, Bernard J. Cocke of the State Criminal Court, throws out charges of Communist conspiracy against James A. Dombrowski, executive director of the Southern Conference Educational Fund, its treasurer Benjamin E. Smith and the latter's law partner, Bruce C. Waltzer. But they find that the private papers illegally seized from them in the arresting raids have been spirited out of the State, to Mississippi and to Washington, for use in further harassing actions by Senator Eastland.

A True Son of the American Revolution

This is the background of the $500,000 suit filed by Dr. Dombrowski and the SCEF in the U.S. District Court here in Washington against Eastland, his counsel Jules Sourwine, the heads of the Louisiana State Police, and the chairman of the Louisiana Un-American Activities Committee. Jim Dombrowski, a saintly man, a Doctor of Theology from Union Theological Seminary, a lifelong fighter for racial justice, himself Southern born, descendant of a Polish General who came here to fight under George Washington, has long been a target of Eastland. Nine years ago, when the informer Paul Crouch named Dombrowski as a Communist before Eastland's Internal Security Committee, Dombrowski denied the charge under oath and Eastland never dared prosecute him for perjury. This hasn't prevented Eastland and his friends Governors Wallace and Barnett from smearing Dombrowski and through him the anti-segregation movement.

The suit charges Eastland and his fellow plaintiffs with conspiracy that was intended to defame and to strike terror among advocates of integration. On Oct. 4, just as the National Lawyers Guild (with the Louisiana chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union) was opening an inter-racial workshop in New Orleans on civil rights, 100 State police raided the meeting, the SCEF offices and the homes of the three men arrested. Smith and Waltzer were taken into custody at the workshop. The streets outside their homes and the SCEF offices were cordoned off for three hours while the premises were ransacked. Next day, perhaps in fear that the charges might not stick, the records were "subpoenaed" from the State Police by Eastland's Internal Security Committee and later (despite a suit for recovery in Federal Court in New Orleans) removed from the State. South Africa is not the only place where racists ignore court decisions. The suit against Eastland will test whether they can get away with it.

The Missing Ounce

An Eisenhower appointee to the Federal bench in the District of Columbia, Geo. L. Hart, Jr., a Virginia Republican, has administered an implied rebuke to the Kennedy Administration in the case of Alden Whitman, reconvicted of contempt of the Senate Internal Security Committee. Judge Hart not only suspended a fine of $500 and 6 months in jail but waived any requirement to report during 10 days probation. Judge Hart said the "trials and tribulations" during the eight years the case has been in the courts was punishment enough.

Were this any ordinary case, neither Mr. Whitman nor any of the other seven contempt cases reversed by the Supreme Court last year would have been reindicted. The same ground on which the Court threw out the indictments makes it doubtful that new convictions can stand on appeal. The Kennedy Administration reindicted rather than risk a fight with the Internal Security Committee and the House Un-American Activities Committee.

It is a commentary on these cases that Judge Hart, who presided over the Whitman retrial and Judge Keech, who presided over the earlier contempt trial of John T. Gojack are refusing to take any more of them and there is difficulty in finding judges here willing to preside over the others. The cases are relics of an atmosphere a decade ago of which most Americans are ashamed. Several of the defendents, like Mr. Whitman, are victims of an attempt by Eastland and his counsel Sourwine, to smear America's greatest newspaper, the New York Times. With just an ounce of courage and moral conviction, the Attorney General might have won applause by refusing to reindict. The ounce wasn't there.

Special 8-Page Issue on That New Berlin "Crisis"

How A Coincidence Strangely Like The U-2 Affair Upset A Detente and Brought Us Close to the Brink Again

I. F. Stone's Bi-Weekly

VOL. XI, NO. 23 NOVEMBER 25, 1963 WASHINGTON, D. C. 20 CENTS

The Hidden History of the Incidents on the Autobahn

The peculiar thing about the recent incidents on the Berlin autobahn was the date on which they began. This was October 10. But for these incidents, it would have been a red letter day for peace. On October 10, representatives of the U.S., Britain and the Soviet Union deposited at the State Department the diplomatic instruments formally ratifying the nuclear test ban treaty. From Moscow that day Premier Khrushchev sent messages to President Kennedy and Prime Minister Macmillan saying the treaty showed that the most complicated problems could be solved even by nations of differing social systems if they had a genuine desire to do so. In Washington on October 10 the President sent Congress a message defending the sale of wheat to the Soviet Union. And at the White House, as if to dramatize the change in atmosphere, the President held his first meeting with Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko since their conference of bitter memory on the eve of the Cuban missile crisis one year earlier. The stage seemed set at last for substantial progress toward peace.

Just in Time to Upset The Thaw

Then, as if maleficent forces were at work, just as Secretary of State Rusk was preparing to leave the State Department for the scheduled meeting at the White House with Gromyko, word was rushed to him that the Russians had held up two U.S. military convoys on the Berlin autobahn and were refusing to let them proceed unless the troops dismounted for a head count. The incident was as if made to order for the enemies of peace. The New York Herald-Tribune underscored the point in page one headlines next morning, "Irony of Kennedy-Gromyko Talks—First Cuba; Now A Berlin 'Incident'." Time magazine (Oct. 18) said "For once, talk about a thaw in the cold war seemed realistic. And then, for some mysterious reason that would require a Communist mind to unravel, the Russians deliberately tried to unthaw the thaw." This was characteristic of how the press handled the story from there on in. But even the meagre facts provided in the first news dispatches from Germany indicated a good deal of on-the-spot confusion as to just what the proper procedure for checking U.S. convoys was. If the reporters were confused, it was not impossible that the Russians at the checkpoints were, too.

The UPI from Berlin (Washington Daily News, Oct. 11) said the Army insisted the Russians had no right to make U.S. troops dismount for a head count "and said the soldiers could be counted in the vehicles, as is the usual procedure." On the other hand, an Associated Press dispatch from Berlin the same day (Washington Post, Oct. 11) said "When unusually large numbers of troops are being carried in convoys, they sometimes dismount to be counted by the Russians." The AP added, however, that "the Western Allies feel that dismounting for border checks is a 'courtesy' and not a procedure that must be followed at all times."

Practically A Soviet Tradition

We don't know who is now the head of the Soviet secret police, but his three predecessors, Yagoda, Yezhov and Beria were each in their turn executed as foreign agents. Objectively speaking, as the Marxist-Leninists like to say, the present man in charge seems to be following in their footsteps. To arrest Prof. Barghoorn just in time to upset the 30th anniversary of the resumption of U.S.-Soviet relations, the wheat sale, and new cultural exchange negotiations was a master stroke. In Stalin's day they would have shot him first and then settled down to investigate whether he was working for the CIA, the Germans or both.

Khrushchev, like Kennedy, seems to suffer from an internal opposition in his own bureaucracy which would like to trip up better Russian-American relations. We applaud the quick release of Prof. Barghoorn, and the firm stand by the President which brought it about. We believe that every blow against the Soviet secret police system is a blow for peace and a favor to the people of the Soviet Union. We hope a new cultural exchange will be made contingent on a promise to activate at last that clause in the Roosevelt-Litvinov recognition agreement which promised that when any American was arrested in Russia our authorities would be notified and given a chance to see him "without delay." We still remember the ugly way Anna Louise Strong was arrested in Moscow as a spy.

But then it turned out, after the convoy had been released only to be held up a second time at the other end of the autobahn several hours later, that the Russians not only were unaware of this supposed U.S. regulation but had deliberately been kept in the dark about it. A later Associated Press dispatch (York, Pa., Gazette & Daily, Oct. 14) quoted "high administration sources" as giving "this assessment of the convoy incident: The Russians apparently thought the 18-vehicle U.S. convoy carrying 61 men and supplies was varying from customary procedures. The U.S., for its part, has kept its exact operational procedures on the Berlin route a secret because it maintains there should be no interference with its access to Berlin." What then were the "customary" procedures to which the Russians were "accustomed"? How could we blame them if they failed to observe procedures we kept secret from them? These questions were neither raised nor answered. "U.S. convoys have been dismounting their personnel," this dispatch said, "when they numbered more than 30 passengers so it would be easier for the Soviets to check them through, but the Russians were not informed that the U.S. had decided on 30 as the dividing line."

Clay's "Counter-Erosion" Strategy

To keep the U.S. regulations secret from the Russians was asking for trouble, especially on so sensitive a highway as the autobahn to Berlin. Indeed, if this were the whole truth, one wondered why there have not been more incidents in the past over refusal to dismount. The Allied military traffic on this autobahn is very heavy. "The total number of vehicles moving each way on the autobahn," said a special story in the London Sunday Times (Nov. 1), "average nearly 30,000 a year; of these roughly 18,000 are American, 9,000 British and 1,000 French." Checking procedures have developed over the years, "based on the Russians' admitted right to be satisfied that road vehicles are carrying Allied traffic." The Russians were told how many men were in each convoy and left to check this as best they could. The practice of dismounting to facilitate a head count began in August 1961 after a 1500-man battle group on its way to Berlin in the crisis atmosphere created by the erection of the Wall dismounted to speed up its clearance. Thereafter the custom seems to have become general as a convenient way to facilitate clearance. Gen. Clay when he got to Berlin in September (see the Associated Press backgrounder, Washington Star Nov. 9; Washington Post Nov. 10) seems to have felt however that this new practice of dismounting represented an "erosion process" which was wearing away Allied rights on the autobahn. The Associated Press story suggests that on his urging there then began a counter process. "This was the beginning," the AP said, "of the British and American tactic of dismounting troops of larger convoys but not when relatively few men were involved." For a clearer picture of this "counter erosion" process one must turn to a revealing article by a former Army officer who was stationed in Berlin and is close to Gen. Clay, Jean Edward Smith, writing in The Reporter for Nov. 21. This was the strategy Clay suggested, according to Smith:

> "Instead of a refusal to dismount, the response should be varied: First, a few small convoys with only drivers should be sent through. These need not dismount since their numbers could be ascertained easily. The size of the convoys not dismounting could be gradually increased. Simultaneously, however, larger convoys should make this trip and—as usual—should line up for the Soviet head count. In other words, the Russians were to be kept guessing, the size of the convoys not dismounting would get larger and larger until finally the precedent had been eroded. The success of this maneuver clearly depended on the Russians' not realizing what was happening. . . . This, then, was the situation when the first incident occurred last month. We were still nibbling away at the precedent set in August, 1961; and the U.S. garrison in Berlin, taking advantage of the growing detente, elected to try the issue once more on October 10.

An Invitation to Trouble

> "The vagueness of arrangements for inspecting military convoys to and from Berlin is an invitation to trouble as well as to genuine misunderstanding. The Americans have been in the habit of dismounting passengers if their number exceeded 30 excluding drivers and co-drivers. The British set the figures a little higher. There is no ruling on the number of vehicles or the density of their passengers, and no standard practice among the western powers themselves. It is therefore as difficult for the Russians to know whether something new is being tried out on them as it is for the Western powers to know whether they are being subjected to deliberate harassment. The Russians can help repair the impression they have made by joining a sensible agreement on the subject."
> —Editorial in The Times of London Oct. 17, the morning after a British convoy to Berlin was held up.

So, according to this account, the incidents were precipitated by the U.S. military, taking advantage of the thaw, as an attempt to "nibble away" at Soviet rights of inspection, not the other way around, as our press presented it. Smith says the idea of dismounting only if the number of combat troops exceeded 30, without counting drivers or assistant drivers, "was not a standing practice." He says it was worked out in negotiations with the Russians. Indeed it was not devised, he writes, until "Friday afternoon, October 11, as a means for extricating the convey held at Babelsberg, and subsequently was imposed on the U.S. Berlin command from Washington." According to Smith, "the first time the people in authority in Berlin learned of the formula was when they saw it in the papers," and "they were subsequently ordered to comply."

What is Smith's authority and what are his sources? This former Army officer is now Faculty Scholar of Public Law and Government at Columbia. His new book, "The Defense of Berlin," claims to be based in part on exclusive interviews with General Clay. It takes a hard line on the German question and is critical of President Kennedy and the New Frontiersmen for seeking fresh approaches to the German problem and abandoning the intransigent positions of the Adenauer-Dulles period. It pictures an "anti-Clay axis" at work in Washington. Rusk, Stevenson, Rostow, Schlesinger and Bohlen are all mentioned unfavorably and the President's proposal for a Berlin access authority is pictured as appeasement. The book is written as a defense of General Clay's position, as is The Reporter article.

Too Close to Shooting for Comfort

The defense of Clay by Smith in The Reporter illustrates the risks incurred by the probing operation of October 10. Smith writes that "General Clay emphasized gradualness and flexibility." Smith criticizes the October 10 probe. "The requisite finesse was lacking," he writes. "Under the Clay formula, flexibility was an essential ingredient." Smith says that "when it appeared that the Soviets were going to balk, as soon became evident, the convoy should have dismounted before the issue was joined. As it was the convoy commander—acting under orders which were far too rigid—refused to give in, and national prestige was involved." Smith said that General Clay in Berlin "chose his issues with incomparable skill, and in no case placed himself in the position where the U.S. would bear the responsibility for firing the first shot." Unfortunately, Smith continues, in his analysis for The Reporter, "the first autobahn incident was not so carefully selected. For if the Soviets had not decided to allow our convoy through we would have had no choice but to shoot or dismount. And no one has ever assumed that the U.S. should go to war over the reluctance of soldiers to dismount." We seem to have come very close to that, however, in the autobahn incidents.

Smith's sources in West Berlin seem to have felt differently about this. The fact that the Soviets gave in and let the first two convoys proceed without dismounting from Marienborn, made it look as if the risk had paid off. "In West Berlin at that time," Smith writes, "the military assumed that the U.S. had scored a cold-war victory."

Our military had, in fact, chalked up two cold victories. One was over the Russians. The other, which Smith only touches on in another context, was over Kennedy. For as Smith says in describing the situation when the original convoy was held up the second time at the other end of the autobahn outside Berlin late on the night of the 10th, "President Kennedy undoubtedly was in an uncomfortable position that night. He had firmly, perhaps irrevocably, committed himself to an election campaign based on peace and prosperity, and on improving relations with Russia. Perhaps the Soviets even shared this desire, but now, because of incidents not really designed by either side [but Smith had just finished saying they were designed by the U.S. military!—IFS], the whole accord—to say nothing of Mr. Kennedy's campaign pitch—seemed to be drifting away."

Perfectly Reasonable

Berlin—U.S. Major Gen. James H. Polk, the man who must make the big decisions in this divided city, quickly put the latest U.S. Soviet crisis over Berlin access rights in perspective yesterday. "They are trying to make the point that they are the ones who are calling the shots on the autobahn," the American Berlin commander said. "We are determined that they will not make it. I can't predict what will happen," he added grimly. "My only answer is that we are ready for anything and are prepared to cope with it."

Gen. Polk said the Allied procedures are "perfectly reasonable." He added: "A Soviet officer can count the men sitting inside the trucks—if he can count."

—Myron Kandel in the New York Herald-Tribune from Berlin, Nov. 7.

It is a pity the Berlin military cannot be called before a Congressional investigating committee and asked who authorized this probing operation, and who picked the day when the nuclear test ban treaty was to be formalized and Gromyko was again to be at the White House. The coincidence, the unleashing of a new cold war atmosphere, remind one of the U-2 flight scheduled just in time to disrupt the Paris conference.

Smith criticizes the October 10th operation for lack of flexibility. If the purpose was not so much to set a new precedent on the autobahn as to poison the atmosphere against further negotiations, rigidity was useful. Few Americans realize how carefully planned the incidents of October 10th were and the risks incurred. Once the Russians refused to let the convoy pass, contingency plans were put into effect which might easily have escalated. Let us notice first that two convoys met at the Marienborn checkpoint and refused to dismount. One was eastbound to Berlin, the other was westbound from Berlin; the latter, the larger one, with 73 men in 25 vehicles, had passed through the checkpoint outside Berlin without incident. Presumably its men had dismounted It was essential for this convoy to reach Marienborn without delay in order to make a joint stand there with the incoming convoy because the first step in the contingency plan was to block all traffic on the autobahn. This required large con-

"One would love to know his name, so one could send him a letter of thanks. Whom? To the man who, in the Kremlin, has fabricated this incident on the Autobahn. Perhaps it was the big chief in person: he merits our gratitude. For he has opportunely reminded us how dangerous a thing is this famous detente [i.e. the relaxation of tension between the U.S. and the USSR]."

"An ironic byproduct may be something of a tonic for a host of ills now sapping alliance solidarity. . . . Revival of the Berlin crisis as a live threat to Europe, this reasoning goes, could improve the climate for a number of pending measures for strengthening the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. These include: A broad U.S. backed plan for closer coordination and more equal sharing of the cost of NATO defense; a campaign to prod lagging NATO partners to fulfill their treaty obligations, and a program for a multi-lateral nuclear surface fleet armed with Polaris missiles and manned by mixed crews from a half-dozen or more nations. But if this is indeed the likely upshot of renewed Berlin tension, what's in it for Mr. Khrushchev?"

voys in both lanes. This was the first time the U.S. military ever tried this, and it might have led to serious trouble. The fact that all traffic was blocked was only disclosed two days later at a press conference in Berlin (see New York Times, Oct. 13), where it was described as "a successful bid to break the first Soviet attempt to detain the troops."

How We Blocked the Autobahn

The spokesman at the press conference boasted that within an hour the Russians processed and released both convoys. Whether this was because of the road block or because of messages from Gromyko in Washington to Moscow is not known. When the Berlin-bound convoy reached the other end of the autobahn three or four hours later, it was again held up for refusal to dismount. Here again a similar double play seems to have been prepared. A second convoy headed for West Germany had already been cleared through the checkpoint. It was made up of 164 men on 26 vehicles, and it had no trouble clearing, presumably because its men dismounted to be counted. But it did not move on; it waited for the inbound convoy (New York Times, Oct. 13, p.3 col. 4). This meant that again there were large convoys in both lanes, one already cleared in the westbound lane, the other newly halted in the eastbound lane where it had refused to dismount for counting. The two convoys were again in position to block all traffic in both directions.

An even more risky ploy seems to have been used in this second encounter. According to the New York Times (Oct. 12) from Berlin "Shortly before noon yesterday, [i.e. Friday the 11th], the Army ordered Lieutenant Fields [who was in command of the Berlin-bound convoy] to test Moscow's intentions by raising the barriers at the Babelsberg checkpoint in an attempt to get away without permission. The Soviet officer in charge then moved up two armored personnel carriers with 50 soldiers to block the autobahn." What if Lt. Fields had been shot when he raised the barrier and tried to go through without permission? This was a dangerous place to play games but the Russians backed down again, and on the 12th the convoy was allowed to proceed without dismounting. But in the meantime the cold warriors had had their inning. The New York Herald-Tribune under banner headlines the morning of Oct. 12 spoke of another eyeball-to-eyeball confrontation (see box p. 2) and suddenly Major Gen. James H. Polk, U.S. Commandant in Berlin, was being called "No Nonsense" Polk. This publicity buildup might have Soviet Press Release on Nov. Incident

"On 4 November a U.S. military convoy consisting of 12 vehicles refused to submit to the customary control at the Soviet crossing and checkpoint in Marienborn. It did not proceed on its scheduled route from the German Federal Republic to West Berlin. The officer in charge of the convoy, who produced documents pertaining to the trucks and the U.S. military personnel travelling in them, declared that he could not parade his military personnel; nor could he give orders to open the sides of the trucks for checking the military personnel shown in the documents. He added that he would be relieved of his command if he did this. The conduct of the military personnel in this instance distinctly departed from the rules governing the passing of U.S. military personnel through Soviet crossing and checkpoints previously observed by U.S. military convoys.

"The reference by the Americans to instructions issued among the U.S. troops in Germany and which violate the rules laid down, of course, cannot have any validity for Soviet crossing and checkpoints. At the conference of the commanders-in-chief of the allied powers on June 1945 it was clearly laid down that 'Soviet troops will guard, patrol (kommandodienst) and regulate traffic on the roads mentioned.' For many years no complication arose in this connection at the crossing and checkpoints. The rules governing the passing of military personnel and supplies of the three powers through crossing and checkpoints are known to the American military authorities. The incident created by the convoy in question has thus been clearly artificially created by the U.S. military authorities guided by some erroneous considerations."

—From Nov. 6 statement by Soviet press officer at Marienborn, as broadcast by East Berlin radio that day.

What Khrushchev Actually Said to the Visiting U. S. Businessmen

MR. JAMES H. BINGER, president, Honeywell Regulator Co.: We were all very happy to learn this morning that the American convoy blocked on the road to Berlin had been allowed to proceed. Could you tell us why it was stopped?

MR. KHRUSHCHEV: A certain procedure has been fixed for the control of allied military units using the Berlin autobahn. Every time that military personnel of American, English or French units have respected this procedure, they have been allowed to pass. When they have not respected it, they have been held up, and it will always be so.

As soon as the American officers allowed the procedure utilized for years, they were authorized to proceed. There was no reason why the American soldiers had to stay blocked for two days. In fact, I was surprised that they were able to stay so long in their trucks. They must have hidden resources. But that is an internal problem in which I do not wish to interfere.

It is difficult to say what would have happened if the customary procedure had not finally been respected. Perhaps neither you nor I would be here today. We would certainly not have given in and it would have been necessary to pass over our corpses. It is you who provoked this incident. For our part, we want no tension of this kind.

MR. RICHARD CLURMAN, chief of correspondents, Time-Life: Do you mean to say that if there had not been an agreement about procedure, you would have given the order to fire and a war could have resulted?

MR. KHRUSHCHEV: We have given no order of this kind, but a soldier is a soldier. He has his instructions and if someone wants to infringe them by force, it is inevitable that he will resist by force. A soldier is not a Minister of Foreign Affairs. He does not engage in negotiations. He applies his orders. That is a law that applies as much to your soldiers as to ours.

It is clear that you wished to put us to a test of nerves. We responded by placing our armored vehicles across the road in order to test your nerves and see whether you would shoot or not. You did not do it, and we are very happy about that.

A VOICE: But what rule did they violate?

MR. KHRUSHCHEV: As for that, I advise you to ask your Ambassador, Mr. Kohler.

cost the rest of us dearly.

The crazy comedy was repeated, this time by the British on October 16. On that day the Russians held up a British convoy of nine trucks and 28 officers and men for nine hours at the Babelsberg checkpoint after they refused to dismount for counting. The Russians finally waved them through but three hours later, at the other end of the autobahn in Marienborn, they were again held up for three hours. Again the Russians gave in. Here again the same strange numbers game took place. According to the Times of London (Oct. 17) "The British procedure, which the Russians have previously accepted, has been that troops should get out only when the number of men is above a certain figure—which is not being disclosed because it is felt it would become a bargaining point for the Russians—or if the number of men in any one vehicle exceeds a certain number."

Almost Gilbert & Sullivan

Not only were the British pursuing the same tactics as the Americans in not telling the Russians what the magic number was at which convoys would dismount, but the British number seemed to be different from the Americans. For next day, the Russians passed four British convoys without trouble. The Times of London reported (Oct. 18), "The Russians this time appeared to be conciliatory. According to the British understanding of the procedure they were entitled to ask all the men to leave their vehicles, as the convoys each consisted of about 60 men. They left only those vehicles, however, where the number exceeded the established figure." Apparently the British, unlike the Americans, had two sets of numbers, one for the total number in the convoy, the other for the number in each vehicle. The Times in an editorial (see box at top of col. 2 on our page 2) seemed to think this might breed a dangerous confusion, and its diplomatic correspondent (Oct. 18) said the Allies were in consultation on the problem. He reached almost Gilbert & Sullivan heights in explaining the situation. After saying that a Foreign Office spokesman had said he believed the Allied position was "perfectly understood" by the Russians, the Diplomatic Correspondent went on to say—

They Know, But We Don't

Berlin—Perhaps a Martian newspaper will report some day that humanity was obliterated from the Earth after an American soldier refused to drop his tail gate. If his readers are puzzled, they will be no worse off than the Earthling outsiders who try to follow the intricacies of the international debate over Berlin. . . .

Unfortunately the terms under which the Americans and British and French will dismount never have been made public. Everyone knows that 30 troops riding as passengers are a magic number; above 30, dismount; 30 or less, no.

But the formula is more complicated than that. Its details are a Western military secret known only to the Russians, the East bloc countries and possibly the Red Chinese.

—Henry L. Trewhitt, the Baltimore Sun's correspondent in Germany, Nov. 10.

> The fact is, however, that the normal practice of each of the western allies—in leaving vehicles to be counted, for instance, if the number of men in the convoy is considerable—have never been exactly stated to the Russians, because the allies claim full and unrestricted access as their right, and wish to avoid any implication that their normal and well recognized practices, which have grown up for convenience, cannot be varied. Clearly the Allies would not put forward to the Russians an alteration of their rights. If, however, misunderstandings of their normal practices can lead to serious incidents, there is a case for making clear the sort of procedure which they are each, normally, prepared to accept.

This would seem to reserve the right for the Allies to act abnormally, or eccentrically, when they so choose, leaving the Russian checkers to decide whether to shoot, wave them through, or summon a psychiatrist.

As a result of these doubts, the Western allies proceeded to draw up common rules and presented them to the Russians on Oct. 29. This led to new confusion because the British customarily lowered the tailboards on their vehicles to make it easier for the Soviet checkpoint officer to count the men in them. "The Americans," according to the London Times (Nov. 8), "whose tailboards were lower, and therefore less of a hindrance to checking, refused to lower them." The French had no tailboard problem, since they normally send their troops to Berlin by rail anyway. A compromise was finally reached; tailboards were to be lowered if over 6 feet. "The Russians were not consulted on the memorandum" ac-

New Yorker Suggests The Berlin Incidents May Be A New Form of Bloodless Combat

". . . Then the Russians shifted their demands, and asked that the tailgates of the trucks be lowered, so that our troops could be counted while remaining inside. Again we refused—not because Western troops always refuse to lower their tailgates but because Allied rules call for such lowering only when tailgates are more than six feet high. In this case, as we told the Russians, the tailgates were less than three feet high, and on this firm mathematical ground we drew the line and took our stand. Once again the Russians changed their demands, and asked that the American troops stand inside the trucks to facilitate a head count. This was going too far. Without even bothering to work out the mathematical justification, we took our stand and remained seated. However, as the Times reported the next day, our soldiers 'climbed off their trucks repeatedly to eat, sleep and relax' during the long ordeal, and this gave the alert Khrushchev the basis for his misleading 'victory' statement.

"All this may still seem a little confusing until one realizes that both superpowers—apparently convinced that a nuclear war would leave neither victor nor spoils—have devised a substitute form of combat, which produces headlines but no casualties, and provides precisely the same number of victors as there are participants. The very pettiness of the argument adds a safety element. Who ever heard of two superpowers going to war over three feet of tailgate? Perhaps the best analogy is to a certain social ritual that most people have participated in, or at least observed, during their formative years. The ritual consists of two small boys' standing toe to toe on an imaginary line, surrounded by an audience of their peers, and challenging each other to step over the line. Sometimes there's a bit of pushing and shoving, but almost always the crisis ends without bloodshed. Almost always. At least 9 times out of 10."

—The New Yorker: Talk of The Town, Nov. 16.

cording to the London Times "as the essence of the Western position is that they have unrestricted right of access and agree to certain procedures as a matter of general convenience." At the same time, according to this London Times "Guide to Incidents on Berlin Access Routes" (Nov. 8), the Western memorandum was not published. "The Western allies," the diplomatic correspondent of the Times said, "preferred not to establish a clear-cut position in public which might make it harder for the Russians to withdraw in case of dispute." Another motive may have been not to embarrass the Russians unduly by making it appear that the West was dictating traffic regulations for the autobahn. If so this was upset by a leak to the press. "Unfortunately," Neal Acherson, Berlin correspondent of The London Observer revealed in his paper (Nov. 10), "this action was leaked by a West Berlin Senate official to visiting American journalists. It looked as if the Russians were taking Allied instructions about how to run the autobahn. Possibly, as a direct result, the American convoy was stopped at Marienborn." This was a reference to the incident of Nov. 4 to which we now turn.

A New Set of Rules

According to the London Times account of Nov. 8 quoted above the Nov. 4 incident was the result of a deliberate test. "No acceptance of the Western memorandum having been received for five days," the Times reported, "the U.S. government, which had a convoy due to leave Berlin sent it off in 12 vehicles with 44 men in all—i.e. fewer than 30 passengers, if drivers and co-drivers are excluded—a form deliberately chosen to test whether the Russians accepted the procedure announced in the memorandum." This memorandum represented a new stage in the autobahn troubles. Earlier the U.S. was trying to whittle away the custom of dismounting large convoys. Now they were presenting the Russians with a new set of rules for the autobahn under their control. Five days seems a rather short time to wait for a response to so basic a precedent. For if the West fears a whittling away of its rights on the autobahn, so does the East. Certainly this picture is different from that conveyed to newspapermen by the State Department on Nov. 4, that the Russians were trying to change practices which had existed for many years.*

Checkers Not Allowed to Check?

"Sir—Am I the only one who is puzzled by the latest installment of the Berlin crisis? There seems to be general agreement that Russian checkpoints exist, presumably for the purpose of checking, and that we do recognize that they have some right to know how many allied servicemen proceed to or from Berlin, although the Russians did not usually bother with counting small numbers.

"The three Western powers informed the Russians about the number of troops which they have a right to send past the checkpoint without the Russians counting them. Two questions immediately arise.

"The first is that no checking authority could possibly concede the principle that it must always take the word of those checked about their own numbers. It must reserve the right occasionally to see whether they are telling the truth.

"Secondly, and more important, the Soviet cannot possibly concede the principle that the checking procedure, their procedure, can be determined by the unilateral declaration of the Western powers. To all intents and purposes we compelled them to act. Having done so, we sound the alarm, talk of 'blockade' and speculate about their far-reaching motives. What is the point of all this?"

—Letter in The Times of London Nov. 11 by A. Nove, Dept. of International Economic Studies, University of Glasgow.

Those Russians Just Don't Understand Good Old Teamster Union Practices

We keep having these tieups on the autobahn to West Berlin. Mr. Khrushchev says any one of them could lead to a nuclear holocaust and the end of civilization. True. But fear not. Neither side will ever yield.

As you know, the Russians get to check every convoy of troops we send over the autobahn to West Berlin. And if there's more than 30 passengers in the trucks, they have to get out, line up and be counted. A typical cold war agreement. Very simple. Theoretically.

But take the last tie-up. Along come 12 United States trucks. "Stop" says the Russian colonel. And he peeks inside. "Aha!" he says, "you've got one, two, three, four, five . . . 44 soldiers in those trucks. That's more than 30. Now that I've counted them, they've got to get out and get counted."

"Hold it" says the American colonel. "You counted the drivers, too. Drivers don't count."

"So, okay," says the Russian colonel, "we don't count the drivers. You've got one, two, three . . . 12 trucks. Twelve trucks, 12 drivers. Twelve from 44 that's let's see, 32. Hah! Everybody out!"

"Hold it!" says the American colonel. "We got 24 drivers. Count them for yourself. Those 24 in the front seats are drivers and those 20 in the back seats are passengers. What's the matter, can't you count?"

"You mean it takes two drivers to drive one truck?" says the Russian.

"Right," says the American. "One steers and the other lights his cigarettes, wipes the windshield, scratches his back and hollers 'Look out!' when necessary. Just like the Teamsters Union. It is, sir, the American way!"

"Bah!" says the Russian colonel. "I am checking with Moscow." So he does.

"Don't back down!" cries Moscow. And rushes up reinforcements.

"Don't back down!" cries Washington. And rushes up reinforcements.

All Soviet forces are alerted. All United States forces are alerted. NATO is alerted. Rockets presumably swivel ominously into position. France and Britain cry, "Don't back down!" And rush up reinforcements. To defend America's inalienable right to have two drivers in every truck.

Forty-two hours pass. Personally, I don't know how World War II was averted. Because both sides claim they didn't back down. But 42 hours is a long time to sit in a truck.

Well, whatever, I'm glad we didn't blow up civilization. This time.

But don't get me wrong. I'm sure we're all willing to die for our right to have two drivers in every truck. Just as all Russians are willing to die for the egalitarian principle of one truck, one driver. Moreover, if you're looking for a reason to destroy civilization, it's as good as any. If you're looking for a reason.

—Arthur Hoppe, Washington Star, Nov. 12.

* The formal protest note of Nov. 6 got around this by

The Nov. 4 incident was carefully prepared from the Western side, and apparently, unlike the Oct. 10, with full knowledge of higher quarters. The Baltimore Sun reported from Berlin Nov. 6 that the Nov. 4 convoy was "the first direct challenge" since Oct. 10, "All American convoys since then have been formed in such a manner that they would dismount under their own rules." The knife-edge issue drawn was neatly phrased by the Baltimore Sun's correspondent in Berlin (Nov. 11) when he said, "The Russians say that they have to count the soldiers moving over the road. The Western allies agree but they decide what arrangements are made for counting them." The same dispatch threw further light on the argument when it said, "The Russians complain that they cannot see to count men inside a dark truck."

Russian Compromises Rejected

The Russians seem to have met the "crisis" by offering to compromise. If the men would not dismount, they asked that our men lower the tailgates for counting. When this was refused, they asked if the men in the truck would stand up to be counted. This was also rejected. These offers to compromise were described by Allied spokesmen in a belligerant and arrogant manner. They said (Baltimore Sun, Nov. 6) that "during the last two days, three separate and entirely arbitrary demands were made by Soviet authorities to change existing procedures. These were: demand to dismount; to lower tailgates, and for personnel to stand in the trucks to be counted. All were flatly rejected by U.S. authorities." Since we recognize the Russians' right to count and check the numbers against the convoy papers, this seems a very chip-on-the-shoulder attitude.

How East Germany Saw It

"Cold war propagandists had a field day early in October, when they tried to play up a procedural difference on the West Berlin border into an 'international crisis'. . . . The conditions for the use of this motor highway by military transports have never been clearly defined in international agreements; a confused, and confusing, series of precedents have grown up since 1945, and arguments between American convoy officers and Soviet guards have recurred at irregular intervals over the past 18 years. . . .

"Observers in Bonn stated that there was some indication that the incident had been provoked by local American commanders, in cooperation with West German militarist circles, to upset the present tendency towards relaxation in the German question.

"It was pointed out in Berlin [i.e. East Berlin—IFS] that the incident showed how important it is for the powers concerned to conclude a proper detailed agreement on the legal status of West Berlin and its communication routes. Until such an agreement is reached, minor local differences can be used by anti-relaxation forces to create a major incident."

—Democratic German Report Oct. 18, a fortnightly published in East Berlin by the British journalist, John Peet, Krausenstrasse 9, Berlin W 8, an unofficial organ of the East German regime's point of view.

It is as if our military were spoiling for a fight. The convoy was blocked at Marienborn 9 a.m. local time Nov. 4. "At midnight," the UPI reported (New York Daily News, Nov. 5), "the convoy suddenly moved out without Soviet permission. It rolled about a quarter of a mile past two road barriers but was blocked about 400 yards inside East Germany as Soviet armored cars and five trucks, presumably laden with troops, rolled up to stop it. . . . West German truck drivers who passed through the checkpoint reported that the armored cars carried mounted machine guns." This effort to crash the border was made, according to the Baltimore Sun account, (Nov. 5) "apparently after a midnight deadline set by the U.S." It was this which brought about that danger of shooting and war to which Khrushchev referred in his interview with the U.S. business men (see box bottom of p. 4).

some ingenious wording. It said that in stopping the convoy the Russians were acting "in contradiction with the established procedures followed up to the present time by the Allies. The pertinent procedures currently in effect were communicated by the 3 governments to the Soviet military authorities last Oct. 29." So the rules had been in effect all of 8 days!

* Compare the statement made by the new British Prime Minister while the convoy was still being held. He said that "so far as he knew there was nothing sinister about the dispute in the Berlin corridor. . . . 'The dispute is about the opening of tailboards on the vehicles which carry the troops to and from Berlin'." (The London Times, Nov. 6.)

"Our Tailboards Are Our Bulwarks Against Communism"

(The dramatic inside story of the Marienborn crisis, as related by Major-General Sir Roderick Talltrouser, Deputy-Director of Western Face, in a specially written new instalment of his memoirs, "Forty Years of Saving It.")

MARIENBORN! Throughout the annals of the free world the name will ring like a clarion call. Whenever they hear it, men will lift their heads proudly and say:— "Our tailboards were never lowered!"

The truth is that for 41 hours the Americans remained in their lorries on the autobahn and valiantly refused all Russian requests for co-operation in counting them. They refused to dismount. They refused to stand up. They refused to lower their tailboards.

As soon as we at Face H.Q. were informed of the American's position, we sent out a British and a French convoy as relieving forces, with strict instructions to remain seated and keep their tailboards up at all costs. The Russians, I regret to say, took this as the opportunity to play a particularly dirty trick on the American commander. They told him that at Babelsberg, at the other end of the autobahn, the French had, in fact, lowered their tailboards.

Fortunately, he refused to believe it. "What?" he must have said to himself. "Is it likely that the French, who did not lower their eagles at Austerlitz or Borodino, have lowered their tailboards at Babelsberg?"

The views of my American and French colleagues and myself, I may say, were in the closest harmony throughout the crisis. At one joint stag meeting the warm emotional tone rose to such a pitch that I became somewhat carried away. I stood up and sang to the assembled Western officers: "British tailboards never, never will be lowered."

At this, I am proud to say, there was applause, and my French colleagues jumped up and declared: "Ils ne baisseront pas!" The senior American general present added: "Be assured, gentlemen, that when the time comes to stand up and be counted, we will sit down and refuse to be counted." It was truly a moving moment.

IFS to Speak for Peace in Vietnam 8 p.m. Dec. 5 at Palm Gardens, 310 W. 52nd St., New York City, under Auspices of Studies on the Left

Khrushchev was not the only one who saw grave possibilities in the confrontation, though these possibilities were not advertised by U.S. military spokesmen until after the crisis had passed. Thus Myron Kandel from Berlin in the New York Herald-Tribune (Nov. 6) after the convoy was released said Allied officials had been meeting in Bonn and Berlin on next steps to be taken under their contingency plans and "Officials have confided privately that invoking some of these measures runs the risk of East-West bloodshed." The Baltimore Sun's correspondent (Nov. 7) said "evidence grew to indicate that the autobahn incident came nearer the point of explosion than anyone has admitted publicly." Earlier the New York Herald-Tribune (Nov. 5) had reported from Washington that the government's reaction to the new holdup "was one of studied calm. . . . Officials said there was a detailed contingency plan that had been worked out well in advance with the British, the French and the Germans, 'It's quite a bag of tricks'," an unnamed official was quoted as saying. Both the Herald Tribune and the Wall St. Journal drew a parallel with the Cuban crisis, the latter saying (Nov. 6) after it was over that the "latest Russian blockade became, in its way, almost as flagrant and frightening a test of Western will as the Soviet move to slip missiles into Cuba."

More Trouble May Lie Ahead

Fortunately the Nov. 4 convoy in one crucial detail had different orders from that of Oct. 10. The men in the latter were not allowed to dismount even to answer the calls of nature. In the case of the former "There was no lack of opportunity to count the men," the New York Times reported (Nov. 7), "for they showed themselves freely in periodic moments of relaxation and for a night time bivouac at the side of the road." This allowed the Russians a face-saver. They could claim that they had counted the men in accordance with their normal procedures. These counting procedures obviously are not limited to dismounting. As one U.S. official told the Washington Star afterwards (Nov. 6) "It's quite obvious that their procedures are quite flexible." That's more than can be said for ours.

But what happens next time? Nothing has been settled. What if next time U.S. troops stay in their trucks and cannot be counted? What if a dispute arises as to whether there are 30 or 31 passengers? "This argument has not yet been settled," a Western official told the Associated Press in Berlin (Baltimore Sun, Nov. 11). "Our plans are based on the expectation of more trouble in the near future." Major Gen. James H. Polk our commander in Berlin told the Baltimore Sun (Nov. 7), "We are ready for any type incident." Its correspondent said, "Neither Polk nor John A. Calhoun, chief of the U.S. mission, appeared to be optimistic that further incidents could be avoided." Polk's attitude may be gathered from his statement at press conference in the same dispatch when he said he would "not submit our troops to degradation and harassment." Why was it suddenly degradation to allow themselves to be counted standing up instead of sitting down?

Bonn Was Pleased

Bonn, Nov. 9—A measure of wry satisfaction was evident in Bonn this week as officials followed efforts of the U.S. to extricate one of its military convoys from a Soviet blockade on the Berlin autobahn.

Unlike Washington, Bonn had no doubt from the moment a previous U.S. convoy was held up a month ago that Premier Khrushchev had chosen deliberately to squeeze the West where it hurt. When the Soviet's authorities set in motion a conflict that could conceivably escalate into world war, West German officials are certain that no room is left for "local misunderstandings."

From the point of view of West Germany, the Soviet leader has thus performed a useful service. Even the most pro-American officials in Bonn have been troubled in recent months by what they regard as an imprudent dream in Washington that the intractable problems of Germany and Berlin could be at least temporarily by-passed in a drive for detente with the Soviet world.

—New York Times Sunday Review Section, Nov. 10.

If the Nov. 4 orders had not left a loophole for counting, if the Russians had not backed down, if shooting had started from either side when the convoy crashed the barrier, a World War might have been precipitated. Berlin is the neuralgic nerve of East-West confrontation. As serious as the light-minded way such great risks were taken over such picayune issues was the way the whole affair was misrepresented by U.S. press and officials.

President Johnson: Lower Level Than JFK But The Country Could Have Done Worse, See Page 2

I. F. Stone's Bi-Weekly

VOL. XI, NO. 24 DECEMBER 9, 1963 WASHINGTON, D. C. 20 CENTS

We All Had A Finger on That Trigger

There was a fairy tale quality about the inaugural and there was a fairy tale quality about the funeral rites. One half expected that when the lovely princess knelt to kiss the casket for the last time, some winged godmother would wave her wand and restore the hero whole again in a final triumph over the dark forces which had slain him. There never was such a shining pageant of a Presidency before. We watched it as children do, raptly determined to believe but knowing all the time that it wasn't really true.

Of all the Presidents, this was the first to be a Prince Charming. To watch the President at press conference or at a private press briefing was to be delighted by his wit, his intelligence, his capacity and his youth. These made the terrible flash from Dallas incredible and painful. But perhaps the truth is that in some ways John Fitzgerald Kennedy died just in time. He died in time to be remembered as he would like to be remembered, as ever young, still victorious, struck down undefeated, with almost all the potentates and rulers of mankind, friend and foe, come to mourn at his bier.

Impasse at Home and Abroad

For somehow one has the feeling that in the tangled dramaturgy of events, this sudden assassination was for the author the only satisfactory way out. The Kennedy Administration was approaching an impasse, certainly at home, quite possibly abroad, from which there seemed no escape. In Congress the President was faced with something worse than a filibuster. He was confronted with a shrewdly conceived and quietly staged sitdown strike by Southern committee chairmen determined to block civil rights even if it meant stopping the wheels of government altogether. The measure of their success is that we entered this final month of 1963 with nine of the 13 basic appropriation bills as yet unpassed, though the fiscal year for which they were written began last July 1 and most of the government has been forced to live hand-to-mouth since. Never before in our history has the Senate so dragged its heels as this year; never before has the Southern oligarchy dared go so far in demonstrating its power in Washington. The President was caught between these old men, their faces set stubbornly toward their white supremacist past, and the advancing Negro masses, explosively demanding "freedom now." Mr. Kennedy's death, like those of the Birmingham children and of Medgar Evers, may some day seem the first drops portending a new storm which it was beyond his power to stay.

In foreign policy, the outlook was as unpromising. It was proving difficult to move toward co-existence a country so long conditioned to cold war. Even when Moscow offered gold for surplus wheat, it was hard to make a deal. The revolt in Congress against foreign aid illustrated how hard it was to carry on policy once tense fears of Communism slackened even slightly. The President recognized the dangers of an unlimited arms race and the need for a modus vivendi if humanity was to survive but was afraid, even when the Sino-Soviet break offered the opportunity, to move at more than snail's pace toward agreement with Moscow. The word was that there could be no follow up to the nuclear test ban pact at least until after the next election; even so minor a step as a commercial airline agreement with the Soviets was in abeyance. The quarrel with Argentina over oil concessions lit up the dilemma of the Alliance for Progress; however much the President might speak of encouraging diversity, when it came to a showdown, Congress and the moneyed powers of our society insisted on "free enterprise." The anti-Castro movement our CIA covertly supports was still a spluttering fuse, and in Vietnam the stepping up of the war by the rebels was deflating all the romantic Kennedy notions about counter guerrillas, while in Europe the Germans still blocked every constructive move toward a settlement in Berlin.

The Real Test of Our Morality

One way to demonstrate to the world in the wake of the President's assassination that we are a civilized people would be to pass a law forbidding the CIA ever, directly or indirectly, to finance or plan the killing of a foreign leader we dislike.

Essentially Conservative

Abroad, as at home, the problems were becoming too great for conventional leadership, and Kennedy, when the tinsel was stripped away, was a conventional leader, no more than an enlightened conservative, cautious as an old man for all his youth, with a basic distrust of the people and an astringent view of the evangelical as a tool of leadership. It is as well not to lose sight of these realities in the excitement of the funeral; funerals are always occasions for pious lying. A deep vein of superstition and a sudden touch of kindness always lead people to give the departed credit for more virtues than he possessed. This is particularly true when the dead man was the head of the richest and most powerful country in the world, its friendship courted, its enmity feared. Everybody is anxious to celebrate the dead leader and to court his successor. In the clouds of incense thus generated, it is easy to lose one's way, just when it becomes more important than ever to see where we really are.

The first problem that has to be faced is the murder itself: Whether it was done by a crackport Leftist on his own, or as the tool of some rightist plot, Van Der Lubbe style, the fact

Any Honeymoon With Congress Is Likely To Be Short; Bobby Baker LBJ's "Heel"

Johnson Far Below JFK in Sophistication, Breadth and Taste

The scramble for positions of influence with the new Johnson administration makes it almost impossible to get an objective view of the man; everybody from the politicians to the Washington correspondents are, with few exceptions,* outdoing themselves in flattery of the new monarch. His vanity, his thin skin and his vindictiveness make even the mildest criticism, or approach to objectivity, dangerous.

The Perfect Extrovert

The negative aspects of Johnson are these. In sophistication, education and taste, he is a sharp drop from Kennedy. He has hardly read a book in years; never reads when he can help it; prefers to get information by ear, but rarely listens. He is one of the most long-winded men in Washington; a Babbit, with a remarkably small stock of basic ideas; these consist of a few clichés about freedom, which he translates largely into the freedom of the entrepeneur to make a buck. Money and power have been the motivating passions of his life. He was a New Dealer when that was the road to power, he became a conservative when that was the way to stay in. He is the perfect extrovert, with no convictions and a passion for "getting things done," anything. He rose as rapidly as he did in the House and later the Senate by endless sitting-at-the feet, after hours, of Sam Rayburn and later Senator Russell. Then he listened, the respectful and flattering young man; he had a genius for ingratiating himself with the old men of the Southern oligarchy. But he kept his lines open to the liberals, in order to deal with them, too, and he likes to picture himself as a Westerner rather than a Southerner.

Johnson's skill as a legislative manipulator may be overestimated. In the Eisenhower period, he was an effective middle man between the Republican and Democratic conservatives. In the special session of 1960, after the election, however, he and Kennedy together found it impossible to put through a moderately liberal program. Johnson is not a racist or a reactionary; he once told a visiting civil rights group that he had learned all he knew on the subject from Aubrey Williams (of the Southern Conference Educational Fund, once Johnson's boss in the New Deal's National Youth Administration) and Mary McLeod Bethune. As a shrewd politician, he knows he must move slightly leftward and make civil rights his No. 1 issue if he is to change the view of him as a Southern politician, with a basically standpat philosophy. In Texas the liberals distrust him deeply for running out on them and his New Deal past; the conservatives hate him for having been a more than loyal Kennedy lieutenant on civil rights.

The Southern Oligarchs Unsoftened

The Republicans suddenly feel a chance to win the next election and he will have a very short honeymoon. The Kennedy assassination has not softened the hearts of the Southern oligarchs and their coalition with the Republicans may easily and quickly be resumed. The vulnerable point of the new President is his old protege, Bobby Baker, a mercenary corkscrew of a character whose extraordinary influence in the Senate throws a horrifying light on the decayed underside of that august institution, and on Johnson's own aesthetic standards. The Republicans may have trouble in exploiting the Baker case, however, because it probably links up with as many ugly deals on their side of the aisle as on the Democratic side. It will take all Johnson's skill and energy to hush up this scandal and get action out of Congress. Men like Fulbright and Benjamin V. Cohen will be good influences in this administration, but on the whole Johnson like Truman will bring a lot of rather unseemly cronies to town and its level of literacy and civilization will fall again, as it did after FDR.

The hope is that men change and grow. A man's past is not necessarily a guide to his future, especially when he reaches the highest posts of a society. The sense of role, the maturing effect of responsibility, the consciousness of duty and love of country, the sense of humanity and history, all have their effect. Tom Clark, a one-time Texas lobbyist, not much of a lawyer, but a decent human being and never a racist, has made an honorable record and grown in stature on the U.S. Supreme Court. There may be surprises in Johnson, and we wish the new President luck. The manner and energy of his debut stir hope.

 The only exception we have noted is James Reston who dared write in his column (New York Times, Nov. 27) that Johnson was "tyrannical with his personal staff, disorderly about administration and apoplectic about characters who write sentences like this . . . more thin-skinned about press criticism than anybody . . . since the last President Johnson . . . he has tended to regard dissent as perversity . . . as if criticism were not a duty in a free society but a crime" For a bureau chief, for whom access to the White House is a necessity, this took courage.

Oswald's Mexican Trip May Prove The Key To The Assassination

The Left would like to find a way to blame it on the Right; the Right would like to blame it on the Left; the Arabs, in the ever irresponsible Egyptian press, are trying (because of Rubi) to blame it on the Jews. We have had phone calls from readers around the country, offering jigsaw puzzle theories of how the Kennedy assassination happened. We think it dangerous to spin theories from so few facts.

The press learned something from the McCarthy years, and handled the fact that Oswald seems to have been some kind of a leftist with great restraint. Not so many years ago there would have been screamer headlines, in some sectors, at least, "President Killed By Red." For this we can all be grateful and for the new Administration's wise move in heading off Eastland and the House Un-Americans by appointing a top level Commission under the Chief Justice to examine and report on the facts.

The killings may be just what they appear to be, or they may be part of a plot. If they are, it will take considerable time and hard digging to find out. What this requires is much more police work by police more trustworthy than those of Dallas and less sympathetic to the right than the FBI. It is always dangerous to draw rational inferences from the behavior of a psychopath like Oswald. But it would be important to know who financed his trip to Mexico, and why he took steps which at once, in a more panicky atmosphere, might have linked the Russians and the Cubans with the slaying.

Difficult to Organize the Poorest and the Wealthiest Among Negroes . . .

By John Perdew

In case you should wish to introduce this article you should know that I am 21, a student on leave from Harvard College, a field worker with SNCC. I've spent five months in southwest Georgia, partly in Albany and partly in Americus. I spent 20 days (June 19-July 9) in jail in Albany on charges of disorderly conduct, defacing public property, resisting arrest, and assault with intent to murder. I was released on $1900 bond (cash). I spent 85 days (August 8-Nov. 1) in Sumter County jail on charges of inciting to insurrection, interfering with a lawful arrest, rioting, unlawful assembly, and assault with intent to murder (state charges) and resisting arrest and disorderly conduct (city charges). I was released by order of a three-judge panel of federal judges on $2100 bond, which declared the insurrection and unlawful assembly statutes unconstitutional and all eight peace warrants lodged against me invalid. The court is in recess and will convene again after Dec. 1 to decide whether to issue an injunction restraining local officials from depriving people of their civil rights under color of law.

Participants in the civil rights movement today are not given to utopianism, but a theme which lies behind picket lines, mass demonstrations, and arrests is the attempt of American blacks to feel the pain of oppression which they have so long suppressed and find the strength to overcome it.

This became painfully apparent to me during my three month stay in the Sumter County Jail in Americus, Georgia, on charges of inciting to insurrection. One of the black prisoners there, a man in his forties, could not stop calling me "sir", even after I tried for several weeks to break his habit. For him the pain of communicating with me, a white, was so great that he avoided me as much as possible even though he knew I was in jail because of civil rights work. The way to relationships of mutual respect between white and black is blocked by deep counter currents in the personalities of, I would say, the majority of Southern blacks.

Still Jim Crow Despite ICC

Surface events in the racial struggle mean little until one can understand why, in Albany, Georgia, in spite of an ICC ruling which ended segregation in the bus terminal there, few blacks use the formerly "white" waiting rooms. After two years of mass demonstrations, boycotts, and voter registration, Albany blacks have little to show for their suffering in official desegregation, and the balance weighs heavily against even casual integration. The scale of success, however, is the people's state of mind, and there are at least several hundred blacks in the city who can now face a white man without the need to feel servile. These are the ones who have faced beatings, jail and the wrath of the white man with aggressive non-violence and have experienced at least temporary unity in the long-divided Negro community.

We asked one of the Americus Four to write his story for us and we are proud to present in his own words the reactions of John Perdew of Denver to the situation in the South. It breathes an objectivity, a humanity and a selflessness characteristic of SNCC. This article is given new meaning by the news that a grand jury in Americus has reindicted Perdew along with the other three (Ralph W. Allen of Melrose, Mass.; Donald Harris of New York City and Thomas McDaniel of Americus) for assault with intent to murder and rioting. The widest possible public support must be mobilized for these heroic young men if the vindictive authorities of Americus are not to succeed in finding some way to keep them in prison for many years.—IFS

There is at least one basic institution through which Southern blacks (I use "black" rather than "colored", which is the euphemistic word attached to segregated facilities) attempt to release and rectify the frustrations which result from inferior status. Country churches in particular have evolved a "language" of music and preaching and patterns of intense emotional possession which are baffling and embarrassing to whites used to more formal and "rational" means of religious expression. The elaborate, shifting chords and embellishments of a "common meter" hymn; the rising cadence of the black in the pulpit singing the Word; the shouts of the old bent ladies in the Amen Corner; the pleading prayers of the grimacing deacon—all are media through which, I think, the most oppressed blacks may convince themselves that their afflictions represent the road to that "great gettin'-up mornin' ".

The most talented and sensitive SNCC workers enter a country church and speak in the language of black religion but with the message that suffering, while a source of strength, is dehumanizing, that retreat only intensifies it. Black churches, for this reason and for convenience, become the site of mass meetings, the most regular feature of the Movement, and old hymns carry new words, themes such as "We shall not be moved", "We shall overcome", "This little light of mine, I'm gonna let it shine".

A totally different reaction to segregation consists entirely in an attempt to be "white". Students at Negro colleges in the South, many teachers at all levels, some ministers with relatively wealthy congregations, and aspiring politicians and professionals deny their "roots" in black culture. Straightened hair, a flashy car, esoteric cultural tastes and formal, restrained church services become symbols of the escape. The result, in terms of the Movement, is that many, though certainly not all, of the upper classes in the Negro community will not actively identify themselves with the Movement.

In canvassing for voter registration I have found the most response from people in the middle ranges on the Negro income scale. The very poor are frequently afraid of me as a white (sometimes they will not answer the door, other times they will agree to everything the canvasser says in order to get rid of him). Or they are realistically or irrationally afraid that they will suffer eviction, firing, or even "legal" or physical intimidation. Ignorance and apathy as well obscure the connections in their minds between their personal failure to register and the fact that from top to bottom the "government is a white man". At the upper end of the scale, businessmen are threatened with white boycott, revocation of licenses, litigation, and property damage if they take an uncompromising public stand for black interests. Teachers, ideally a powerful force, usually in my experience succumb to subtle pressures from principals and the school board, much as teachers all over the nation willingly or not steer away from "controversial issues". All of these pressures reinforce the tendency to disavow "black roots" in a drive for respectability.

Only the most confident and aggressive leader can counteract the forces which maintain the status quo, for on the level

What the Reviewers Are Saying About I. F. Stone's Book

"THE HAUNTED FIFTIES"

Donald Mintz in the Washington Star (Nov. 4):

"Mr. Stone's little journal . . . is one of a favored few small journals whose influence is greater than their subscription lists. . . . Within a few pages of the beginning of the book, all insidious notions of skipping here and skimming there vanish. . . . Mr. Stone's reports and polemics have survived very well indeed. . . . primarily because Mr. Stone is so remarkably clear minded . . . with a power of penetration that must make other commentators despair. . . . Genuine conservatives should enjoy Mr. Stone nearly as much as radicals."

Gerald W. Johnson in The New Republic (Dec. 14):

"His astonishing quality is not that he is independent but that, being independent, he has survived. . . . He is controversial in a day when controversy is equated with sin. He is bold, when courage is next door to treason. He is non-mercenary when indifference to money is close akin to forgetting God. He is extremely diverting when being amusing without being on television is usurpation."

Emile Capouya in The Saturday Review (Nov. 16):

"That one-man journal was founded in the days when Senator Joseph McCarthy was making the rules around here, and I suppose it is one of the reasons that McCarthy's triumph was not more complete in his lifetime, nor his heirs more firmly in power now. . . . Mr. Stone's reportorial prose is beautifully clear . . . clean as good French."

Quincy Howe in Book Week (Nov. 24):

"In this age of Hearst task forces, Time-Life writer-researcher-biographer teams, and Readers Digest condensations, I. F. Stone stands out as the embodiment of do-it-yourself journalism."

Senator Joseph S. Clark (D. Pa.):

"I am glad you have collected your pieces and given them this permanent form. It is our guarantee that there will be an alternative to the pap in tomorrow's history books, just as there is an alternative to the pap in today's newspapers in your splendid newsletters."

Wm. German in San Francisco Chronicle (Nov. 3):

" 'The Haunted Fifties' . . . measures up to a remarkable vivisection of a nervous and stange decade. . . . The wonder and excitement of those 10 years comes back strongly as Mr. Stone's scalpel sifts through the weekly bits. . . . More power to this cheerful prophet."

Sam Galabow in the Charlotte (N.C.) Observer:

"This book is written by a man with a great sense of social justice. . . . It is amazing that one man can be so fearless and brave, that one man can refuse to tolerate cruelty and injustice, that one man can persevere in the search for truth, and that this same individual can also feel cheerful about the human race and believe that man ultimately will solve his problems."

Virginia Kirkus' (Book) Service (Oct. 1):

"It has been ten years since I. F. Stone has appeared in hard covers: a long time, indeed, and readers of this book are likely to agree both that it was much too long and well worth the wait. As a collection of contemporary articles on every conceivable political and moral aspect of the troubled times between Eisenhower's and Kennedy's first months in the White House, this volume is nothing short of astounding. What Stone saw so clearly and fought or advocated then, nearly everybody holds to be self-evident now . . . This is contemporary history of the finest, most readable sort."

THE HAUNTED FIFTIES

by I. F. STONE

A collection of Mr. Stone's most important writings in the first decade of this journal.

"In this country one contemporary journalist has over a period of many years distinguished himself in reporting and interpreting the news—that less glamorous part of it, at least, which has not to do with crime, communism, sex, and baseball. The exception is I. F. Stone. The qualities of the exceptional man pervade and inform all that he has written and have kept the bulk of the pieces in this collection very much alive."

of personal contacts all but the most militant need a lot of pushing to rise out of short-term thinking and passivism. It is clear that youth are the most active leaders and followers in this Movement, but the most charismatic leaders are often defeated by their heroic image when, for example, their awed followers ask for autographs and lavish praise rather than risking jail and violence. An everyday principle in SNCC work is: balance between the hardest demands of a militant movement and the compromise necessary to maintain enthusiasm and communication.

Despite endless condemnation of the effects of white domination in propaganda, a basic submission to authority sometimes emerges in the strangest places. A southwest Georgia police chief once entered a mass meeting wearing his gun and was greeted not with a mass exit or cold silence but with uncertain applause. A skillful law officer can blunt the edge of the strongest leadership. Journalists, ministers, parents, and teachers can apply similar pressures in creating an aura of conventionalism — in phrases describing the "well-dressed, middle-class" Movement—which obscure the originality and depth of change. Paternalism as well undermines resentment and determination by a superficially friendly atmosphere.

The Whites, Too, Are Fearful

I think it can be argued that segregation both feeds on and spawns mutual fear between black and white and that this fear interacts with clear economic pressures. If violence may be said to indicate fear in the aggressor, then it becomes clear why it is in the blackest counties and towns of the South that lynchings and beatings are the commonest. One Georgia sheriff revealed his fear of a black SNCC worker when he forgot to lock him up after a conference with lawyers outside the cell block. Another sheriff once caned a SNCC lawyer who came to his jail to see about a white SNCC worker whom the sheriff had ordered beaten by prisoners. The most rabid segregationist propaganda reveals a fear of sexual and cultural pollution.

But the unbelievable intimidation which official and private whites wreak on "uppity niggers" would be impossible to perpetuate without economic support and incentive. The white employers and businessmen rely on the local monopolies which protect them from retaliation. If they antagonize the black population by kicking a customer or firing a black worker, they still in most cases run the area's only grocery or furnish the only source of employment. Only a well-organized and timely boycott can restrain the white who is driven to such behavior. And only massive voter registration and organization can restrain local politicians and law officers from arbitrary intimidation.

Strategy then is complicated when it is unclear whether deep prejudice and fear or expediency are driving a specific aggressor. In any case "justice" in the Black Belt can be accurately symbolized by the token prosecution of the Birmingham bombers and the threat of execution levelled against me and three other civil rights workers in Americus, Georgia.

Will the Movement for racial equality turn to violent tactics, and if it did would this tactic achieve the end of integration? I think the answer to both questions is "no". Organized violence will not come because the individuals capable of violence in the black population are least ready for sustained discipline. Gang leaders frequently work with SNCC but our insistence on non-violence forces them to choose between discipline within the Movement and violence against each other. The end of one such leader's association with SNCC could be placed at the time when he was wounded in a battle with a rival black gang. If violence were adopted as a tactic, I think, the effect of it would be to confirm and strengthen white fears.

Where is the federal government in all of this? My contact with the most active local representatives of the federal government, agents of the FBI, has been less than enchanting. While perhaps one third of the local agents I have met have been fairly impartial Northerners, the others, natives of the South, have taken statements from me with poorly disguised skepticism and sometimes antagonism. I have also talked with sympathetic Justice Department investigators, but their province is generally strictly limited to the evidence related to intimidation of prospective voters.

Official statements from Washington are usually evasive concerning allegations of police brutality: "there is no evidence", "investigations are underway (after three months!)", or "we have no authority to deal with this issue". But SNCC has submitted hundreds of sworn affidavits specifying cases of police brutality, and the FBI is in possession of photographs showing bruises and welts which we suffered as a result of official violence.

A symptom of the attitude of the federal government toward civil rights is Kennedy's appointment of a judge to the southwest Georgia district court who has consistently rendered unfavorable decisions in cases involving racial issues. His views on race relations were well-known before his appointment.

Where, then, does the Movement stand in southwest Georgia, and where is it going? Voter registration is receiving the greatest emphasis in anticipation of the elections next November. Albany, Georgia, saw a Black run for Mayor in October this year. An inevitable problem is low turnout—in this case roughly 60% of the registered Negroes, 10% of whom apparently voted for one of the two white segregationist candidates. White reaction to the candidate was surprisingly favorable, and he received a few votes in all-white wards. Political pressure has a high potential in towns like Americus, where almost 50% of the population is black, yet only 10% of the eligible blacks are registered.

The history of Albany, I think, has shown that momentary crises are not effective in bringing a change unless they are backed by substantial and visible economic and political power. Where once over 700 people went to jail during demonstrations, now potentially active participation is limited to a few tireless workers.

The Movement is reaching far greater economic sophistication in selective patronage, in a producer's co-operative for farm owners and workers (aimed at combatting price discrimination and seasonal unemployment), and possibly combination with white workers in union activity. Meanwhile, the currents of fear and pain and courage continue to clash in the Black Belt.

SNCC's Devoted Handful, Determined to Change The World, Recalls Earlier Martyrs

Where Caesar's Lions Failed, Can the South's Cattle Prods Win?

There is nothing wrong with our younger generation when it can produce a movement like SNCC. Not since the great pre-revolutionary generation in Russia, its assorted Narodniks, SR's, Marxists and Tolstoyans, has any great power produced as devoted a group of youngsters as the four hundred or so Negro and white young men and women of the Students Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, which held its fourth annual conference here in Washington at Howard University the week-end of Nov. 29.

Non-Violence Their Deepest Faith

I have had the privilege over the past few years of getting to know a few of them. They are an impressive lot. Purity is the only word for their intrinsic quality—the absence of self-seeking or of vanity. They are the stuff of saints. They are determined to change our country, and for them the most fundamental change of all is to win by non-violent means, to answer hate with love. They stand in a line that runs back from Gandhi to Tolstoy to Thoreau to St. Francis to Jesus. I regard them with reverence.

To be with them was a moving experience. They draw sustenance, the whites as well as the blacks, from Negro roots. Most of them are not religious in any conventional sense, but the whole movement is steeped in Negro religiosity at its best. On one side of their nature, they are sophisticated intellectuals; on the other, they feel akin to the Negro racial past. "We have a mandate," said their chairman, John Lewis, "from our forefathers who were slaves." One moment they were talking of the need for a planned economy and the next they were singing, "Like Christ, they died for you and me." They are ragged and ill-fed but their eyes shine. Against just such a consecrated few, powers more formidable than the lily-white South have fallen in the past, Czars and Caesars.

Cattle prods will not help, any more than it once helped to feed them to the lions. The South has a right to be terrified. Robert P. Moses, the director of SNCC's voter registration drive, used an unforgettable metaphor when he spoke of SNCC's work as an "annealing process." This young ex-school teacher from New York, with his round, brown African face, told the conference, "Only when metal has been brought to white heat, can it be shaped and molded; this is the annealing process. This is what we intend to do to the South and the country, bring them to white heat and then remold them."

The vision which provides a pattern for that remolding is beyond race; it seeks the emancipation of Man from his own suicidal divisions. Bob Moses is a sober seer, and does not fool himself. "The problem of the Negro is not the same as that of the European immigrant," he told the conference. "He could be accepted gradually as part of a broader European community. Our country and the world have not yet grappled with the problem of creating a community broad enough to encompass the Negro and the African." When it comes, it will have to be big enough to hold all mankind.

The Mexican, the Puerto Rican, the white unemployed, were not forgotten at this conference. James Baldwin and Bayard Rustin, like Lewis and Moses, saw the Negro's problem in broad human terms; to emancipate himself, he must emancipate the rest of us, from unemployment, from prejudice and from war. Baldwin spoke with the fury of a Hebrew prophet; Rustin with the objectivity of a still youthful Negro elder statesman, who believes as a lifelong pacifist and Socialist that only in a broader movement can the Negro hope to win jobs and freedom, and make a revolution "in a serious sense."

SNCC originated in the Fall of 1960 out of the sit-in student movement which began in Raleigh, N. C., in the spring of that year. Never have so few managed to make a bigger impact in a smaller space of time. They cheered when Lewis in his closing speech said, "We'll march through the heart of the South as Sherman did." Though an unarmed few, they have already set a whole region trembling; the earth shakes again as always under the footsteps of faith.

The Lunacy in the South

Three speakers at the SNCC convention provided vivid glimpses of the lunatic atmosphere in the South. Norman Thomas said, "There was a time when I somewhat romantically thought Eisenhower or Kennedy should have taken children to school personally in the Southern school disputes, but after being in Mississippi I would be afraid to have them do so." Robert Moses said the reaction in Jackson, Miss., to the President's murder was one of "indifference or suppressed joy." Wm. Hansen of Howard University was in jail in Helena, Arkansas, when Kennedy was shot. "A trusty came in with a grin on his face," Hansen related, "and said, 'Hey, boys, the President's been shot.' A few minutes later he came back and shouted, 'Hey, he's dead.' The trusty and the cops were jumping up and down with glee."

Will This Dubious Affair Be Used For More Warlike Action Against Cuba?

We welcome the successful conclusion of Venezuela's election and we can see no sense in its terrorist opposition. But we regard with suspicion the charge by the State Department and the Betancourt regime that an arms cache found on Venezuela's shores was of Cuban origin.

The fullest account we have seen in the U.S. press of this arms cache appeared in the Baltimore Sun Nov. 30. This made clear (1) that the arms were of Belgian manufacture and (2) that they were linked to Cuba by rather obscure means. A State Department spokesman quoted by the Sun said "modern laboratory techniques" now made it "possible to raise serial numbers and seals, even though efforts have been made to erase them." Such evidence should be submitted to an international body more worthy of confidence than the OAS before a verdict is handed down.

Cuba today is a tightly blockaded isle. Our planes and our naval vessels watch all that goes in and comes out. The Castro government, which denies that it sent arms to the Venezuelan terrorists, would be foolish in the extreme to run this blockade with an arms shipment which would give its enemies just the chance they have been looking for. We hope more objective forces at the UN can be mobilized to prevent this charge from being used as an excuse for more warlike action against Cuba.

The Danger in Canonizing Kennedy As An Apostle of Peace

is that there are hundreds of thousands in the South who had murder in their hearts for the Kennedys, the President and his brother the Attorney General, because they sought in some degree to help the Negro. This potential for murder, which the Negro community has felt for a long time, has become a national problem. But there are deeper realities to be faced.

Wouldn't We Be Happy to Kill Castro?

Let us ask ourselves honest questions. How many Americans have not assumed—with approval—that the CIA was probably trying to find a way to assassinate Castro? How many would not applaud if the CIA succeeded? How many applauded when Lumumba was killed in the Congo, because they assumed that he was dangerously neutralist or perhaps pro-Communist? Have we not become conditioned to the notion that we should have a secret agency of government—the CIA—with secret funds, to wield the dagger beneath the cloak against leaders we dislike? Even some of our best young liberal intellectuals can see nothing wrong in this picture except that the "operational" functions of CIA should be kept separate from its intelligence evaluations! How many of us—on the Left now—did not welcome the assassination of Diem and his brother Nhu in South Vietnam? We all reach for the dagger, or the gun, in our thinking when it suits our political view to do so. We all believe the end justifies the means. We all favor murder, when it reaches our own hated opponents. In this sense we share the guilt with Oswald and Ruby and the rightist crackpots. Where the right to kill is so universally accepted, we should not be surprised if our young President was slain. It is not just the ease in obtaining guns, it is the ease in obtaining excuses, that fosters assassination. This is more urgently in need of examination than who pulled the trigger. In this sense, as in that multi-lateral nuclear monstrosity we are trying to sell Europe, we all had a finger on the trigger.

Murder In Our Way of Life

But if we are to dig out the evil, we must dig deeper yet, into the way we have grown to accept the idea of murder on the widest scale as the arbiter of controversy between nations. In this connection, it would be wise to take a clear-sighted view of the Kennedy administration because it was the first U.S. government in the nuclear age which acted on the belief that it was possible to use war, or the threat of war, as an instrument of politics despite the possibility of annihilation. It was in some ways a warlike administration. It seems to have been ready, soon after taking office, to send troops into Vietnam to crush the rebellion against Diem; fortunately both Diem and our nearest Asian allies, notably the Filipinos, were against our sending combat troops into the area. The Kennedy administration, in violation of our own laws and international law, permitted that invasion from our shores which ended so ingloriously in the Bay of Pigs. It was the Kennedy Administration which met Khrushchev's demands for negotiations on Berlin by a partial mobilization and an alarming invitation to the country to dig backyard shelters against cataclysm.

We Can Easily Bluff Once Too Often

Finally we come to the October crisis of a year ago. This set a bad precedent for his successors, who may not be as skillful as he was in finding a way out. What if the Russians had refused to back down and remove their missiles from Cuba? What if they had called our bluff and war had begun, and escalated? How would the historians of mankind, if a fragment survived, have regarded the events of October? Would they have thought us justified in blowing most of mankind to smithereens rather than negotiate, or appeal to the UN, or even to leave in Cuba the medium range missiles which were no different after all from those we had long aimed at the Russians from Turkey and England? When a whole people is in a state of mind where it is ready to risk extinction—its own and everybody else's—as a means of having its own way in an international dispute, the readiness for murder has become a way of life and a world menace. Since this is the kind of bluff that can easily be played once too often, and that his successors may feel urged to imitate, it would be well to think it over carefully before canonizing Kennedy as an apostle of peace.

VOL. XI, NO. 25 DECEMBER 23, 1963 WASHINGTON, D. C. 20 CENTS

A Crisis and A Turning Point Approaches in Vietnam

The war in Vietnam is being lost. Only a few weeks ago, Secretary McNamara and General Taylor reported on their return from Saigon that "the major part" of our military role there could be "completed by the end of 1965." Now Hanson W. Baldwin, our most respected military expert, writes (New York Times, Dec. 7) that "unless public support in the U.S. and among its allies can be maintained during years of frustration, there is no possibility of victory." The italics are ours. President Johnson at his first meeting with the press that same day announced that Secretary McNamara is going back to Vietnam on another tour of inspection. It begins to look as if the Secretary of Defense has become a commuter between Washington and Saigon.

A Shift in U. S. Policy

It is clear that we are heading for a new crisis in South Vietnam; rebel attacks are mounting in size and frequency; the loss of arms to them is growing. At the same time Cambodia has formally asked Britain and the Soviet Union as co-chairmen of the 1954 Geneva Conference on Indochina to reconvene it. In August of last year, when Cambodia asked the Geneva conferees to reassemble and guarantee its neutrality, President Kennedy shied away from the idea. But this time the attitude of the American government seems to have changed. When the Foreign Minister of Cambodia was here to attend the President's funeral, he spoke with Under Secretary of State Harriman and was assured that we would not place obstacles in the way of reconvening the conference for this purpose. The first Geneva conference met, it will be recalled, to end the Korean war, and then went on to end the first Indochinese war as well. The new session could become a vehicle for the peaceful ending of the war in South Vietnam too. We are approaching a turning point, either to risk widening the conflict by intervening with our own combat troops, or settling the war at the conference table.

Prince Sihanouk of Cambodia indicated these wider possibilities when he called for an independent South Vietnam linked in a neutral confederation with Cambodia. "The reunification of Vietnam is the end to be attained but it is for the moment premature if not impossible, as responsible leaders of North Vietnam have admitted to me," said Prince Sihanouk (Agence France-Presse, Le Monde, Dec. 4), adding that he thought "the Communist camp would content itself with a South Vietnam completely neutral, as is Cambodia." An article in the Peking Review (Nov. 22) confirms this view. China would like new trade ties with the West to replace the broken trade ties with the Soviet Union. Peace in South Vietnam would remove a major obstacle to such relations. In South Vietnam itself the National Liberation Front has made clear in a clandestine interview (Le Monde, Aug. 24) that it did not wish to "exchange one dictatorship for another. A democratic South Vietnam, an honorable and face-saving peace are possible.

How The CIA Makes Us Look Two-Faced

"Many are asking themselves whether America is the liberal "brain trust" which worked alongside President Kennedy or rather the services (still unpurged) of M. McCone, successor of M. Allen Dulles, the man of the Bay of Pigs of sinister memory. President Johnson would render his country an immense service if he ended this ambiguity, if he took steps to make America's government one in whose word foreigners could at last believe.

"Southeast Asia, in particular, is full of not very "quiet" Americans, sometimes camouflaged as diplomats, sometimes simple adventurers one can disavow, who vie with each other in stirring up trouble in countries of which they know little, mistaking for sincere friends mercenaries who make game of them, considering as enemies those who try to talk frankly with them —all persuaded that they are playing a great role and will make their personal idea of 'Americanism' triumph.

"The United States could do well without these imitation Macchiavellis who only exasperate Asian governments and peoples, perfectly aware of their intrigues big and little."

—From an editorial on the "two faces" of the American government in the Nov. 29 issue of Realités Cambodgiennes in Saigon, the first-rate weekly which is the unofficial organ of Cambordia's Prince Sihanouk.

Unfortunately the U.S. public has been conditioned to such oversimplified and fallacious views on Asian foreign policy as to make negotiation difficult. The Cambodian Foreign Minister had a friendly talk with the new President, but if Mr. Johnson were a combination of Macchiavelli and King Solomon he would still have trouble with this one. Three ideas widely held in this country are obstacles to a sensible settlement. One is that problems arising in the areas bordering China can be settled without taking its views into account. We had to negotiate with China to end the Korean war and we will have to sit down at Geneva with China again to end the Vietnamese war. The second is that neutralism is a menace second only to Communism, though the only one of the three Indochinese states which is stable today, free from guerrilla war and any internal Communist threat is neutralist Cambodia.

The third obstacle to peace is public acceptance of the CIA as a proper agency of government. The first thing to be said of the CIA is that in Southeast Asia, at least, it has proven itself politically incompetent. Its favorite Indochinese protegés, Diem in South Vietnam and Phoumi Nosavan in Laos,

The New Republic Publishes A "Blockbuster" of An Interview by Jean Daniel

Castro's Startling New Account of Why He Asked for Nuclear Missiles

There are three important points to be noted in the sensational "talks with Kennedy and Castro" by Jean Daniel in the Dec. 14 issue of The New Republic. The first, of course, is that it offers an entirely new version of the events which led up to last year's missile crisis over Cuba. According to Castro, six months before the missiles were emplaced Cuba was informed that a new invasion under CIA sponsorship was being planned. These reports were discussed with Khrushchev's son-in-law Adzhubei when he was in Havana on his way to Washington. Cuban alarm was increased when Adzhubei reported that President Kennedy informed him that the U.S. had decided it could no longer tolerate the existence of the Castro regime and reminded the Russians that the U.S. had not intervened when they invaded Hungary. The missiles, according to Castro, were emplaced to deter a new invasion.

Cuba's Demilitarization Offer

It is a pity the United Nations is not independent enough to investigate this thoroughly in Havana, Moscow and Washington. It throws new light on the formal Cuban offers to the UN in September, 1962, just before the crisis, to accept demilitarization if offered firm international guarantees against aggression. This fits Castro's account, for in effect it would have done peacefully what was soon done under threat of war—removal of the missiles in exchange for a qualified U.S. agreement not to invade.

The second point to be noted is Castro's remark, "for us Cubans it didn't really make so much difference whether we died by conventional bombing or a hydrogen bomb." Here is the key to that proliferation which will soon make this a most dangerous planet unless a new world order can be brought into being. Each country, however tiny, will be ready to risk the future of the planet if its own existence is at stake. Moscow felt that only nuclear arms could deter an American attack. Curiously this is what John Foster Dulles advocated in a Foreign Affairs article (Autumn. 1957) when he proposed to abandon massive retaliation for the distribution of nuclear weapons to all our allies on the Sino-Soviet periphery so "as to make military invasion with conventional weapons a hazardous attempt." This was Khrushchev's strategy.

The third point could be a key to peace with Cuba. M. Daniel asked Kennedy if we could tolerate "economic collectivism." The President replied by citing our good relations with Tito and Sekou Touré. When M. Daniel reported this to Castro the latter replied, "Why am I not Tito or Sekou Touré? Because the Russians have never done us any injury such as the Yugoslavians and the Guineans have complained of in the past, and the Americans have never given us any of the benefits for which these two nations congratulate themselves today."

M. Daniel was invited by Kennedy to come back and talk with him after seeing Castro. The distinguished French journalist, an editor of L'Express, felt that he could thus play the role of an unofficial emissary. Castro's answer was not that of a puppet but of a man with no alternatives. It is a tragedy that the President's death cut short what might have been a fruitful dialogue. The fact is that Cuba is in the Soviet camp because it has no alternative. It is the only country to emerge from the anti-colonial struggle which has joined the Soviet camp; all the others have been left free by U.S. policy to deal with both East and West. Adzhubei himself in talking informally with reporters at the Soviet Embassy during that visit asked, "You get along with Guinea, why not Cuba?" From all indications the Russians would be relieved if a wiser U.S. policy enabled Cuba to move into a neutralist position. Until then there will always be the danger of a new world crisis over Cuba.

The Right to Travel

The Internal Security Act of 1950 was the first law in U.S. history to make a man's politics the test of his right to travel. It is good news that the Supreme Court has agreed to hear a clear test of these provisions in appeals brought by Elizabeth Gurley Flynn and Dr. Herbert Aptheker, leading functionaries of the Communist Party. This will probably also decide a related test, that of Milton S. Mayer, who was refused a passport because he declined on principal to state whether or not he was a Communist.

Another type of the new travel restrictions which have grown up since the second World War must wait on disposal of six pending Cuban travel cases. They will test the State Department's right to put little Iron Curtains around countries of which it does not approve, like China and Cuba. The latest of these cases arise from indictment of four of the 59 students who went to Cuba last summer. It is a pleasure to record one minor victory. A Federal judge in New York has rejected an attempt by the U.S. Attorney's office to restrict the four to New York City and its environs so they could not accept invitations from colleges around the country to speak about their trip and their prosecution!

Smathers Who Hates Castro Also Hates Decent Wages for Florida Farm Workers

Senator Smathers of Florida, a leading advocate of action to "liberate" China, is also carrying on a crusade to liberate Florida fruit growers from the need to pay halfway decent wages to the migrants and the miserable foreign workers who pick their crops. In both campaigns he seems to have had too much White House influence.

Just three days before President Kennedy's assassination, a Catholic priest who heads the National Catholic Rural Life Conference protested this influence. Last July the Labor Department set a minimum wage for these workers in Florida of 95 cents an hour. Though this was 20 cents less than the Department of Agriculture (notably sympathetic to growers) had set for unskilled labor in the Florida sugar cane harvest, the growers protested to Senator Smathers. According to this priest, Father James Vizzard, Smathers was turned down by Labor Secretary Wirtz and by Attorney General Kennedy, but persuaded President Kennedy to suspend the rate and order rehearings.

"I am not so unsophisticated as to be shocked when political deals do occur," Father Vizzard testified at the rehearing in Washington. "But I hope I never become so cynical as not to be outraged by a deal like this which sells down the river the poorest of America's poor. It is, to say the very least, demeaning to the office of the President that he should pay a political debt or buy a vote or do a favor with pennies snatched from the hands of the poor."

From Dr. Gunnar Myrdal's Testimony Dec. 3 Before the Clark Subcommittee on Manpower

Famous Swedish Expert Sees Automation As Blessing If Economy Is Planned

Since May 20 a Senate subcommittee under Senator Clark (D. Pa.) has been holding hearings which may have historic impact. They deal with the problem of retraining and fully utilizing the nation's manpower in the light of the twin crises created by automation and the Negro uprising. Here we give some excerpts from the plea made before the committee Dec. 3 by the famous Swedish economist Dr. Gunnar Myrdal for more economic planning by government to end America's "relative stagnation."

Dr. MYRDAL: I am not using this word "automation" so much, because after all, it is a very old story. It is technological progress. We have just as much automation going on in Sweden. Our agricultural population is shrinking just as rapidly. Our trade unions, differently from yours, are all for automation. But the explanation is very simple, and that is full employment. If demand is kept up, if the economy is expanding, then automation is good for everybody. It is the basis of higher wages for workers, and it is the basis for more production.

Expansion of Demand Needed

The basic problem, more basic than automation, is the fact that there is not enough expansion of demand in this country. There are many people who are not living an affluent life in America, and you have the export markets and everything which is needed in underdeveloped countries. And in addition we in the rich countries should gradually see a change where more and more of the labor force is utilized for services, teaching, nursing, caring for old people, caring for culture, scholarship.

But that is a process which does not go automatically, and particularly if you start out, in America, with a rather high unemployment, I think there is a transitional problem. With this great tremendous stream of young people which you are getting into the labor market now, you must be very careful to give more education, and more vocational education also, to these youngsters so they may fit into the greater America of the future.

You have a very excellent educational system for the great majority of Americans who live in an affluent society, but a rather bad situation for those who live in the slums, the rural slums and the city slums. And in addition to that, since you cannot very rapidly make a nurse out of a half-illiterate Negro, you have transitional employment, i.e. to employ them in reconstruction, where there is a rather simple problem of reeducation. And it is almost a (good) fortune that you have such tremendous amounts to be done in reconstructing your cities and modernizing your transport system.

Q.E.D.

"I am sometimes very surprised when I meet industrialists in this country. I find them tremendously knowledgeable in their particular field, and I find them full of superstitions and idiotic ideas as soon as they start to talk about the country."

—From Dr. Myrdal's plea for more government planning before the Clark subcommittee, Dec. 3.

"Mr. Rubel [head of the Union Oil Company] said profits 'should rank right alongside such hallowed concepts as home and mother and the American flag'."

—From the New York Times account Dec. 5 of the Nat'l Assn of Manufacturers annual meeting.

I am very much against all those radicals who say that you can solve the problem just by giving the unemployed full wages, or nearly full wages, because there is nothing which can cure unemployment except employment.

I am an old Puritan in many ways and I believe that I am speaking for ordinary Americans. It is the dignity of life to be employed somewhere, and to do something for society. Well, what you have to do is of course to have very much greater expenditures for real city renewal, not the city renewal you have had up to now, which has been building houses not for poor people, but rather middle class people, and driving the poor into new slums.

There is a lot of construction work which needs to be done, and the speeding up of educating what I call the under class, where they are dropping out of school. I realize that this is a tremendous thing, because it will cost very much more money of the budget. I believe that this is bound to make the country richer, because here you have a vast amount of unutilized resources in your unemployed and your underemployed. It would make the country richer, and of course also prepare it to carry a very much bigger burden for the public expenditures. Here you cannot rely upon industry, private industry.—Before the Clark committee, Dec. 3.

Dr. Gunnar Myrdal Opposes Priority Treatment or Job Quotas for Negroes

"I believe that everything should be done to put the Negroes on the basis of equality, so far as the law is concerned. And I am optimistic enough to believe that (all this can be done) within a period of ten years. However, you will still have many of the problems left. There will continue to be discrimination against Negroes in a society where you do not have full employment, a very important pre-condition for giving reality to legal equality.

"In addition to that, sir, there is also the fact that because of the history of the Negro, he is less efficient in many ways. Perhaps half of the grown-up Negroes are for all practical purposes illiterate.

"I am, however, not for preferential treatment of Negroes, and I will try to explain why. First, because I do not think it is politically wise. Nobody sitting in this room feels responsible for having brought Negroes as slaves to America. That argument that we have a guilt does not work politically. I mean we are responsible for the society as it is now, and not for the whole history.

"But quite aside from that, I think it is wrong, because Negroes are, it is true, perhaps the largest portion of what I would call the under-class in America, but they are by far not alone. You have poor whites all over the place. You have the Puerto Ricans, you have the Mexicans, you have the workers in agriculture in many places. It will be absolutely wrong to give priority to one group, even if it is the biggest group. What you have to do is to make life decent and productive for all these poor people in the under-class. I think it is very unfair and against American principles to discriminate in favor of any group because of color. It is almost as bad as doing the opposite."

—Dr. Myrdal before the Clark committee, Dec. 3.

How Long Are We Going to Support An Assassination Agency?

have been utterly discredited; the latter only opened the door to Communism, the former had to be "removed" when his failure and instability became too notorious. The one Indochinese ruler the CIA has always regarded with disfavor is the only one who has succeeded. Cambodia under Sihanouk's leadership, Majority Leader Mansfield told the Senate the other day (Nov. 20), "has developed within its borders a remarkable degree of progress and political cohesion and stability and a level of human freedom and political participation in the life of the nation which exceeds most if not all of the other nations of southeast Asia." Yet as the Washington Post said in a recent editorial (Nov. 14), the CIA "has for a long time tended to consider the non-aligned Sihanouk as a pernicious fellow."

Does The Right Hand Know?

The second thing to be said of the CIA is that the very existence of a secret agency which boasts of "cloak and dagger" activities in countries with which we are at peace creates suspicions which poison our foreign relations. Both President Johnson and Secretary Harriman denied to the Cambodian Foreign Minister that the CIA had been engaged in plots against its government. But no one can be sure that the right hand of our government really knows what this left hand is doing.

Cambodia's first charges of a CIA plot were made in 1959 when it expelled Victor Matsui, an official of the U.S. Embassy for activities incompatible with diplomacy; Cambodia claimed that rebel groups had been given radio transmitters with which they kept in touch with the U.S. Embassy. The next incident was the capture of an anti-Sihanouk emissary with 270 kilograms of pure gold for the rebels; he confessed that he had been in contact with CIA agents not only in Cambodia but in Washington. Later an elaborate "gift" was presented at the Royal Palace and turned out to be an ingenious bomb intended to kill the King and Queen; three members of the Court lost their lives when it exploded. It had come by ship from Vietnam and its intricacy led the Cambodians to suspect skilled CIA hands at work. Then they learned that the secret rebel radio was operating from a house in Saigon under the very nose of U.S. and Vietnamese authorities, and felt this could not happen without their connivance. Another assassination attempt came last spring, when the President of Communist China visited Cambodia. Conspirators were caught in an attempt to mine the road over which he would pass with Prince Sihanouk on his way from the airport. The latest incident was the confession of a rebel infiltrator from South Vietnam that anti-Sihanouk forces worked out of strategic hamlets near the Cambodian border in close liaison with both Vietnamese and U.S. military authorities. These are the incidents which led Prince Sihanouk to break off American aid, fearing that aid agencies were a means by which hostile American agents penetrated his country.

Again I ask—in the wake of our own President's assassination—how long are we going to maintain what other nation's consider an assassination agency of our own?

Slowly Catching Up

"Under Ngo Din Diem, the hamlet program aroused deep popular resentment . . . tens of thousands of peasants were forced to leave their homes and build new surrounded by barbed-wire barricades. Communist propaganda focussed effectively on the most objectionable aspects of the program calling the hamlets concentration camps.' . . . This charge, according to U.S. officials, was all too accurate in many instances."

—New York Times from Saigon Dec. 3.

As long ago as The Weekly of April 17, 1961, in calling attention to some dangerously rose-colored views of Diem's regime, we compared the picture drawn of these hamlets by Leo Cherne in the New York Times Sunday Magazine, April 9, 1961, with that drawn by Robert Guillian, the Far Eastern expert of Le Monde (Paris) three days earlier. Cherne called them Diem's "most imaginative project . . . the most dramatic and fruitful pioneering rural ventures since the Israeli cooperative farm, the kibbutz." M. Guillian said this rural experiment "conducted in haste and in often brutal fashion, has been almost everywhere a political and economic failure." We're glad to see the Times catch up.

While We Talk of Ending The Cold War

It is difficult to see what if anything is happening in regard to the problem of peace. Perhaps a good point to begin is with a story in The Times of London which indicates that not much of anything really is happening. The Times reported from Paris (Dec. 17) that at the opening of the NATO Council meeting Paul Spaak of Belgium had made so angry a speech attacking the "immobilism" of the Western alliance that his remarks were "suppressed by the NATO secretariat." Apparently M. Spaak's speech had to be obtained from other sources. The Times said "one diplomatist" had informed it M. Spaak "advocated that the West should get in a few ideas of its own without waiting for Russia to take the initiative." President Johnson's glorified barbecue with Chancellor Erhard deep in the heart of Texas does not seem to have changed this situation. "No new initiatives are immediately planned," Caroll Kilpatrick reported from Austin in the Washington Post Dec. 30. "The Chancellor stressed, and the President agreed, that any new agreement depends upon a change of attitude in the Kremlin."

Rusk Took A Hard Line in Paris

What this means, in effect, is that any substantial step toward relaxation of tension depends on a Russian willingness to surrender on Germany. This becomes clearer if one looks at the NATO speeches as reported in Le Monde of Paris (Dec. 17-18-19) which gave by far the fullest coverage. It appears from these that the dividing line in NATO is between those who would subordinate all else to the German problem and those who would postpone German unification while solving less difficult questions. According to Le Monde, M. Halvard Lange of Norway, in supporting M. Spaak, said NATO ought to "avoid a static attitude." If there was no chance at the moment to solve the German problem, "one could by stages," he proposed, "improve East-West relations by accords on 'peripheral' problems." This point of view was shared by the British, the Canadians and the Danes but opposed by the Germans, French, Dutch and Turks with the support of the Secretary of State. "His language," André Fontaine said of Mr. Rusk (Le Monde, Dec. 18) "hardly differed from that of M. Couve de Murville."

The only difference which appeared at the NATO Council between Mr. Rusk's position and that of the German Foreign Minister, Herr Schroeder, was that the Secretary of State expressed the view (somewhat to the dismay, it later appeared, of the State Department) that it was in the West's interest that Khrushchev's policy of co-existence should prevail over Mao Tse-tung's more belligerent stance. The German Foreign Minister, on the other hand, seemed to have reverted to the paranoid politics of the Dulles era; he thought Mao less dangerous and regarded peaceful co-existence as "an instrument that Moscow uses to divide the alliance" (Le Monde, Dec. 17). Herr Schroeder claimed to be an advocate of "movement" but not apparently in any peaceful direction. He opposed long term credits to Moscow (as did Mr. Rusk) lest this "permit it to resume its politics of intimidation and tension" and he pictured the Soviet campaign for an agreement against the proliferation of nuclear weapons as a sinister effort to prevent the establishment of a multilateral NATO nuclear force. These positions make it easier to understand the headlines from Texas two weeks later, "Thaw in Cold War Doubtful, Erhard Cautions Johnson" (Washington Star, Dec. 29). It certainly is, if the Germans have their way.

Air Force Intelligence at Work

It isn't often that we can get a glimpse of the thinking which goes on in Air Force Intelligence. A rare insight of this kind was unwittingly provided by the Washington Post (Dec. 20) in assigning a new book on national security to review by a Robert A. Kilmarx (what a lovely name for a Pentagon official!) who is special adviser to the assistant chief of staff of Air Force Intelligence.

Mr. Kilmarx wrote that the book came "at a most fortunate time" because the signing of the nuclear test ban treaty had created the danger of a "euphoria about national security" which could be "compounded by apathy toward cold war conflict" especially if the Soviets "continue to avoid precipitating major crises." This is the first mention we have seen of what might be called a crisis gap. Perhaps the CIA can fill it by fabricating some crises of its own.

We were especially fascinated by Mr. Kilmarx's fear that President Kennedy's assassination "may have reinforced this danger, since the forces of intolerance, hatred and extremism which many people apparently believe contributed to his death may be viewed as the product of cold war instability, ideological conflict and economic frustration." In other words the killing may have led the American people to wonder about the effects upon them of that system of perpetual fear and hatred we call the cold war. This Air Force expert seems to think such moments of sober reflection, though rare, are a menace to national security.

It would be a mistake, however, to blame all this on the Germans. Though President Johnson has twice spoken of his desire to end the cold war, first at his December 13 diplomatic reception and again in his Dec. 17 address to the UN, the country, the press, and the government are all geared the other way. This was reflected in the difference between the New York Times and the London Times in their treatment, on the eve of the NATO Council meeting, of Khrushchev's closing speech to the Central Committee in Moscow Dec. 13.

Hilsman's Naive Self-Righteousness Contrasted With De Gaulle's Astute Politics

Still A Long Way to Go Before We Get Back to Reality in the Far East

Three points strike one about the Roger Hilsman speech in San Francisco "opening the door" to improved relations with Communist China. One is its naive self-righteousness. "These," Mr. Hilsman said of Peking's rulers, "are the 'Marxist Puritans:' they see all the world as a conflict between unblemished good and unredeemable evil . . . there are few people on earth as sublimely confident as are the Chinese Communist leaders that they are always right and good." One of the few people this description fits is ourselves, particularly the State Department crowd—their customary view of the world is just such a simple-minded black-and-white. "We are confronted," the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs said, "with a regime which . . . has used hatred as an engine of national policy. The U.S. is the central figure in their demonology." How aptly this applies to our China policy.

Why China Wants The Bomb, Too

The second point is that the State Department does not seem to realize that its emphasis on the differing Russian and Chinese attitudes toward "the realities of the nuclear age" is susceptible of very different interpretation in Peking. Our relations with Russia are better than those with China not just because Moscow is more aware than Peking of the nuclear peril but because Moscow has the H-bomb, too, and its possession forces us to be more sober in our dealings with the Russians. The Chinese may well feel that the "realities of the nuclear age" dictate a tremendous effort to obtain its weapons, too, so that they can, like the Russians, exact a mutual fear and respect in their relations with Washington. From this viewpoint our rude and swift rejection of every offer they have made for a "nuclear free Pacific" may yet prove a serious error on our part since that proposal implied Peking's readiness to give up any attempt to obtain nuclear weapons.

The third point is the width of the gulf which separates the two capitals. In the U.S. political frame of reference, this speech marks an advance toward realism in the Far East, but that is also an indicator of how far from reality we have drifted. In the Chinese frame of reference, this patronizing lecture, with its childish conspiratorial notion of somehow dividing the younger Communist leadership from the elder and its praise of Chiang's regime in Formosa, must make us look as if we are still living in a dream world. De Gaulle's politics by comparison are subtly aware of realities and their possibilities. This is that China is prepared, in return for better relations with France and the West, to see South-East Asia stabilized and neutralized even though in a way which would restore French cultural and economic hegemony in the regime. This is the deal shaping up between Peking and Paris, and it makes sense. We by contrast still oppose a conference on Cambodia lest it open the door also to peace in South Vietnam. In this respect, from China's standpoint, we remain a dangerous Canute in Far Eastern waters.

Unfit to Print?

There were two omissions by the New York Times (Dec. 11) when it reprinted from the New Republic Jean Daniel's account of his interviews with Kennedy and Castro. M. Daniel wrote that he asked the President "Could the U.S. tolerate economic collectivism" and Kennedy replied: "What about Sekou Toure? And Tito? I received Marshal Tito three days ago and our discussions were most positive." This was omitted by the Times. It also omitted Castro's comment, "Why am I not Sekou Toure? Because the Russians have never done us any injury such as the Yugoslavians and the Guineans have complained of in the past, and because the Americans have never given us any of the benefits for which these two nations congratulate themselves today." This indicates that Castro might assume a neutralist position, too, if he met with friendliness. Why did the editors of the New York Times consider this unfit to print?

One Lone Senate Voice and Indian Protest Against U. S. Navy's Latest Expansion

"I invite attention to the latest maneuver in the Pentagon in connection with foreign aid. This is the expansion of both the military aid program and the presence of American military forces—at one and the same time—into southern Asia.

"Over the years, one of the largest of all U.S. military aid programs has seen billions go to Pakistan on the theory that she was a partner with us against Communist aggression. That theory has already proved fallacious. But the only response the Pentagon is able to come up with in such matters is to throw good money after bad.

"So it is programming a military aid program for India that is on about the same scale as that for Pakistan. I am satisfied that if any use of our aid to these countries ever occurs, it will be against each other and not against any Communist power.

"But the Pentagon is [also] preparing to send American naval forces into the Indian Ocean on a permanent basis for the first time. Expansion of the fleet into the Indian Ocean is described in one press report as achieving what it calls a long-standing ambition of the Navy.

"I do not doubt that the U.S. Navy is anxious to replace the British Navy in international waters. But I remind the Pentagon that the only reason the British Navy is no longer dominant on the seven seas is that the British taxpayer went broke trying to support a worldwide network of naval forces, colonies, enclaves, lifelines, army and navy forces, and puppet governments.

"At the rate the Pentagon is going, we Americans have the same fate in store."

—Morse (D. Ore.) in the Senate Dec. 16 (abridged).

"By what right except that of sheer military power does the U.S. propose to police the Indian Ocean?"

—Times of India quoted in London Times Dec. 17.

Only Repeal Can End The Multiple Threat of This Thought Control Ruling

Menace of the Internal Security Act Not Ended by Registration Ruling

We predicted many months ago that the Supreme Court would eventually throw out the registration provisions of the Internal Security Act as unenforceable under the Fifth Amendment, since anyone signing a registration statement would incriminate himself. Such a final decision is brought closer by the unanimous opinion with which Judges Bazelon, Washington and McGowan on the Court of Appeals ruled against the government's move to punish the Communist Party for failure to register with the Subversive Activities Control Board under the Act. But this decision, even when upheld by the Supreme Court, as we believe it will be, will not finish off this sinister piece of thought control legislation which Congress passed 13 years ago over Harry Truman's veto, itself a message in the best Jeffersonian tradition.

Many Issues Still Pending

The Court will still have to decide (in the Gus Hall and Ben Davis cases) whether known officials of the Party can use the 5th amendment to evade orders to register the Party, and whether (in the Albertson and Proctor cases) known members of the Party can use the 5th amendment to defy orders to register personally as member of the Party, or face the fantastic penalties of 5 years in jail, a $10,000 fine for every single day in which they fail to register. Still to be decided (in the Flynn and Aptheker cases) is whether passports can be denied to members of organizations ordered to register, and whether organizations ordered to register can be forced to label their publications as subversive.

The Court will have to decide (as in the Robles case in Seattle) whether a member of an organization ordered to register can be punished as a criminal for working in a defense plant. It will also have to decide (in the Mine, Mill case) whether a trade union can be adjudged "Communist infiltrated" because elected officers, whether or not Communist party members, acted to support Communist causes, even though these causes were in themselves lawful.

Most important of all there will be appeals from two of the Communist "front" cases handed down by the Court of Appeals the same day. The order against the Veterans of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade was based on evidence so stale and dubious (see the Bazelon dissent at the top of col. 2) that the Court itself invited a petition for reconsideration, an almost unprecedented gesture. The other order, against the American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born, raises the question (see the Bazelon dissent below) of whether people can be punished as "fronters" for carrying on activities in themselves entirely lawful. We believe that the Supreme Court will uphold Judge Bazelon's view that this cannot be done under the First Amendment.

But even if all these cases are won, the Subversive Activities Control Board could still live on as an administrative agency empowered to put radical organizations and publications out of business by branding them with a scarlet letter. Only the repeal of the Act can end its multiple threat to free political discussion.

Once A Communist, Alawys A Communist?

"The hearings were held in 1954 and much of the evidence dates back to the late 1930s and early 1940s. As the court points out, our relations with the Soviet Union have shifted radically in the meantime. The Republican cause in the Spanish Civil War engaged the loyalties of sincere democrats as well as Communists.

"The evidence about Harold Smith goes back to 1946, when Earl Browder was expelled from the Party and Smith, his bodyguard, remained loyal to him. Continued loyalty to a man who was expelled in 1946 does not support an inference that Smith was a party functionary in 1952.

"The record was stale when the Board made its findings. In the 8 years since then there have been turbulent changes in world affairs . . . the views of many who were sympathetic to the Communist cause have undergone profound change, particularly after the brutal suppression of the Hungarian revolt in 1956."

—Judge Bazelon dissenting in the Court of Appeals from the order requiring the Veterans of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade to register as a Communist front.

The Majority's Tortured Reasoning and Bazelon's Dissent in the Foreign Born Case

"The Committee for the Protection of the Foreign Born undoubtedly devoted the major portion of its efforts to contesting the deportation of aliens. . . . But the protection of the rights of the foreign-born is not only a laudable objective; it is a basic one in this country. . . . What, then, of an organization which vigorously devotes itself to the protection of the rights of all and any foreign born who seek its help? Is it to be held a Communist front because the ends sought are Communist aims? Of course not. But . . . the Congress . . . found as a fact that these [Communist] action organizations operate to a substantial extent through 'fronts,' which in most instances are used, created or used in such manner as to conceal their true character and purposes, and that a result of this method is to obtain support from persons who would not extend such support if they knew the true purposes."

—Judge Prettyman with Danaher in a 2-to-1 Court of Appeals opinion upholding the Subversive Activities Control Board order to register the American Committee for Protection of the Foreign Born as a Communist front under the Internal Security Act.

"Congress chose not to outlaw the Communist Party or prohibit all its activities. Besides the objectives of overthrowing the government and establishing a dictatorship, the Party has innocent objectives and activities . . . e.g., promoting school integration . . . contesting the deportation of aliens. . . . Most of the severe penalties of the Act apply not only to members of Communist-action organizations but to members of Communist fronts also. These sections . . . make it unlawful for members of either sort of organization to hold any non-elective office or employment under the United States, or to be employed by any labor organization, or to use a passport, or even to apply for a passport . . . their severity shows that Congress had no intention of inflicting them on otherwise innocent people merely because of membership in otherwise innocent organizations that the Communist Party uses to advance an innocent aim. . . .

"Activities protected by the First Amendment cannot be restrained because of association with an organization some of whose activities are not so protected."

—Judge Bazelon dissenting.

K's Troop Cut Offer Buried or Belittled in U.S. Press

From the standpoint of arms reduction the most important point in the Khrushchev speech was his reaction to Secretary McNamara's speech of Nov. 18 to the Economic Club of New York. In that speech the Defense Secretary disclosed that the supposed gap between the conventional forces of East and West was as fictional as the earlier bomber and missile gaps, that NATO now had bigger ground forces than the Warsaw Pact and more men on the ground in Central Europe than does the bloc. Khrushchev in reply pointed out that the West had hitherto rejected proposals for reductions in conventional forces on the ground that the Soviets had so many more men under arms. Since McNamara now believed that the West had a clear superiority, "why don't you proceed now," Khrushchev asked, "toward an agreement on the reduction of armed forces and armaments?" This was coupled with an announcement of some reduction in the Soviet military budget for 1964.

Johnson Encouraged Arms Agency

The Times in London (Dec. 16) headlined this, "Mr. K's Hint Opens New Prospects" and accompanied it with an optimistic story from its Washington correspondent. The latter reported the announcement was greeted hopefully in Washington where it was felt that "a reduction or levelling off of defense expenditures could be the beginning of a new chapter of negotiations." The Khrushchev speech had coincided with a White House meeting to discuss the new Geneva talks and Disarmament Agency officials, according to the London Times man, had emerged from these talks encouraged by Johnson's "strong support. He (Johnson) said . . . he would prefer to solve the peace question more than any other." But State Dept. officials seem to talk differently for home consumption. The Khrushchev speech had hardly come off the ticker before U.S. correspondents were summoned in for a private briefing designed to bury or belittle it. The New York Times like the rest of our press accompanied the story from Moscow with disparaging comment from Washington.

There is more involved here than a press and a bureaucracy brainwashed by years of cold war. Secretary McNamara's speech was not intended to ease the way for arms reduction talks but to get rid of "misleading or obsolete notions" which (as he said) "produce an attitude of hopelessness toward any attempt to prepare to meet Communist forces in ground combat." The purpose in other words was to encourage NATO to build up its conventional forces. The very day the President was talking to the UN in such inspiring terms of the need to end the cold war and divert arms spending to a global attack on poverty, the Secretary of Defense was urging NATO members to spend more on arms, both on bigger conventional forces and on the multilateral nuclear NATO force. We continue to press for this even while assuring the world, as Johnson did the UN that we want "to prevent the dissemination of nuclear weapons to nations not now possessing them." Rarely have words and deeds been so beautifully mismatched. Dec. 30

Truman Warns Against The CIA

Too little attention has been paid the syndicated article (Washington Post, Dec. 22) in which former President Truman, who set up the Central Intelligence Agency, declared the time has come to "take another look" at its operations. Mr. Truman wrote that he never intended its use in "peacetime cloak and dagger operations" and that he now feels "there is something about the way the CIA has been functioning that is casting a shadow" over our institutions. We hope that Senators like Mansfield, who have long advocated the setting up of a joint committee to exercise some check on CIA, will arrange for hearings on several such pending bills and ask Mr. Truman to testify. Present supervision is negligible. When Lindsay of New York delivered a comprehensive speech on this in the House last August 16, Norblad of Oregon interrupted to say that the Armed Services subcommittee which is supposed to keep an eye on the CIA and of which he was a member "met annually one time a year for a period of two hours in which we accomplished virtually nothing." The U.S. today has the sinister distinction of being the only government in the world with a cloak-and-dagger agency which overthrows and sometimes has a hand in killing the rulers of countries with which we are at peace. One of these days, unless stopped, they may try to do at home what they have been accustomed to doing abroad.

Why Moscow's Peace Proposal Was Labelled "Disappointing"

In a message to Premier Khrushchev on New Year's Day, President Johnson called on the Soviet leader to make 1964 a year in which we take further steps "toward peace." Next day the Soviet Premier sent a note to all world capitals urging renunciation of force in the settlement of territorial disputes. This has brought the standard cold war reaction from the State Department, which describes the note as "disappointing." As usual American public opinion is being formed, not by a study of the document itself, but by the headlines generated in hasty briefings at the State Department. "U.S. Finds Little New in K's Note," said a typical headline in the Washington Post Jan. 4, "Officials Suspect 'Booby-Traps' in Moscow Proposal." This was followed Jan. 6 with an unusually inane "backgrounder" in which its diplomatic correspondent, after smoking hashish in the public relations dens of the Department, emerged with the self-congratulatory view that the Department has shrewdly changed its style, that it was now saying "no, but" instead of "no" in a devilishly clever maneuver "to avoid being cast in a negative anti-peace position." The State Department, the Washington Post reports, is determined "never to let the Soviet Union corner the issue of peace." The anxiety is not about peace, but the fear of losing a propaganda battle.

Why Is Bonn So Nervous?

The Soviet note was "disappointing" because Moscow got in ahead of Washington with the first concrete proposal of the New Year. It was "non-objective" because it did not look at the world the State Department's way. A better test of its objectivity may be obtained by freeing our minds from the barrage of propaganda let loose by State Department briefings and taking a fresh look for ourselves. The Soviet note is ably written and moderately phrased and it puts its finger on a major problem, that of territorial disputes. The first observation to be made is that the Soviet proposal is no different in principle from the proposal we have ourselves made the prime condition of negotiation with Communist China, that it renounce the use of force to recover Formosa. Renunciation of force, we have been telling Peking for several years, does not mean renunciation of claims, but only their peaceful negotiation. We like this in the Far East where our nuclear armed 7th fleet commands the Formosa straits. But we and our principal allies the Germans don't like it in Europe where the latter still hope that a nuclear armed Germany by threat of force will yet be able to recover the Eastern territories lost to Russia and Poland in the last war. Indeed the immediate reaction from Bonn was that the Soviet note was intended to block its declared ambition to recover the boundaries of 1937. But if, as the Germans have said, they intend only to do this peacefully by negotiation, why do they respond so nervously to a proposal that force be renounced?

De Gaulle as Peace Maker

Both big powers talk peace, but if you look closely you will see that France really practices it. An independent world peace policy as well as an independent nuclear deterrent is being created by de Gaulle. We note some significant year-end items.

For all practical purposes Moscow and Washington are united in a policy of isolating China. But an interview with Prime Minister Chou En-lai was telecast over the government owned TV station in France (text in Le Monde, Jan. 1) as part of a growing entente between Paris and Peking. This could lead to China's admission to the UN, since the French African states under de Gaulle's influence have enough votes to swing the balance in China's favor. Chou En-lai used the interview to deny that China was against peaceful coexistence and to state his complaints against the U.S.

A second item concerns Cuba. Last Dec. 4, Senator Keating protested offers of French economic aid to Castro; now Havana radio (New York Times, Jan. 4, Late City ed.) reports de Gaulle singled out the Cuban Ambassador at a New York reception in Paris for a talk in which he expressed sympathy for Cuba.

A third and well known item concerns the Far East, where both big powers are at a loss; there French diplomacy maintains Western influence in Cambodia and alone offers the hope of a healing peace in Vietnam.

The fourth item, which passed unnoticed in the press but not in governmental circles, was subtle and startling. In his New Year broadcast, in expressing the hope for a truly united Europe, which might include the Soviet States as their internal regimes liberalized, General de Gaulle mentioned among the Communist capitals the two black sheep, Moscow's outcast Tirana (capital of Albania) and the West's outcast Pankow (capital of East Germany). This unexpected and unusual courtesy to Ulbricht, coming from de Gaulle, the alley of West Germany, seemed almost a form of recognition. Since de Gaulle is also the only Western leader publicly to accept the Oder-Neisse line as final, this friendly reference to Pankow indicates that maverick initiatives on the German question by France are also possible. Perhaps de Gaulle can rescue this one, too, from the cold war's deep freeze.

Of course the Communist like the capitalist world is inconsistent. Each side likes renunciation of force where it suits its purpose, as each side likes free elections where it can win. They're for free elections in Vietnam and we're for free elections in Germany, just as we're for renunciation of force over Formosa but not over Germany. They would make Formosa an exception to their general formula, as historically a part

Sen. McCarthy in Satevepost Discloses That Assassins Are on the CIA's Payroll

A Congressional Watchdog Committee Will Not End Cloak-and-Dagger Evils

The unintended are as important as the intended revelation in Senator Eugene McCarthy's "The CIA Is Getting Out of Hand" in the Saturday Evening Post (Jan. 4-11). He hints (see adjoining box) that the missile threat from Cuba was exaggerated. He puts the Bay of Pigs in perspective as an invasion by a secret agency of Congressional power to organize armies and to make war. He pictures the U-2 affair not as a blunder but as an incident by which the CIA, in upsetting the summit conference, made foreign policy. He protests the sinister process by which a supposed information gathering agency has been "taking over the roles of the State Department, Defense Department and Congress as well as carrying the nation to the edge of war." Most important of all, in discussing the growth of the CIA to the point where it employs 14,000 men and is one of the most powerful agencies in Washington, he reveals that hired killers are among its agents. It has on its payroll, he writes, "specialists in intelligence analysis and espionage, U-2 pilots and assassins" (our italics).

Any Means to Reach Our Ends?

But neither Senator McCarthy, nor the Saturday Evening Post in an editorial that same week on the President's assassination, seems to see that the employment of assassins by our own government is morally monstrous. Even that tragedy has not been enough to free them from the evil notion fostered by the cold war that our ends are so righteous that somehow any means to achieve them are justified. The Senator makes the conventional plea that the Cold War requires tactics the authors of the Constitution could hardly have imagined. It is time this stereotype were challenged. Assassination as a political weapon is as old as history; the enemy of the moment has always been the embodiment of Satan. The struggle for a civilized world, which had been going on long before 1789 much less 1947, was to impose law on international relations and bounds even on warfare, much less hostility in time of peace. The fact is that no other government but ours boasts of such an agency, and there is no evidence that any other government today employs assassins in carrying out its policies.

Cuban Missile Threat Exaggerated?

"A watchdog committee [to supervise the CIA] would also stop some irresponsible talk concerning U.S. activities abroad. The presence of Soviet missiles in Cuba 18 months after the Bay of Pigs invasion, for example, loosed a torrent of oratory on the magnitude of the Soviet threat in Cuba. If the CIA had briefed a watchdog committee certain inaccurate statements which stemmed from ignorance of the facts would never have been uttered."

—Sen. McCarthy on the CIA in Satevepost Jan. 4.

The remedy Senator McCarthy proposes is too mild for the disease. The CIA's director, John McCone, demonstrated when head of the AEC how easily he could twist a supposed watchdog, the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy to his purposes. In any case, to set up a Congressional committee to pass on requests for funds and permission to kill foreign leaders we dislike and overthrow foreign governments of which we disapprove would only be to institutionalize the evil and spread the corruption. Only by ending all cloak and dagger activities and reducing the CIA to normal intelligence tasks, as former President Truman suggests, can this cancerous growth be excised from a free society.

When Senator McCarthy discusses the Guatemala affair (see box below) he inadvertently discloses how dangerous it is to let a agency of our government, even if supervised, carry on secret war against other governments. Ignorance and unconscious arrogance are revealed in his easy assumption that the U.S. "undoubtedly benefitted" from the CIA's overthrow of Arbenz. The United Fruit Company, yes. But the USA? And even if we did benefit, have we the right to impose our views by force and stealth upon our neighbors against their wishes, to decide what is best for them, or if not for them, then at least for us?

A Liberal Senator But On Guatemala Far to The Right of Britain's Tories

"The CIA also claims to have masterminded the overthrow of the Communist-influenced government of Jacobo' Arbenz Guzman in Guatemala in 1954. In this instance the result undoubtedly benefitted the United States, but the question remains as to whether the CIA is the proper tool for such endeavors."

—Sen. McCarthy (D. Minn.) in Sat. Eve. Post, Jan.4-11.

"A special problem was created [in Guatemala] by the extensive estates of the United Fruit Company . . . the parts of the Company's holdings lying fallow could, under the provisions of the [Arbenz Agrarian reform] law be legally forfeit. The Company argued that such unused reserves were temporarily necessitated by the technical considerations of banana production. Large tracts of its property, including some areas under cultivation, were nevertheless expropriated. Sharp diplomatic protests followed from the U.S., and the whole reform came to be regarded as an anti-U.S. act and a means of turning Guatemala into a Communist state. . . . Nearly one million hectares, including a large tract of United Fruit Company territory, were expropriated and divided up among 100,000 rural workers. . . . One of the first acts of the Government of Col. Castillo Armas, in 1954 [after Arbenz' overthrow], was to cancel the Agrarian Reform law and restore the status quo.

"In considering the abortive Arbenz reform, it may be asked to what extent its denunciation as a Communist menace was justified. The provisions of the law were by no means of an extreme revolutionary nature. The application of these measures was, however, in some cases revolutionary. The Communists clearly spared no effort to turn the situation to their advantage. Yet few cases of violence against landowners was reported, and no attempt seems to have been made to set up peasant collectives. . . . It is at least arguable that, if left to take its course, the reform would have worked out in much the same way as in Mexico and Bolivia."

—Agrarian Reform in Latin America, a pamphlet by Chatham House (the Royal Institute of International Affairs, the citadel of the Tory point of view toward colonial problems), Oxford Univ. Press (London and Fair Lawn, N.J.) Nov. 1962.

Summing Up Fallacies That Lead Us to Waste Billions in Foreign Aid

Morse Warns Against Plan to Hide Military Aid in Pentagon Budget

The recipients of our military aid cannot maintain large military establishments out of their own economic resources. If they could, they would not need the military aid from us. In that sense we are leaning on weak reeds wherever we send military aid, because a country that is militarily dependent on others in time of peace is hopelessly dependent upon others in time of war.

Take Iran. There is a country on the border of the Soviet Union to which we have sent $633 million in military aid between 1946 and 1963. We sent Iran $789 million in economic aid in the same period. But suppose some Soviet aggression occurred against Iran. Ignoring for the moment the purely military value—if any—of the Iranian forces, the U.S. would have to pour still more American wealth into Iran itself to keep it going under war conditions.

This Applies to Most of the Program

Exactly the same is true of Turkey, Taiwan, Pakistan, Greece, Korea, the Philippines, Thailand and South Vietnam, all of which account for the great bulk of foreign aid outside the Alliance for Progress.

We have heard repeated over and over again that it is cheaper to maintain in uniform a South Korean, a Formosan, a Pakistani, a Turk, when the fact is that we maintain them and our own forces as well; and it is our own forces, and not their military defense, that give them the security.

There is the ugly fact, which the world needs to face, that if war were to break out with Russia, it would not be a conventional war. All the billions of dollars of military aid that we have poured into these countries would be recognized as having been wasted. It would be a nuclear war of short duration and the probabilities are that both of the major combatants would destroy themselves.

The time has come for a hard, long look at military aid. I warn the American people what the next move will be. The next move will be a move of partial concealment, by taking military aid out of the general aid bill, and having it considered in connection with the U.S. defense budget. It does not belong there because it is a foreign policy issue.

Why, Then, An Alliance for Progress?

"It is said both in Latin America and in the U.S. that if we expect these countries to move too fast and do very much to help themselves, they will become unsettled politically and that might lead to unsettled military consequences. This is why the apologies are made for the juntas in Latin America. The apology makes the case that reform upsets the ruling classes and causes them to seize the government. But if the same old system is to remain entrenched in Latin America, then I see no reason for the Alliance for Progress. If the juntas take over to prevent reform, and if the juntas are desirable because they keep the Communists down, then there is really no reason for any further American investment in the nations to the south."

—Morse of Oregon to the Senate, Dec. 30.

Plans to separate economic aid from military aid will, if carried out, lead to increases in both. It has been commonly said for many years that Congress would approve just about any amount of military aid if it were hidden away in the budget of the Defense Department. There is a wide body of opinion in the administration that economic aid should be sacrificed, if need be, to the objections made to foreign aid in general, but that military aid should be put in the Defense Department budget where it will be rubber-stamped by Congress. But even if it is carried out, its proponents will find out eventually that the nations favored for even more military aid cannot make use of it without large sums of economic aid.

I am opposed to such separation for another reason. Putting military aid into the Defense Department budget in a effort to remove it from true Congressional scrutiny would be a final step in the direction of military diplomacy.

—Morse to the Senate Dec. 30 (abridged).

Three American Eye-Witnesses Protest The New Dictatorship in Dominican Republic

"Senator Morse, in the almost 2 months I spent in the Dominican Republic after the new dictatorship took over from Juan Bosch, I have seen with my own eyes thousands of people, on many occasions, tear- and nausea-gassed by the police. Students kicked and beaten, for trying to march or demonstrate, and in one case I watched a night high school student die with a bullet hole through his abdomen. The 'civilian junta' or triumvirate, as it is called in the now controlled news, is a military dictatorship, trying to impose control through terror."

"Last month I returned to the U.S. after two years in the Dominican Republic. Because I love the Dominican Republic and of course our country, I don't want to see either of them go wrong.

"1. Under the government of Juan Bosch there was complete freedom of movement, opinion, publication, expression. Law was enforced, and there was no cause for, nor interest in, rebellion.

"2. The leftover Trujillo military, in combination with the great hereditary rich, seized power on Sept. 25, 1963, and have enforced a new dictatorship.

"3. Pacific resistance by the people has failed. It appears that now on about 11 fronts there is fighting in the mountains and countryside. The triumvirate claims this is a Communist movement. Naturally they must, to excuse their suppression of it. One of the leaders of one of the fronts is 'Manolo' Tavarez, leader of the leftist '14th of June' party [since killed by the military—IFS].

"4. But the resistance is in truth universal and is being joined by upper and middle class and urban youth of the lower class, [who] represent all shades of political opinion."

"Last December [1962] hope had a beginning—for the first time in their lives, the campesinos' voice had some meaning, and their votes put a man in office. But the recent 'golpe de estado' [military coup] proved once again that the wealth and power groups will run the country the way they want to. We Peace Corps volunteers are sick at heart."

—From three letters from Americans who saw what happened in the Dominican Republic, as put into the Congressional Record by Senator Morse Dec. 30 pps. 24398-399, along with equally painful letters from Honduras where we also have recognized a new military dictatorship.

Soviet Pact Should Be Supplemented by An Arms Embargo to Disputants

of China. But if you leave Germany and China out of the picture, if you get the two great Powers to put aside the disputes in which their own allies are involved, it is not hard to see how useful a contribution this new Soviet proposal could make to world peace.

One-Third The Human Race

The two biggest nations on earth, with more than one billion people between them, more than one-third the human race, India and China, have been involved in a bitter and nonsensical border dispute that takes bread from the mouths of their hungry peoples. On the other side of India, its border quarrel with Pakistan over Kashmir keeps more than a half billion human beings in constant hostility. Another hundred million people are involved in the smoldering quarrel among Indonesia, the Philippines and Malaysia over the latter's borders. There may be new trouble this spring between the Arab States and Israel. Africa, from Somalia in the East to Morocco in the West, is girding for war over border troubles. A world agreement to negotiate such disputes, buttressed by an agreement between Moscow and Washington not to supply arms to either side—would this not immeasurably contribute to world peace?

A creative diplomacy on our side, really concerned to win battles for peace, could easily take the initiative from the Russians by extending and completing this proposal, first of all in the field of an arms embargo to these quarrelling powers. Russian arms to Egypt and Iraq have greatly increased the danger of war in the explosive Middle East; why not challenge Moscow to a joint agreement which would help to prevent war and force negotiation with Israel in that area? Russian arms to Somalia in its conflict with Kenya and Ethiopia, Russian arms to Indonesia in its quarrel with Malaysia, increase the dangers of new wars spreading out of East Africa and Southeast Asia. But would we be willing to give up the similar leverage for expansion which the Sino-Indian border dispute has given us in India and the Indian Ocean, where Western arms are ending Indian non-alignment, though at the cost of diverting precious resources from the war against India's immemorial hunger to military preparations for war over bleak uninhabitable and never clearly marked borders with Tibet? If we feel this proposal is "non-objective" on Formosa, why not propose that Formosa be included? But are we, then, willing to be objective about Germany? The Oder-Neisse border is not worth a world holocaust. On the other hand, within the terms of the Soviet note, why not negotiate firm access rights to Berlin as a safeguard against indirect border aggression against that free city? There is much that can be done with that note if we really mean business about peace.

Why They Turn to Moscow

"'While paying lip service to self-determination, the U.S. supplies its ally, Portugal, with arms that are used to kill us.' Another example of 'American hypocrisy', Mr. Roberto said, is that G. Mennen Williams, Ass't Secretary of State for African Affairs, tried to convince the Congolese Premier, Cyrille Adoula, not to recognize the Angolan exile government."

—"Angolan Rebels to Take Red Aid", New York Times from Leopoldville, Jan. 4.

One stale State Department objective needs to be nailed down hard. This is its rejoinder that this proposal would still leave the Communists free to wage colonial "wars of liberation." The mythical view that colonial revolts are generated by Moscow has died everywhere else but here. Most of Asia and Africa have been liberated in response to irresistable pressure from its peoples, and only where the Western powers in their folly have tried to hold back the tide have the Communists taken over. Right in the midst of State Department inspired stories on this theme comes the news, for example, that Holden Roberto, the leader of the pro-western faction among the Angolan rebels against Portugal, has turned to Moscow for help in despair over undercover U.S. aid to Portugal (see box above). The way to keep these peoples from falling into Moscow or Peking's sphere of influence is not to force them into it.

James Baldwin on A Kidnapping Which Never Happened, P. 2

Dallas Police Wonder Whether Oswald Was FBI Informer, Houston (Tex.) Paper Reports

"DALLAS—Was Lee Harvey Oswald a stool pigeon for a federal government agency? That's the question being asked by many people in responsible positions here. . . . Oswald did know of Joe Hosty, the FBI agent who handles subversive matters in the Dallas FBI office. 'He had Hosty's phone number, office phone and car license numbers,' said Bill Alexander, assistant district attorney to Henry Wade and one of the state's most able prosecutors. . . .

"Mrs. Marguerite Oswald, mother of Oswald, had a terse 'no comment' when asked if her son had told her he was or had at least been asked to be an informant in anti-subversive work. She did not deny it. However she was quoted in the Philadelphia Inquirer as saying her son had been approached by a government agent to be an informer.

"Inasmuch as she had no direct contact with her son after Sept. of 1962, the contact, if made, would have been before she went to work for a Fort Worth matron in the same month and indicated to her employer that 'Lee was doing important work.' The social matron said she got the impression from Mrs. Oswald that Lee Oswald was doing some sort of work for the Federal government. . . .

"Informed sources in Dallas tell of seeing a report forwarded to the commission investigating President Kennedy's death that states that 'at 2:30 p.m. Friday, Nov. 22' an FBI agent told Dallas police the FBI knew of Oswald and had conducted some surveillance of him. If this is true, veteran police and sheriff's investigators ask, their watch on Oswald must not have been too good or they would have noticed the possible significance of his working in a building on the route of the motorcade.

"It is this point that has led to speculation by police and sheriff's deputies in Dallas that Oswald might have been an informant because, as one put it, 'you just wouldn't think to check out one of your own stoolies'."

Only One Place to Build A New Canal and Run It That Way

Where a people's interest and pride is concerned, as ours is in the Panama Canal, nothing is harder to see than the obvious. In 1956 we made it possible, by our intervention, for the Egyptians to seize and keep the Suez Canal. We forced Britain, France and Israel to withdraw their troops, in large part because our big oil companies didn't want the Arabs "upset." Panamanians naturally find this bit of history interesting.

The Rare Assets of The Poor

Both Egypt and Panama regard the canals across their territory as national assets, on which they should be able to cash in; they have too little else. The Egyptians drew revenues of $115 million from their Canal in 1961 and almost $120 million in 1962. From 1936 to 1955 the Panamanians got only $430,000 a year for their Canal rights; since 1955, this has been $1,930,000 a year. This looks pretty paltry as their share of the $58 million in tolls we collected last fiscal year. What makes it look worse is that the tolls are still, thanks to the U.S. shipping lobby, what they were before World War I. The Panamanians feel, as their Ambassador said on CBS Face The Nation (Jan. 19), that they are indirectly subsidizing "the Merchant Marine of the U.S. and of the world by permitting those low tolls to be in force today as they were 50 years ago."

No country in Central America, whether Colombia, or Nicaragua, or Mexico, is going to let us build a canal across its territory, and run it the way we have run the Panama Canal. Nobody is going to give us a grant in perpetuity. Nobody is going to give us sovereignty over the land around a Canal and let us put up a fence to keep its citizens out. Nobody is going to let us fix rates without asking them, and juggle the accounts any way we please, charging off against revenues many items which have only a remote connection with running the Canal. There is only one place we could build and run a canal that way and that would be straight across the USA from New York to Los Angeles. Short of that, we ought to stop talking nationalistic nonsense and negotiate a revision of the treaty to give Panama a break, establishing conditions of joint operation which would restore Panama's self-respect and good neighbor relations. Jan. 20

Before Castro Was Born

Mr. [Paul] NIVEN (CBS News): Mr. Boyd, our Secretary of State and Secretary of the Army have said that while the dispute originally broke out between U.S. students in the Canal Zone and Panamanian students, it was quickly exacerbated by Communist agents, some of whom had only recently arrived in Panama. . . . Secretary of the Army Vance said that ten persons suspected of being agents, including one sniper, had been taken into custody by Panamanian authorities at the request of the U.S. Army. Is this not correct?

Ambassador BOYD: My government has instructed me to deny emphatically that there was any participation of Communists in Panama.

Mr. NIVEN: In other words, you are taking the position that Castroite agents or Communists have had no part in this from beginning to end.

Ambassador BOYD: Sir, we are taking the strong position that this is a nationalistic movement and that it would be a terrible mistake if we mislead the public opinion of this country by saying that Castro or Khrushchev had something to do with it. This is a problem that we have been living with before the Bolshevik Revolution or before Castro was born.

—CBS Face The Nation, Jan. 19.

New Government Discoveries in Products and Planning Methods Could Enrich Civilian Life

Humphrey Proposal for Special Jobs Commission Opens Creative Prospects

Labor, civil rights and peace groups can find a useful vehicle for common action in supporting the bill introduced by Senator Humphrey (with the support of Senators Hart and Clark) for a 32-man Commission on Automation, Technology and Employment. Its authority would be broad enough to deal with the problem of jobs in every respect, from improved technology to armament cutbacks. It would have to report within two years and this report could have historic impact. Among other things, the Commission would be instructed to study and report on the incidence of automation "upon particular occupations and groups of workers" and to examine new technical developments resulting from Federal research in the arms and other programs "with a view to discovering those areas potentially most promising for civilian and industrial exploitation."

Whole New Industries Possible

Industry has been slow to tap promising civilian applications of weapons and space research. Humphrey told the Senate (Jan. 15) "whole new industries could be created in this way." Humphrey said cutbacks in bases, military personnel and uranium output "must not be permitted to result in reduced gross national product or increased unemployment." He called attention again to the insistence of the Pentagon on classifying as secret the survey made by his disarmament subcommittee of some 360 defense contractors to learn their attitude toward the impact of arms cuts on the economy. The survey turned up unexpectedly optimistic results.

One passage in Humphrey's speech was of special interest to those who believe large-scale economic and social planning necessary to handle the problems of automation and disarmament. "A whole new 'systems approach' to large-scale problems," Humphrey said, has been developed in government-sponsored research. This involves highly expert people and disciplines working together. We must plan to translate this skill and this method to large-scale problems of the Nation, in regional development, city planning, transportation, air and water pollution, and more."

Better Lung Cancer than Psychosis?

"As the poet has said, there is good and bad in everything. The history of America and the history of tobacco run parallel. Tobacco was once used here as money. And it has been smoked here for over 350 years—with satisfaction. And that, in itself, is a commentary. Who can say with assurance that we would have been better off without tobacco? I want to make it clear that I am not a tobacco raiser, though in our State much tobacco is grown—and Maryland is noted for its high-quality tobacco.

"I am not a scientist. I cannot discuss this issue on a scientific basis. However, let me interject one idea of a layman on the subject of health. Mental health is a subject much in the public mind. Psychiatry has come into its own because of the stress and strain of the present day. Most doctors will tell us, I believe, that this stress and strain accounts for much of the disability of today. Possibly we need more relaxing, more contemplation. And may I ask, what better tool for relaxing, for contemplation, than a good smoke? Let us be sure that we do not kill one evil with perhaps a bigger one."

—Beall (R. Md.) to the Senate, Jan. 14.

Humphrey saw jobs enough to absorb all the country's manpower if we were to learn to cope with "the sheer logistical problems of living" in urban areas. "The possibilities now opening up to release some money from the requirements of defense and the prospect of more to come," he said, "project us both into the possibility of planning ahead and make that planning a necessity." The Commission would be empowered to initiate disarmament reconversion planning by principal defense contractors and it could become a means for launching the kind of pragmatic joint action by public and private enterprise which has proven so fruitful in countries like France and Sweden. Industry and labor would each have three representatives on the Commission.

James Baldwin Appeals for Justice in A Kidnapping Case Where No One Was Kidnapped

"I want to call your attention to a case which is crucial for the civil rights movement and for justice in America.

"This is the so-called kidnap case in Monroe, N.C. This is a 'kidnap' case in which there was no kidnapping; in which a white couple took refuge in a Negro leader's home during the disturbances following a police-encouraged riot against Freedom Riders and local Negro pickets. After a brief stay the white couple went their way unharmed. Yet this incident has been made the basis for legal charges carrying a mandatory sentence of 20 years and maximum of life imprisonment.

"Three young men—two Negro teenagers from Monroe and a white Freedom Rider from New York—were arrested several days later and held for 64 days in the medieval conditions of the local jail before this committee was able to secure their release on heavy bail. A fourth defendant, a Negro mother, who had been in Monroe helping in the civil rights effort there, has just been extradited from Ohio after a two-year legal battle to Monroe, N.C.

"Monroe's Negro leader, Robert F. Williams, informed that he 'would soon be hanging' from a tree in the courthouse square, fled with his family and found safety in exile. After his flight, he, too, was included in the indictment which serves as an effective bar to his return since no one questions that the racially discriminatory and prejudiced juries of the area would unhesitatingly and regardless of evidence give him a life sentence.

"For almost two and a half years now the prosecution has refused to bring the three young men defendants to trial. This is not only a denial of their constitutional right of speedy trial but constitutes a refined form of torture. The deliberate prolongation of the case also exhausted the financial resources of this defense committee and served to dim the case in the public consciousness.

"Now, however, we expect the case to come to trial in February. It is vital that we prevent innocent people from being victimized because they fought for racial justice in America. The defendants must be afforded the best legal defense possible and the facts of the case must be brought to the conscience of the American people."

—James Baldwin, on behalf of the Committee to Aid the Monroe Defendants, 168 W. 23rd St., N.Y.C., 11.

Carey Exposes Plan to Let U. S. Chamber of Commerce Pick Oil Man's Successor on AEC

Time Labor and the Consumer Had A Voice on the Atomic Energy Commission

The day labor leaders met with President Johnson for lunch at the White House, James Carey of the UERMWA sent him a letter protesting that the U.S. Chamber of Commerce was being allowed to pick the successor to Robert E. Wilson on the Atomic Energy Commission. This was confirmed in Nucleonics Week (Jan. 9) which said the U.S. Chamber "presumably at Wilson's suggestion, has submitted a recommended list of candidates to Chairman Seaborg" and that "President Johnson will be counselled to recruit a successor from industry."

Leo Goodman A Labor Candidate

Carey, James Patton of the Farmers Union and Dr. Russell H. Morgan of Johns Hopkins, one of the country's most eminent radioologists, are supporting a labor candidate for the vacancy. He is Leo Goodman, secretary of the Atomic Energy Technical Committee in the Industrial Union Department of the AFL-CIO. In the past 10 years the indefatigable Mr. Goodman has made an international reputation as an authority on atomic problems.

There has never been a labor representative on the Atomic Energy Commission in all its history. Though a number of independent-minded scientists and public officials have served on it, the AEC has tended to be pretty firmly under the control of the military-industrial complex. Under the chairmanships of Strauss and McCone, it shared military hostility to any cessation of testing and the reluctant industrial point of view toward peaceful development of the atom. It has been industry-minded in dealing with worker health and safety problems. The lack of candor which marks its record on fallout also marks its record in this field. Wilson himself, a retired chairman of Standard Oil of Indiana, was several times attacked by Senator Anderson on the ground that he represented an industry which produced a competing fuel and wanted to block atomic power for civilian uses.

Carey's letter seems to have blocked the plan swiftly and quietly to provide a like-minded successor from industry. Mr. Goodman was a labor candidate for the AEC in 1962 when there were two vacancies. He would give a voice not just to labor but to the consumer. Most important of all he would provide a creative influence in dealing with the problem of converting atomic industry to peaceful uses as military stockpiles grow beyond any possible need and more progress is made toward disarmament. Carey spoke with vision of this problem in his testimony on the test ban treaty before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee last Fall. He listed a series of atomic projects for underdeveloped areas which would open up the enormous potential of the atom and "wash away the terrible image of the mushroom cloud." A labor man on the AEC could help make these ideas a reality.

A Double Danger We Should Not Ignore

That underground test in Nevada January 16 was the 100th announced underground test since testing resumed Sept. 1961 and the 15th since the nuclear test ban treaty was signed last Fall. It was a large one—somewhere between 20 and 200 kilotons. No venting was reported by the AEC next day, but underground tests often do vent, discharging radioactivity into the atmosphere. This has a double significance. E. A. Martell claims in the Jan. 10 issue of Science that venting from underground tests is a major source of radioactive iodine. Venting is also important because Article I of the nuclear test ban treaty pledges the signers not to test underground if such explosion spreads radioactive debris outside its territory. The heavy volume of U.S. underground testing may provoke the Soviet military to press for resumption; radioactive debris from such tests might provide the excuse. Are these tests really necessary?

Somebody Ought to See Whether That Little Man in the Soviet Bank Is Still There

"Constructive Step in the Cold War. More Public Disclosures By the CIA Held Valuable Service to the Nation."

—David Lawrence's column Washington Star, Jan. 16.

"Several authorities on the Soviet economy are questioning a recent Central Intelligence Agency estimate that Russia's gold holdings have fallen to less than $2 billion. . . . Leon Herman, the Library of Congress senior specialist on Soviet affairs, says the CIA's estimate was speculative and that 'common sense points in the other direction.'

"Mr. Herman and other economists who did not wish to be named said that if Russia were facing a gold squeeze it most likely would have sought credits for its multi-million dollar wheat imports instead of paying in cash. . . . A recent memorandum on Soviet gold prepared within the Government has become available. This memo puts Soviet annual production at between $182 and $206.5 million a year, higher than the CIA's estimate."

—Washington Star, same day, same page.

"The new estimates on Soviet gold production and reserves, published in Washington this week by the CIA have caused considerable surprise among experts in London. They [the CIA estimates] place Soviet gold output at $150m a year, which would correspond to 4,300,000 oz., compared with the estimates of the U.S. Bureau of Mines—an official Government Bureau of the highest technical qualifications—of 12,200,000 oz. for 1962 and 11,800,000 oz. for 1961. . . .

"With production estimates coming up against insurmountable difficulties, any guesses on the prevailing Soviet gold reserves appear to experts completely useless unless their source could claim the confidence of the leaders of the Government or at least of the President of the Soviet State Bank.* The question which the publication of these new estimates has raised on this side of the Atlantic, indeed, is not so much the accuracy, or otherwise, of the figures but the CIA's purpose in publishing them at all. It might have served the agency's reputation better if it had kept its estimates to itself.

"Meanwhile the Soviet authorities do not appear to be particularly worried about the reported 'smallness' of their gold reserve. They, at any rate, continue to pay cash for their wheat purchases right up to the present time, even where credit facilities are available."

—Financial ("City") Editor of the London Times, Jan. 10.

* The CIA in rebuttal seems now to be claiming that its estimates are based in part on a new defector. Some U.S. newsman in Moscow ought to drop by and see whether that little man behind the cash register in the Soviet State Bank (and the cash register) are still there.

Voluntary Methods Fail to End Skilled Union Labor's Traditional Hostility to The Negro

Negro Squeezed Between Automation and Lily-White Apprenticeships

While automation dries up unskilled and semi-skilled jobs for Negroes, pushing unemployment among them to depression proportions, it does create new opportunities at the skilled levels, where openings are plentiful. But here Negroes are denied "the opportunity for training." In effect, therefore, the Maryland Advisory Committee reports to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, "Negroes are squeezed out at both ends of the job spectrum." This Maryland report was one of nine "Reports on Apprenticeship" from advisory units in eight States and the District of Columbia just released by the Commission.

Poorly printed by offset from hard-to-read typewriter copy (for lack of funds) this volume deserves more attention than it is likely to get. It shows that the apprenticeship system, as operated by U.S. trade unions, remains a basic obstacle to real equality of opportunity. The apprenticeship program has a medieval guild flavor; its main aim is to maintain scarcity of skilled help and it tends to create an almost hereditary privileged class in the ranks of labor.

North Differs Little From South

The Negro is the main victim. In Washington, D.C. where 55 percent of the population is non-white, only 5.5 percent of the apprentices in the building trades are Negroes. The North's record is not substantially different from the South's in this respect. In Connecticut Negroes constituted only seven-tenths of one percent of the apprentices. In New Jersey, they were less than half of one percent—15 Negroes out of 3,980 apprentices. The Federal Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training after 25 years of existence is only now and reluctantly being pushed into action in this field. Even so, of 15 Maryland programs approved by the Bureau, 10 had no Negroes at all and five had three or fewer Negroes enrolled. Of the 50 crafts and trades in Tennessee's apprenticeship programs, only eight included Negro apprentices—and four of these were connected with all-Negro unions. In 1960, Negroes were 22 percent of New York City's population but only 2 percent of the apprentices were Negroes.

After A Quarter of A Century

"The [Commission on Civil Rights] hearings of 1961 focused public attention on the [Federal] Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training for the first time in its quarter century of operation. Negro exclusion from the programs was debated vigorously. . . . Questioning by the subcommittee chairman established that the Bureau itself did not employ Negroes as field representatives or in positions above GS-5, and that the Director of the District of Columbia Apprenticeship Council, a Bureau staff person, followed the practice of marking the application forms of Negroes for apprenticeship with a '2 or N' as an identification of the applicant's race. The racial designations were ordered stopped by the Secretary of Labor before the hearings had adjourned, but it was not until March 4, 1963, that the Dept. of Labor could announce the hiring of the Bureau's first Negro field representative."

—Report on Apprenticeship, U.S. Civil Rights Commission, January 20. A footnote indicates that the Bureau was itself found guilty by the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity of anti-Semitic attitudes toward a militant State supervisor.

Some figures supplied by the D. of C. committee are of special importance. The proportion of Negro apprentices where apprenticeship committees were run jointly by labor and management showed 8.9 percent Negro. Where the training was by managment alone, the proportion of Negroes was 29.2 percent. The figures speak eloquently of the racism in the working class itself. The Commission's staff editors note with quiet despair, "As long as the Federal government depends on such voluntary relationships with management and the unions, perhaps little real progress can be expected." The New York advisory unit recommends as a final resort that Congress "enact legislation declaring that admission to apprenticeship in the construction trades is a matter affecting interstate commerce" and that such admission be regulated by an agency analogous to the Civil Service Commission. Agitation for law of this type would at least help to put more heat on our lagging trade union movement.

Canada's Leading Paper Satirizes U.S. Devotion to International Law in Cuban Crisis

"It (seizure of the Cuban fishing boats) presents a ludicrous picture—the U.S. protesting a violation of international law, as represented by 38 men and boys fishing in Florida waters without a license, to the country over which it has been flying regular surveillance missions in violation of international law. . . .

"The Secretary of State did not say it, but the State Department has been encouraging speculation that the Cuban government sent the boats into Florida waters as a matter of deliberate provocation. Its alleged purpose was to bring Cuba's demand for the evacuation of Guantanamo to world attention once more. This is to attribute prescient cleverness to the Cubans or at worst a stroke of blind luck. It was impossible for the Cuban government to assume the imprisonment of the crews by the U.S. Government, since the federal statute dealing with encroachments on territorial waters contains no penalties.

"Havana could hardly have proceeded on so preposterous an assumption as that the U.S. would turn over the crews to the State of Florida to be tried for, of all things, fishing without a license. That is what was done, however."

Report on Cuba The New York Times Was Afraid to Print

This issue is edited as much for editors abroad as for readers at home. It illustrates the extent to which independent reporting and thinking about Cuba in this country have been restricted by intimidation. The report on Cuba to which we give over this week's issue is by no obscure journalist, with access only to the small publications on the fringes of our society. He is Herbert L. Matthews and an editor of America's greatest newspaper, the New York Times. His paper only a few weeks ago reprinted from The New Republic a sensational and friendly report on Cuba by the French journalist, Jean Daniel. Yet when Matthews visited Cuba and came back with an equally sensational report, not a line appeared in his own paper. Apparently a Frenchman or some other foreign journalist can be allowed wide publication about Cuba in the United States even if he transgresses American "party line" on this, our most controversial, subject. But when an American does it, the report seems to be unfit—or at least too hazardous—to print in the New York Times. It was left to the Hispanic American Institute at Stanford University, whose scholarly monthly report on Latin American affairs has a total circulation of 2500, to bring out the Matthews report in a special pamphlet from which we present salient excerpts in our pages.

Our Iron Curtain Around Cuba

"It is axiomatic in journalism that it is not possible to know what is happening anywhere unless you go there. In my own case, I had not been to Cuba since August 1960. The intensely hostile climate of opinion in the United States, some of which is directed towards me and the New York Times, and the difficulties placed in the way of all visitors by the U.S. and Mexican Governments, made an earlier trip unwise.

"The freedom for Americans to know and to travel has been curtailed, so far as Cuba is concerned. For teachers and students this is frightening. As scholars they are not allowed by the U.S. Government to go to Cuba to study one of the most important political and social phenomena of modern times. As a result none of our leading Latin Americanists knows what is happening in Cuba; they cannot teach with authority on the subject; they cannot even read the many articles and books on the Cuban Revolution now being published, with the ability to judge whether they are right or wrong, good or bad.

"All they can do (and Theodore Draper does it brilliantly and effectively, as always, in the January 1964 issue of Commentary) is to try to construct a plausible picture by piecing together speeches, decrees and reports, and interpreting them by applying Marxist and American liberal democratic yardsticks. Tree after tree is accurately described, but the forest is missed."

—Herbert L. Matthews: Return to Cuba.

No Subject More Important to Our Future

We do not say this to hurt the New York Times. In our lifetime it has never been a better or a more liberal newspaper. Its editorials on the silly and mendacious crisis whipped up by the State Department over the Cuban fishing boats in the past week deserve applause. It is the first U.S. daily to re-establish a bureau in Havana, a major result of the visit made there last Fall by Mr. Matthews. But considering the paucity of news from Cuba, the sensational character of one story Mr. Matthews brought back (see page 2), and the weight attached to his opinions, it is striking that these were not published by the New York Times itself. Mr. Matthews knows Spanish well. He distinguished himself by his courageous and sympathetic reporting of the Spanish Civil War in the New York Times in the 30's under circumstances almost as difficult as those which surround the Cuban revolution today. He knows Latin America and Cuba. His interview with Fidel Castro in the Sierra Maestra in 1957 was a journalistic feat, disproving the claim of the Batista government that Fidel's little band of guerrillas had been wiped out. No U.S. reporter is better equipped to provide a thorough, an informed and an objective report on Cuba today. On no subject is it more important to develop a balanced public opinion in this country. It is no exaggeration to say—as the missile crisis demonstrated—that our future and the world's may be placed in jeopardy by the mishandling of our Cuban relations. Yet only a relative handful of Americans will ever read this Matthews report.

Castro Insists It Was His Idea, Not Moscow's To Put Missiles in Cuba . . .

The excerpts on these two pages were taken from a special report just issued by the Institute of Hispanic American and Luso-Brazilian Studies, Bolivar House, Stanford University, California. This report was written by Herbert L. Matthews of the New York Times, who is on the Board of the Institute. It is called "Return to Cuba." Twice before, in 1959 and 1960, Mr. Matthews issued outstanding reports on the Cuban problem through the Institute. Its director, Ronald Hilton, has the distinction of being the first man in the U.S. to expose the existence of the CIA's training camps in Guatemala for the April, 1961, Cuban invasion. The monthly Hispanic American Report published by the Institute is invaluable for Latin American affairs. If you wish to read the full report from which these few excerpts were taken, you can obtain it by sending $1 to the Institute at the address given below. Please mention the Weekly. What follows is from the Matthews report:

Cuba's Dependence on the Soviets

"The Cuban leaders . . . do not see their economic dependence on the Soviet bloc as comparable to the previous economic domination by the U.S. For instance, the Russians buy Cuban sugar, but they do not own any Cubar sugar plantations or mills and do not want to. The Cubans assert that they will take no dictation from the Russians and—for anyone who knows Cubans—this is plausible.

"The cost of the Soviet bloc of sustaining the Cuban revolution, I was told in Havana, has been greatly exaggerated by Washington and the American press. Cubans say it is nothing like the $1,000,000 a day figure generally given in the U.S. I could not get a valid figure, although one good authority ventured an estimate of $100,000,000 a year."

—Herbert L. Matthews: Return to Cuba.

By Herbert L. Matthews

He [Castro] talked a good deal about the nuclear missile crisis of October 1962 (which Cubans always refer to as 'the crisis of the Caribbean'). It was in most respects, the same story that he told three and a half weeks later to Jean Daniel of L'Express of Paris, and which was widely reproduced. However, in one crucial detail of historic importance it was the opposite of what Jean Daniel had understood.

The essence of Fidel's account was that the Cubans, on the basis of information they were getting early in 1962 from a number of sources, felt almost sure that the U.S. was preparing a military invasion of Cuba. They were strengthened in this belief after Aleksei I. Adzhubei, Premier Khruschev's son-in-law and editor of Izvestia, had an interview with President Kennedy early that year. The official report of the interview was conveyed to the Cubans who interpreted some of the things that President Kennedy said as confirmation of their belief in a planned invasion. (The State Department denied that President Kennedy was so threatening, or that the U.S. was planning an invasion.)

Castro Says The Missiles Were "Defensive"

The Russians, Fidel Castro argued, were also persuaded that Cuba was going to be attacked. In these circumstances, he asserted, the nuclear weapons were 'defensive'; they were intended to discourage the U.S. from going ahead with its plans.

"In the world today," he went on, "there are two war phobias, one of a nuclear war which can be ruled out because nobody wants it, and the other of local wars. The U.S. and Russia, in the crisis of the Caribbean, were facing a world war but Cuba was facing a local war. She was going to be attacked by the U.S."

The Food Situation In Cuba

"There is enough to eat on the whole, but it is dull, with not much variety, and with constant distribution bottlenecks in Havana and other cities. There is no starvation or even serious malnutrition, but getting enough food is often extremely difficult and tiring for housewives. There is also enough fish in quantity, thanks to the high seas vessels bought from Japan and the ones the Russians gave Cuba, but it is fish that Cubans never ate and do not like—tuna, hake, and soon-to-be-marketed herring and cod.

"Children are especially well fed. Every child to the age of seven gets a quart of milk a day without fail. As a result of the hurricane the egg ration for adults in Havana was suspended while we were there, but not for the children."

—Herbert L. Matthews: Return to Cuba.

If Cuba were attacked, Fidel continued, the Russians would have been drawn in because of their commitment to the Castro government.

At this point he said to us flatly, in response to my question, that the idea of installing the nuclear weapons was his, not the Russians. Jean Daniel, in his account, published in the New York Times and New Republic, on the contrary wrote: "Castro confirmed that the initial idea originated with the Russians, and with them alone: 'The only thing we asked the Russians to do was to make it clear to the U.S. that any attack on us was an attack on the Soviet Union. We had extensive discussion before arriving at the proposal of installing guided missiles, a proposal which surprised us at first and gave us great pause. We finally went along with the Soviet proposal because, on the one hand, the Russians convinced us that the U.S. would not let itself be intimidated by conventional weapons, and secondly because it was impossible for us not to share the risks which the Soviet Union was taking to save us'."

In order to get this important point straight, once and for all, I spoke to Premier Castro over the telephone on the night of Jan. 7, 1964. He confirmed what he had said to us in Havana and in no uncertain terms. In fact, he clearly wanted the Daniel version of what he said (I regret to say, for my profession, that he called it "a journalistic version") to be corrected for the historic record.

He also said that Daniel was wrong in putting the entire emphasis on Adzhubei's talk with President Kennedy. This, said Fidel, was only one element ("un elemento en el juicio") among a great many that were taken into consideration.

Then he said, and during our 15-minute conversation he repeated it emphatically at least four times: "Fuimos nosotros que hemos planteado la idea de los misiles" ("We were the ones who put forward the idea of the missiles.")

At another point he said it was not for the Russians to make such a suggestion: "It was for us to do so. We showed them in an incontrovertible way that an invasion was being planned." His conclusion in discussing the whole crisis del Caribe with us was this: "War was avoided but peace was not gained."

. . . Communists Take A Back Seat in "Marxist-Leninist" State He Set Up

(More From the Matthews Report on Cuba)

To concentrate on Cuban Communism is to miss the forest for the trees. The Cuban Revolution is a very complicated phenomenon. It is bad and good, depending on what one looks at, what classes of people one considers.

It is also worse or better depending on how moral judgments are applied. If Communism is a sin, a heresy, a morally evil system, then Cuba has to be—as it is in the United States—condemned as if it were a hell on earth. If moral judgments are used to say, for instance, that is better for the children of the poor to be well fed, well taken care of, well clothed, educated, taught trades—as the greater part of them are in Cuba today for the first time in history, even if they are indoctrinated with Marxism-Leninism—then one reaches another result.

One can say that liberty is what we have under the U.S. Constitution, and since the Cubans do not have these liberties they are not free. Fidel Castro asks: "Can you really say to a Cuban Negro who now, for the first time has full equal rights and no discrimination that he is not free, and say to a Negro in Alabama or Mississippi that he is free?" There is a valid answer to this question, but it is not a simple answer.

Fidel and the Cuban CP

. . . the Cuban Communist steadily gained influence in that early period; the old political parties disappeared; the 26th of July Movement split into Left and Right and faded into the background. The links to Russia, the break with the United States, the embrace of Marxism-Leninism all pointed in one direction. Then came Fidel Castro's stunning attack on "sectarianism" and the old-line Cuban Communists of the PSP in March 1962. It was directed specifically at the Organizing Secretary, Anibal Escalante, who was trying to put party men into all key positions.

Fidel saw his revolution, his Cuban revolution, threatened and broke the power of the PSP so effectively that it has never come back. The problem of giving Cuba a hopefully permanent "Marxist-Leninist" political structure was already under way. A preliminary, tentative political setup, the Organizaciones Revolucionarias Integradas (ORI) was loosely thrown together in mid-1961 with the understanding that it was to be supplanted by a formal, permanent institution called the Partido Unificado de la Revolución Socialista de Cuba (PURSC).

The important feature to report today is that the PURSC is approaching its completed form . . . the idea is to bring together all the elements that will serve the Revolution loyally and efficiently. The PSP—the Cuban Communists—are merely one element; they do not control the PURSC or even play the most important role in it. The baffling distinction between Cuban Communism and Cuban Marxism-Leninism has to be made here as elsewhere. The remnants of the July 26 Movement and the old political and trade union groups are included, plus the very important element of the young men and women who are coming into the economic structure and political life without any previous connection with politics.

Fidel Not A Puppet of The Reds

"The belief fostered by Washington and the Cuban exiles that Fidel Castro is a prisoner of the Cuban Communist apparatus or a puppet of Moscow is a myth. He is, by character, incapable of accepting orders or even advice. The path he has chosen forces him into a conformity to most of the needs and desires of the Soviet bloc, but that is a different matter.

"Now that five years have passed, it is surely time for American officials and the American public to realize that whatever they want to think of Fidel Castro, he is one of the most extraordinary men of our age. The U.S. has paid heavily for a shocking underestimation of Fidel Castro's intelligence and abilities."

—Herbert L. Matthews: Return to Cuba.

Construction of the PURSC started at the grass roots. Each farm, factory, public utility or working group of any type selected what were supposed to be their best men and women. . . . The PURSC is therefore a carefully chosen elite, dedicated to the Revolution. I asked Fidel if it was not similar in conception to the Communist Party in the Soviet Union, the Fascist Party in Italy and the Nazi Party in Germany, and he said that roughly it was. It does not govern; it has no administrative powers. Its function is to carry out the economic and political policies of the Government at every level. . . .

The Government, as now constituted is headed by an executive committee, or directorate, of six: Fidel Castro, Raul Castro, Che Guevara, President Dorticos, Blas Roca (the old line, PSP, trade union leader who was a Cabinet Minister under Batista in the 1940s) and Emilio Aragones Navarro (former head of the Federation of Bank Workers, ex-26th of July Movement, an accountant from the middle class). Of the group, only Blas Roca is an old-style PSP Communist.

Castro Less Friendly in Talking to Matthews About Kennedy (Then Alive) Than to Daniel

"President Kennedy was still alive when we saw Premier Castro, and his comments on President Kennedy were less friendly than they were more than three weeks later when he saw Jean Daniel, the French correspondent, just at the time President Kennedy was assassinated. President Kennedy, Fidel said, was doing more harm to the U.S. than to Cuba in the long run by policies aiming to destroy the Castro regime through isolation, trade embargoes and CIA support for counter-revolutionaries, saboteurs and guerrillas. 'The U.S. is essentially in a more dangerous position internationally than Cuba, and the U.S. will lose,' he said. 'Kennedy makes a fine speech to the American University, with its emphasis on peace, understanding, coexistence—and then he goes off to Berlin and makes a bellicose speech. How can you figure him out?'

"Fidel still has the primitive ideas one often finds in Latin American leftists of the U.S. as a rapacious, imperialistic, aggressive country. Like his associates, he is sure that there are going to be other revolutions in Latin America, although no one predicts where. However, Castro did inquire several times what the United States would do about Brazil when, as he seemed to expect, there is a revolution there.

"When we asked him about the subversion that Cubans are accused of in Latin America, he replied: 'Of course we engage in subversion, the training of guerrillas, propaganda! Why not? This is exactly what you are doing to us."

—Herbert L. Matthews: Return to Cuba.

Secretary Rusk's Unctuous Concern for A World Common Law

Frankly we hope by giving the Matthews report wider circulation in our own pages to elicit comment in Western Europe which may shame the American government, press and public into an awareness of what a ludicrous figure we cut in the world by our state of mind on Cuba. We do not set outselves up in judgment over the New York Times but we do think it important to call attention to its timidity and the causes for it. The New York Times was the No. 1 target of Senator Eastland's Internal Security subcommittee in its 1955 attempt to "investigate", i.e. to smear and intimidate the press. Then the same committee in 1960 seized on the 1957 Matthews interview with Castro to draw a paranoid picture of Batista's downfall as due to a conspiracy between liberal newspapermen and certain officials in the State Department. These Congressional witch hunts added to other factors have created an arrogance, an ignorance, and a frustration over Cuba that make the U.S. a kind of "sick man" on the subject. There is no topic on which it is more dangerous to be objective in the United States today. Since such attitudes may again endanger world peace, this American sickness is a world problem.

Biggest Bargain Since Manhattan

We believe the observations we have culled from the Stanford Institute pamphlet by Mr. Matthews may help to develop a more adult and sober opinion in our own country. We believe the incident itself may help Western Europeans and neutrals to understand how the U.S. government is locked into rigid, inhumane and self-defeating attitudes toward Castro. We think this important at a time when our own government is trying to coerce its allies and friends into a blockade designed to strangle the Cuban revolution. It does not make our country look better to have this effort coupled, as Secretary of State Rusk coupled it at his last press conference, with unctuous asurances about our concern for developing what he calls a "world common law." If anything has been accepted as world common law, it is that an economic war like ours against Cuba is a violation of freedom of the seas and in direct conflict with the charters of the United Nations and the Organization of American States. Mr. Rusk demonstrated his own ideas of proper conduct in his Feb. 7 statement on Cuba by withholding the information that as early as Dec. 9 the Cuban government, through the Swiss government, notified us that its vessels would be fishing in the Gulf of Mexico near the Dry Tortugas. To have disclosed this would have exploded the idea the State Department fostered that the fishing boats were engaged in a provocation to get us out of Guantanamo. This is a question we are foolish to raise; no other country would dare claim that a treaty imposed by force on Cuba more than 60 years ago, under which we pay only $3,000 a year for 31 square miles of land and 14 square miles of harbor is somehow so sacrosanct that any move to question it calls for united action by all Christendom. Not since we bought Manhattan from the Indians did we pull off so fraudulent a deal and get so big a bargain as Guantanomo.

Castro and Religion

"Fidel Castro is a maverick among men, and it could be said that Marxist-Leninist Cuba is a maverick in the Communist fold. Religion is an example. The Roman Catholic Church (Cuba is perhaps 90% Catholic) naturally took a stand against Communism. For Fidel this was 'counter-revolution', and in 1960-61 there was a period of conflict during which he expelled most of the Spaniards who made up a large proportion of the clergy.

"However it was significant that Pope John XXIII and the Vatican never broke diplomatic relations with Havana. The controversy died down. Today, there is not only an Inter-Nuncio in Havana and a Cuban Ambassador at the Holy See, but there is complete freedom of religion. In speaking to one of the highest Catholic prelates in Cuba, I was told that freedom of worship was 'total'. One of the most important U.S. Protestant churchmen happened to be in Cuba when we were there and he said the same for the Protestant community.

"As Marxism-Leninism takes a stronger hold, religiosity will no doubt weaken, especially with the young, but that is for the future to determine. For the present, the attitude was doubtless well expressed by Fidel in speaking to us. 'I don't care whether a person is religious or not,' he said, 'or what his religion is'." —Herbert L. Matthews: Return to Cuba.

A Warning Signal The Peace Movement Ought to Heed While There's Still Time

"There is no doubt that the stakes are high in Vietnam. They are considerably more important than the economic, political and strategic value of the country. For in Vietnam the U.S. has fielded for the first time its concept of 'counter-insurgency'. . . . Because the U.S. has been morally, militarily and politically committed in South Vietnam, because its prestige is involved and because the consequences of failure would have world-wide repercussions, most, but not all, Washington officials believe the price of victory must be paid even if the price includes some limited commitment of U.S. combat forces. . . . Victory, no matter what is done, is far away."

The Outlook for Civil Rights in The Senate

A most hopeful augury the day the Civil Rights bill made its debut in the Senate was the remark by Republican Leader Dirksen that the accommodations section was "much more acceptable" to him than the original version. This looks like the beginning of a climb-down which would put the GOP leadership in the Senate as solidly behind the bill as it was in the House. There is hope in the air. The civil rights forces emerged from the fight in the House with increased confidence in themselves and a new respect for President Johnson. The Leadership Conference, with the help of the labor movement, probably did the best organized job of lobbying ever seen on Capitol Hill. There was a system of "spotters" in the gallery to watch the teller votes closely and to bring up votes quickly from a network of whips organized by the Democratic Study Group. There was an informal whip system by the civil rights forces themselves on each floor of the House office buildings to notify members of the votes coming up. One Congressman was even hailed, protesting, out of a "hot" poker game to do his bit in history. In place of indiscriminate "marches", hundreds of selected people with influence were brought in, including one Negro oil millionaire from the Southwest. The AFL-CIO itself marshalled a hundred or more key labor people.

A New Faith In LBJ

The most extraordinary part of the whole affair is the trust President Johnson has won in a few short months from Negro, labor and liberal leaders strongly opposed to him in the past. Leadership Conference spokesmen, in discussing the atmosphere in the House, said the Democrats "knew he meant business." They praise the quality of the White House liaison with the Hill during the fight, and the close and effective support given by the Justice Department. Mr. Johnson's hand was credited when ten Texans signed the discharge petition. Four—Brooks, Gonzales, Pickele, and Thomas—even voted for the bill. Chairman Emanuel Celler of House Judiciary piloted the bill with a patience, skill and fortitude that added another wonderful chapter to this old Gibraltar's record in the House. McCulloch of Ohio, the ranking Republican on Judiciary, from a district with few Negroes, won the gratitude of the civil rights forces by the way he led the Republican wing of the victorious coalition. Corman (Cal) and Rodino (NJ) on the Democratic and Lindsay (NY) and Mathias (Md) on the Republican side were able and devoted lieutenants. In the fight over amendments designed to weaken by widening the bill, Mrs. Green of Oregon stood alone among the women members in opposing a spurious "women's rights" amendment and that grand old man, Barrett O'Hara, fought off an equally spurious amendment to protect the aged. Best of all was the fact that so little racism appeared in the debate; Jones of Missouri was the worst in this respect. "The day of the old Southern demogogue," said one Leadership spokesman, "seems to be over."

A Christian View of Cuba

"The American blockade of Cuba is morally reprehensible, pragmatically futile and politically disastrous. . . . The time has come to abandon the un-American, unChristian and anti-human doctrine that what is ultimate in international relations and the shaping of history is physical power, material wealth and the relentless pursuit of self-interest. . . . The hour has arrived when Fidel Castro should be afforded the opportunity, hitherto denied him, to expound his position and to negotiate the issues that vitiate relations between Cuba and the United States. Failure to achieve such encounter will darken the horizons of the western hemisphere and of the world. On the matter of our relations with Cuba, Christians and Christian churches dare no longer remain silent."

—The Christian Century: Return to Cuba by Dr. John A. Mackay, president emeritus, Princeton Theological Seminary, Feb. 12.

The Senate is, of course, a far grimmer obstacle than the House, but the civil rights forces go into the fight there with a strange feeling which might best be described as a lingering distrust of their own optimism. The Southerners undoubtedly have some tricks up their sleeves; but so do the civil rights forces. Even as the House bill reached the Senate floor, a draft was circulating among friendly Senators which would add two new titles to the bill. These, if sponsored by liberal Republicans, would raise the ante with the Democrats and provide new pressure on the leadership. They offer, at the least, something to swap in a bargain and at the most the threat to the South of a much stronger bill should some new outrage suddenly change the picture as the Birmingham

Gore Tried to Raise Exemptions at the Bottom Instead of Profits at The Top

The War on Poverty Starts Off With A Tax Bill "To Make the Rich Richer"

The tax bill is a measure of the Administration's "unconditional war on poverty." The Senate tax debate was the logical place to begin the battle, but became the scene instead of an unconditional surrender to the rich. "The majority of our people," Gruening (D. Ala) told the Senate in the finishing stages Feb. 5, "having heard so long of, and waited so long for, tax relief, will wonder where it is. To paraphrase Winston Churchill, it might be said that never will so many have waited so long for so much and received so little. This will not be true of the affluent minority."

The day he spoke the New York Times reported that more American corporations made more money in 1963 than in any year in business history. The combined net income of 150 companies was up 11.0% from 1962; General Motors reported the largest profit ever made by a U.S. company, more than $1.5 billions. To pass a tax bill cutting corporate and high bracket income taxes in the face of such a record was a steal. That the labor movement went along only demonstrates the feeble fat in its leadership. Gruening called this a bill "to make the rich richer."

False Forecast and Fallacious Theory

The tax bill was predicated upon a false prediction and a fallacious theory. The prediction, 18 months ago, when the tax bill was launched, foresaw a recession in 1964. The bill was supposed to insure against this. But as Gore (D. Tenn) told the Senate Feb. 4, employment, production, profits and dividends are at an all-time high. The theory is that the way to deal with a recession and with the problem of the impoverished "lower fifth" of our society is to make business more profitable by tax cuts and special tax privileges. These are the remedies which have been applied since the tax revision of 1954. The result has been to speed up investment at public expense in labor saving devices—and add to unemployment. "Almost 1 million more people were employed in our factories 7 years ago," Gore told the Senate, "than are employed today."

The tax structure could be used in one of two ways to fight poverty. One would be not only to retain high tax rates on the record profits of U.S. industry but close the loopholes which make these rates illusory—and then spend the extra revenue on the special measures required to deal with the "lower fifth"—education, housing, slum clearance, better hospitals, retraining, and large scale public development of national slums like Appallachia.

Poets Need It More Than Oil Men

PROXMIRE (D. Wis.): The argument is made that the depletion allowance is necessary because this is a high risk industry. Is it not correct that Dun's Review shows that the construction industry has failures in the neighborhood of 86 per 10,000, the retail industry has failures of 400 per 10,000. . . . How many failures are there in the petroleum industry?

DOUGLAS (D., Ill.): Four out of every 10,000.

PROXMIRE: Four out of every ten thousand?

DOUGLAS: Yes. It is the lowest of any industrial group. It is one of the safest industries to go into. The ratio is 20 in food and 86 in construction, but only 4 in oil, gas, and mining. If these people claim we must give them a tax break, what are we going to do for the corner grocer? What about poets? Should not poetic genius have a depletion allowance? Should not there be a depletion allowance for defeated politicians? —In the Senate tax debate, Feb. 6.

The other way would be to raise individual income tax exemptions to end what Senator Gore called "the taxation of poverty." These exemptions are unfairly low. In 1940 a man and his wife had a personal exemption of $2,000. "Now the cost of living is more than twice as much as it was in 1940," Gore protested, "and the exemption is down to $1,200." He proposed to restore the $1,000 per person exemption as a substitute for the corporate and individual rate reductions in the tax bill. This would give real relief to the "lower fifth"—how do you raise a child nowadays on $600 a year?—and stimulate consumer buying.

This would raise the standard of living at the bottom of society instead of raising the rate of profit at the top. But Henry Ford 2nd and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce have not been campaigning for that kind of a tax cut. Gore's proposal was rejected on a voice vote. Then he suggested raising the tax exemption from $600 a year to $800. This was defeated 61-to-33 on a motion to table. But the idea of not taxing poverty should reverberate. Higher exemptions at the bottom plus repeal of excise taxes should be the target of labor and the progressives. This tax bill is a scandal, likely only to set off stock market speculation and inflation. Inflation in its turn will again tax the poor and fixed incomes for the benefit of great wealth. They get the poor coming and going.

From Medicine Hat to Dar-es-Salaam, When Anything Goes Wrong

"I had thought that the classic manifestation of humbug, the effort to merchandise our errors and omissions as the machinations of the Communists went out approximately with Harold Talbot. But . . . in the last few days, in the person of Castro, Communists have became responsible for everything that has gone wrong from Medicine Hat to Dar-es-Salaam.

"For years, diligent public servants have tried to do something about Panama. There they have encountered a backward social structure and the revelation of some American residents that they were another chosen people. Here at home, they have encountered the conviction that, unlike the repressive colonialism of the British or the French, our needs in other countries are sanctified both by high strategy and the peculiar charity of our hearts.

"Given these difficulties, there was much to forgive in the recent crisis. But the prompt and wonderfully reminiscent statement from the foreign policy establishment that it was mostly the fault of the Communists should have been greeted with public hilarity.

"We can all be persuaded that Fidelistas were around. We might even be willing to assume that there was a certified, registered, insured, prepaid, cooperative (and remarkably foresighted) plot. Even then the first thought of an American official should have been: 'Won't the American people ask who gave them their chance'?"

A Speech The Press Ignored: Warning Against Becoming "Policeman to The World"

Morse Declares That the Place for the Cyprus Issue Is In the UN

By Senator Wayne Morse *

The official American position that Cyprus is a NATO problem does not, in my opinion, withstand analysis. Cyprus is not a member of NATO. The only NATO problem there is the possibility of rising rivalry between Greece and Turkey as a result of the conflict. That is the only place where it can be said with any justification that NATO should deal with the issue and not the United Nations.

Other NATO Powers Reluctant

But even there, NATO consists of a lot more than just Britain and the United States. If any action is needed to keep Greece and Turkey from getting involved directly, that action should be taken by the entire North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and not by the United States and Britain acting in the guise of NATO. France has already made perfectly clear, as a member of NATO, that she will have none of it. Let the State Department tell the American people how many other NATO countries look with great reservation in regard to NATO intervention in Cyprus. The proper place for the Cypriot issue is in the United Nations. How can we condemn France and the Soviet Union for circumventing and ignoring the United Nations at their convenience, when we do the same thing?

I am at a loss to understand what the Under Secretary of State, Mr. Ball, is doing in London, much less flying to Cyprus for. It is perfectly obvious what the British want. They want the United States to pick up the check for the failure of the British Government in Cyprus. The British Government has been attempting to run out on its responsibilities in instance after instance, as its colonial policies go down the drain around the world, and looks to the United States to pick up the check.

I am alarmed at the policy of the Secretary of State, Mr. Rusk, and the Under Secretary of State, Mr. Ball, who are apparently laboring under the illusion that the United States can step in and take the place of all the former colonial powers in the trouble spots of the world. Of course, they will try to get American boys into Cyprus.

NATO is no longer what it is "cracked up" to be. In my judgment, NATO is rapidly becoming a great liability for the United States, and this move of the British is the latest in the attempt of some of our NATO allies who have not lived up to their NATO commitments to get the United States to assume a burden which is beyond all equity.

If we believe in the United Nations and call on other nations to respect it, we must believe in it and respect it ourselves. We are not doing that when we try to keep the Cyprus problem out of the U.N. We know what happened with regard to the attitude of France, Belgium, and the Soviet Union in regard to the Congo. They walked out on their obligations under the United Nations charter. I do not want to see my country make the same mistake.

If the United States allows itself to be made the policeman of the world, we are going to end up just as Great Britain ended up—dead broke.

Is Criticism of Bonn Verboten at NATO?

MR. WARBEY (Lab.) asked why the speech of M. Spaak at the NATO Council meeting last December had been classified as a secret document.

MR. MATHEW (Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs—Proceedings in the North Atlantic Council are confidential and all records of them are classified.

MR. WARBEY—At a press conference following the meeting the NATO press officer was very willing to give full accounts of speeches made by the Foreign Secretary and other Foreign Ministers, but refused to make any comment on the speech made by M. Spaak. Was this because M. Spaak expressed concern at the veto placed by the West German Government on an approach towards the Soviet Union to reach a peaceful settlement in Europe?

MR. MATHEW—I do not propose to be drawn into breaking this rule of confidence.

Sen. Pell's Plea for An End to Our Stale German Policy Reaches the SEP

"Since the late 1940's our policy on Germany has been frozen. We have insisted on early reunification through free elections. We have insisted that Communist East Germany does not exist. We have insisted that East Germany and East Berlin are the Soviet areas of a four-power military occupation, and that our rights are based on occupation agreements which are almost 20 years old. This policy simply does not fit the facts of today.

"We based our original support of a reunified Germany on the assumption that such a Germany would be neutral. If Germany were somehow to be reunified today, the result would be a military colossus. The very idea worries our West European allies and sends shivers up the spines of the East Europeans. It is high time for us to face the impossibility of a peacefully unified and armed Germany in the near future. Yet, these thoughts are rarely uttered in public. Why? Because, as so often happens in democracies, we become frozen into positions that relate more to the past than present. Any suggestion of a change sounds almost un-American.

"We should initiate policies which will not only improve conditions for all of Berlin and Germany but lead to a relaxing of tensions in central Europe. The most important single concession we must gain is absolute freedom of access to Berlin. Officially, we claim we already have these rights. But, as repeated crises on the highway show, they are constantly open to challenge. What I propose is that our rights of access be completely spelled out and that the main highway be declared an international territory subject to no controls of any kind.

"What can we offer in exchange? I believe we should offer to accept the Oder-Neisse boundary; for another, I believe we should grant de facto recognition to the Government of East Germany. Is this too much to offer in return for guarantees of a right we claim we already hold? I think not. We would simply be recognizing realities that presently exist."

—Sen. Claiborne Pell, (D. R.I.) "Berlin: Let's Stop Courting Disaster," Saturday Evening Post, Feb. 8 (abr.).

There Are Many Ways to Wear Down and Defeat A Filibuster

church bombings did last year in the House. One new title would tighten up the police brutality section of existing civil rights law, make communities and counties liable to suit for the actions of their officers and establish a new civil rights police to take the place of the FBI in this area of enforcement. The other title would tighten up voting provisions by making the orders of Federal registrars directly enforcible, giving the Civil Rights Commission power to issue cease-and-desist orders against interference with voting and empower the Commission to void elections where the right to vote of certified voters was denied. It would also provide for immediate steps to cut down the South's representation in Congress under the 2d section of the 14th Amendment.

Surprise Tactics Expected

The tactics on the floor are also likely to provide surprises. Mansfield, smarting under unfavorable comparisons between his leadership and Johnson's, has appointed four able and uncompromising Senators to manage the fight for the bill: Humphrey, Magnuson, Clark and Hart. Mansfield himself opened debate the first day with an eloquence which matched the great occasion. In his appeal for the Senate to act he said the fundamental issue raised by the bill "will involve all Americans and all the institutions, public and private, which hold us as a society of diversity in one nation, and it will involve all for a long time to come. In truth, it is a universal issue which, for this nation, having begun with the Declaration of Independence and persisted through the decades, will hardly dissolve in the Senate of the 88th Congress." The rhetoric was not too lofty for the first page of what we all hope will be a close-to-final chapter in the American Negro's struggle for full emancipation. But Mansfield's real test will be more arduous than the achievement of style. He must demonstrate a new militancy. There are many ways, short of round-the-clock sessions, by which a firm majority under tough leadership can hold the reins on a filibustering minority. And perhaps win the fight without resort to cloture, which might entail serious compromise. The rules are being studied as never before. A majority of 51 by the use of the motion to table, which is not debatable, can block time-consuming amendments. A skillful use of the "morning hour" can cut down the ambit of the filibuster. There are other, rarely used weapons, available to a presiding officer prepared to be strict and ruthless. Best of all, several months of old-fashioned white supremacist ranting from the Southern die-hards, blocking all other public business, and making the U.S. look foolish in the eyes of the world, may generate so derisive and impatient a storm from the country as to force cloture without compromise. The South knows itself defeated; it feels a new era is just around the corner. Men like Russell already belong to the past. They could not find a more graceful opportunity to lose than now, with a Southerner in the White House.

That's Jefferson Turning In His Grave

Two amendments to the Civil Rights bill which indicate how far we have drifted from the principles of a free society were accepted by the House. One would bar atheists and the other Communists from utilizing Title VII which guarantees equal employment opportunity. The Rev. Kenneth Marshall, a Unitarian Minister in Washington, was quick to point out in a sermon that the atheist amendment would have made second class citizens of Ben Franklin, Thomas Jefferson, Tom Paine, Robert Ingersoll, Thomas Edison and Albert Einstein, none of whom were religious in the conventional sense. Holifield (D. Cal) courageously opposed this amendment on the floor Feb. 8 and was supported by Rodino (D N.J.), Joelson (D. N.J.), Ryan (D. N.Y.) and Roberts (D. Tex.) but it passed 137-98 over the angry protest of Chairman Celler. It takes nerve nowadays to uphold the right to disbelieve in God. It takes even more nerve to uphold the right to be a Communist. When the companion amendment (by Colmer of Mississippi) to bar Communists from using the FEPC came up on Feb. 10 Celler cast doubt on its constitutionality but no one spoke against it. "If we oppose this amendment," Roosevelt (D. Cal) said bravely, "it would put you in company with Communists or pro-Communists. I do not think any member should be put in that light. I believe in the patriotism of every member of this House." A consistent belief in the First Amendment is by this standard unpatriotic. These provisions may yet be used against Negroes in those areas where militancy is easily equated with atheism and communism.

Special Issue on The MLF

Fresh Evidence Only The Germans Among Our NATO Allies Are Pressing for The MLF

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (R. Mich): I want to discuss with you this MLF requirement.

Secretary MC NAMARA: Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: You said yesterday that we had no urgent military requirement for this MLF and that we are not trying to sell it. Well, Mr. Secretary, if we are not trying to sell it, who is, because I haven't discovered anyone that wants it except perhaps the Germans.

Secretary MC NAMARA: Oh, the Germans are very, very much interested in it. . . .

Mr. RIVERS (D. S.C.): Now, about the multilateral force, we ran into this at NATO.

Secretary of the Navy NITZE: If the other European countries in sufficient number desire it, it is the Defense Department's view that we should support it.

Mr. RIVERS: You don't have much support and acceptance of it. The only people who wanted it were the Germans. They helped us defend it. . . .

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: Who is pushing it [MLF]?

Secretary NITZE: There is a very serious problem involved in the alliance. It revolves primarily around the Germans, but it involves other members of NATO as well, as to what the future relationship to strategic nuclear weapons will be. . . .

VOL. XII, NO. 9 MARCH 2, 1964 WASHINGTON, D. C. 15 CENTS

The Bogey of An Independent German Nuclear Deterrent

MLF are the initials of multi-lateral force. This is the proposal for a nuclear armada to be manned by mixed crews from the NATO nations under their joint control. MLF is presented as an effort to meet European demands for a greater voice in the use of the nuclear deterrent. It is supposed to be the symbol of "interdependence" between the United States and its NATO allies, to provide a closer military and political integration between them. Yet, even before they agree to this plan, we have declared it non-negotiable at the new Geneva disarmament talks where it has become a major obstacle to any new agreement.

WEU Turned MLF Down

In the past four months, there have been two occasions on which to test sentiment among our NATO allies on the MLF. The first was the Paris conference Nov. 7 of NATO parliamentarians, which is a kind of Atlantic Community Congress. Its military committee turned in a report calling MLF "wasteful" and "superfluous" while the political committee also rejected MLF. The "consensus" of the meeting as a whole was against MLF and "full support for the plan seems to have been confined to the American and German delegations" (The Times, London, Nov. 8). The second occasion was on Dec. 4 in the Assembly of the Western European Union, which speaks for the inner core of NATO in Europe —Britain, France, Germany, Belgium, Holland, Luxemburg and Italy. Here an attempt was made to put the WEU on record for MLF. The strongest speech in favor of it was by West Germany's Foreign Minister Schroeder who called it "one of the boldest and most fruitful initiatives of the free world" (Le Monde, Dec. 5). The attack was led by George Brown, deputy leader of the British Labor Party. He called it "a multi-lateral farce." On this occasion, "the first time that the MLF proposal has come to a direct vote in an international body" (The Times, London, Dec. 5), MLF lost. Yet we ignore these views and insist at Geneva that MLF is a must. This is a strange way to practice "interdependence."

The Official German View

"It was a wise decision on the part of the United States to propose to its European Allies the establishment of a nuclear force on a truly multilateral basis as regards the possession and control of nuclear weapons. This proposal has repeatedly been interpreted as an attempt to meet the German wish for participation in consultations and decisions on the use of nuclear weapons, but to refuse Germany the right of actually using such weapons under her own national responsibility. These comments are well known in Germany, but they reflect a very narrow outlook. The decisive aspect of the project for a Multilateral Force is the chance it offers to make the use of nuclear weapons a common Allied responsibility. . . . NATO must be capable of employing nuclear weapons under conditions where their use is not a sign of despair, but is governed by military and political considerations."

—Von Hassel, West Germany's Minister of Defense, deputy chairman of the Christian Democratic party, writing in Foreign Affairs quarterly, Jan. 1964.

The most interesting idea put forward by the new Johnson Administration at the outset of the Geneva talks was for a "freeze" on nuclear delivery systems. Essentially this asks the Russians to accept a position of inferiority in planes and missiles for the sake of putting a brake on the arms race. In this it resembles the limited nuclear test ban treaty, and rests like it on the view that "enough is enough," that the question of who is ahead in numbers of missiles or tests has lost much of its meaning when neither side can escape a devastating return blow from the other should either venture a first strike. The natural complements of a freeze on delivery systems would be an agreement against proliferation of nuclear weapons and an end to the production of more fissionable weapon material. But if we set up an MLF for NATO, the Russians may have to set up an MLF for the Warsaw Pact. As the power inferior in nuclear stockpiles and number of delivery systems, this could put them at a disadvantage if they were committed to freeze the production of both. Above all the MLF looks to the Russians (as it does to our reluctant Western allies) as the first move to put a German finger on NATO's strategic trigger, on weapons which could be used to threaten or make a direct attack on the Soviet Union.

Like That "BLF" in Cuba

These fears should not be too difficult for us to understand if we recall our own reaction a year ago when the Russians put what might be called a BLF, a bi-lateral force of some 40 medium range nuclear missiles in Cuba. We would have felt no less alarmed if these missiles, instead of being emplaced in Cuba, had been set up on a BLF force of submarines or surface vessels in the Caribbean. The MLF calls for a joint fleet of 25 ships with 8 Polaris each. The only difference in principle between the Russo-Cuban BLF and our MLF is that the Russians kept control of the warheads—there was no Cuban finger on the trigger—while the MLF is supposed to give the Germans a vote and a veto among the 15 NATO fingers on the MLF trigger. Indeed (see box below) they are asking us to give up our veto in return for some system of majority or "weighted" control in which the Germans, who are to put up 40% of the cost would have a correspondingly preponderant voice in running it. There is little doubt that most of our NATO allies would prefer to abandon the MLF for an agreement with the Soviets freezing the arms race in delivery systems and nuclear stockpiles, and putting a stop to the further spread of nuclear weapons.

Two related questions need to be disentangled to see MLF clearly. One is the problem of greater integration within NATO. The other is the problem of German access to strategic weapons. Many opponents of the MLF in NATO are for fuller discussion and consultation within the alliance. The problem of integration is at least as old as ancient Greece where the disparity in power between Athens and its allies (as between Sparta and its allies) tended to turn alliances into forms of empire. The tremendous power of nuclear weapons has given this problem new acuteness. The non-nuclear powers are as much satellites as allies; indeed NATO, like the Warsaw Pact, may be seen as a new form of imperialism. If we wish to ease this problem by consulting more fully with our allies and giving them a greater voice in the decisions which may mean life or death, this is no obstacle to world peace or to progress in disarmament. Indeed we might make more progress in this direction if we consulted all of them at this juncture instead of responding only to German wishes.

Prophetic Remark A Year Before The Missile Crisis

"Under no circumstances should the Federal Republic create the impression that it cherishes the ambition of becoming the 'decisive' military power of continental NATO. Even less permissible would be any move to acquire armament which in itself gave rise to the impression that Germany was claiming parity with the Soviet Union. No government of the Federal Republic should therefore demand that the Republic needs 'the same weapons as the Soviet Union.' It is plainly absurd for the Federal Republic, looking over its shoulder at the Soviet Union, to demand strategic mass destruction weapons. For the Federal Republic to be equipped with nuclear missiles capable of devastating Moscow or Leningrad would inevitably provoke the Soviet Union in just the same way as the supply of nuclear missiles to Cuba would provoke the United States."

—Defense or Retaliation: A German View, by Helmut Schmidt, leading military expert of the Social Democratic Party, in the Bundestag since 1953, where he is a member of Defense Committee. Praeger, 1962.

It is the other problem which spells trouble. It is this which must be examined. One way to start is with the familiar argument that unless some device like MLF gives the Germans a hand in a strategic nuclear striking force, the Germans will develop an independent deterrent of their own, as have the British and the French. But there are many reasons why such a course would be difficult and dangerous for the Germans. They have the technical capacity; they have the economic resources. But where would they test? Unlike the French and British they have no dependent areas in Africa or the Pacific. To test would be a violation of the test ban agreement which Bonn accepted so slowly and un-

Rusk's Evasive Reply to German Demand U.S. Relinquish Veto Over The MLF

"On the MLF, Defense Minister von Hassel said that in the beginning the other partners must concede the veto power of the American President. As soon as the MLF becomes a military reality, however, it should be able to persuade the American partner to give up his veto and to establish majority rule for the political and military use of this force. . . . 'We must show consideration for the French, who will never join this force if its effectiveness can be blunted by the veto of one state. Whether to have a veto or majority rule, will first come up for decision when this military instrument becomes a reality.'

"Von Hassel believes that the political worth of the MLF should be seen in the strong binding together of American and European interests. Until now the Atlantic Pact had excluded the nuclear type of mutual dependence. So NATO will be strengthened by the still tighter linking of America to Europe in an integrated nuclear politics. . . . 'Every speculation that the German side regards the MLF as a way of obtaining nuclear weapons for itself is completely misleading'. . . ."

—Interview at the close of the Ottawa NATO conference in the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung May 25, 1963, and summarized by the New York Times, May 28, 1963.

Q. Mr. Secretary, sir, the West German Defense Minister has been quoted as saying that while West Germany would go along at the outset with a veto on the use of a nuclear fleet, that eventually the fleet would not be militarily effective if the U.S. veto remains. What is the U.S. position on this view?

A. Well, I would not wish to comment on a partial report of an interview or statement made by a Minister that I have not myself seen. . . . Now, if Europe at some stage organizes itself and makes arrangements by which it makes its voice heard collectively in these matters, then we can take that question up. But, under present circumstances, I feel quite confident that in these nuclear matters, the U.S. must participate in the decisions.

—Secretary Rusk's Press Conference, May 29, 1963.

willingly. To produce nuclear weapons on German soil would be a violation of the pledge given by Adenauer in 1954, a pledge embodied in the Western European Treaty of that year and enforcible by its Arms Control Agency. The anger and alarm would be as great in Western as in Eastern Europe if Germany were to set out on this path; it would be seen that the Germans once again, as in 1914 on Belgium, were treating their treaty obligations as scraps of paper; it would be a signal that war was coming.

Again War on Two Fronts

Long before Germany could produce nuclear weapons in any significant amount, there would be time for East and West to draw together and stop the process. Germany would be faced again with the fatal error of its last two world wars —it would have to fight East and West. The balance of forces against her would be greater than before. Germany's only hope of getting nuclear weapons is to do so under cover of NATO, and her only hope of blackmailing the East into recovery of her 1937 frontiers is as the spearhead of a Western coalition in which Germany plays a dominant role.

From any other point of view MLF is as foolish for the Germans as for other West European peoples. If Germany fears that the U.S. veto and the nuclear stalemate have robbed the American deterrent of credibility, would the deterrent be any more credible if 14 other nations had the veto as well? If the U.S. might hesitate to destroy itself in a world convulsion because of some threat to Germany, is there any reason to believe that the British, the Belgians, the Dutch or the Danes would be any more ready to die for them? The MLF no more takes the place of an independent deterrent than NATO, but the price of such a deterrent would again be the isolation and defeat of Germany.

To Unify NATO Or Split It Apart?

"The other European countries that have agreed to participate [in MLF] . . . are more likely to do so to keep an eye on Germany than because of strategic convictions. . . . If the influence of West Germany in the MLF becomes too great, neutralism may grow in Britain, Scandinavia and the Low Countries. . . . It is in nobody's interest—least of all West Germany's—to set in motion events that can only end with suspicion and concern in most of the countries of the West. . . . A divided country, which in the space of 50 years has lost two wars, experienced three revolutions, suffered two periods of extreme inflation and the trauma of the Nazi era, should not—in its own interest—be placed in a position where, in addition to its inevitable exposure to Soviet pressure, it becomes the balance wheel of our Atlantic policy. We are encouraging tendencies we may later regret."

—Henry Kissinger in The Reporter, Mar. 28, 1963.

The German Socialist View Which Sees Disengagement As A Peaceful Solution

"The idea of easing the intractable situation in Central Europe by means of military readjustments and thereby making real progress toward the reunification of Germany was first put forward in 1952 by Dr. Pfleiderer, formerly an FDP [Free Democratic Party, a right-of-center big business party—IFS] representative in the Federal German Parliament and later German Ambassador to Belgrade. The idea attracted little notice at the time. . . . It was not until the Berlin Conference of 1954, when Sir Anthony Eden came out with the idea of a Central European zone of arms limitation and control that the idea first assumed international importance. . . . Eden later submitted a variant of his proposals to the Geneva Summit Conference of 1955. . . . When, two years later, the Russians seemed for the first time to be ready seriously to pursue these ideas, further consideration of them was obstructed by the Federal German Government. In the same year Hugh Gaitskell made a set of very far-reaching proposals . . . later worked out in detail by Denis Healey. These proposals related to Germany, Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Hungary. . . . They have also, after a lapse of time and with certain modifications become an ingredient of the German Social Democratic political platform. . . .

"In the autumn of 1957 the so-called Rapacki Plan was made known to the world. This at first confined itself to the creation of an atom-free zone in Central Europe. . . . The flat, uncompromising rejection of the Rapacki Plan and the refusal to contemplate any negotiations on proposals of a like nature must be regarded, even today, as a diplomatic failure on the part of the West. The German Social Democrats once again took up the idea of a zone of arms limitation and control early in 1959, and made it the subject of an independent and detailed presentation in November of the same year. . . . [calling for a nuclear free Central Europe with limited conventional armies but not conditioned on Germany leaving NATO or the Eastern States leaving the Warsaw Pact in the hope that easing tensions would pave the way for German unification—IFS].

"The military objections raised by the West against the ideas put forward hinge almost entirely on spatial requirements. Some people, for example, maintain that there would be too little room for NATO's strategic nuclear weapons to be adequately deployed or, alternatively, to be provided with sufficient area for forward protection. This objection smacks clearly of dilettantism; for, as far as Western Europe is concerned strategic nuclear weapons are stationed exclusively in the United Kingdom, and there is so far no intention of deploying them on the European Continent. The creation of a zone of control in Central Europe would not make the U.K.-based strategic weapons any more vulnerable than they are now. There is also no force in the general argument that NATO could not give up the 200-250 miles broad Federal Republic because the area available for maneuver would lose critically in depth. The Soviet Army stands today 60 miles from the Kiel Canal and 75 miles from Frankfurt. In future it would be 500-625 miles distant from these vital points; its tanks would not be stationed just across the Elbe but away to the east of the Vistula and the Bug.

"Whereas today the Soviet army need cross only one river in order to move forward into the Federal Republic, and whereas the exits from the Baltic are immediately exposed to attack by the Soviet ground forces, these would in future —together with the bases for their naval forces and seaborne troops—be stationed very much further to the east. The Soviet army would have, in the event of war, three major rivers to cross, at each of which it would be exposed to the full force of interdiction at the hands of the Allied tactical air forces and medium-range missiles. By contrast the troops of the other NATO powers stationed in the Federal Republic would have to cross only one extra river, the Rhine."

—Defense or Retaliation, by Helmut Schmidt, military expert of the German Social Democratic Party (Praeger 1962).

A Job Handling Liquor Is Hardly the Way to Cure An Alcoholic

worthlessness is underscored by the various forms it has taken. Norstadt's first proposal was for a missile force mounted on barges and trucks on constant patrol in Central Europe; then somebody thought of the revulsion which would occur if in West Germany, Europe's most crowded area, one of them were to blow up accidentally; Germany would go neutralist overnight in the wake of such a mishap. Then it was proposed to have a fleet of Polaris submarines until Admiral Rickover and his friends let it be known that there would be a bitter fight before Congress allowed the secrets of the Polaris submarine to be given out so freely. The present plan is for a 25-vessel surface fleet; this is a grisly joke on the Germans since all other fleets are going underwater. These ships would be easy to spot, track and destroy.

The Deliberate Use of Monster Weapons

The MLF makes sense only politically. If it can become a mechanism for a tighter alliance with America against Russia, it is worth the $5 billion or more Germany's Defense Minister von Hassel figures it will cost. The Germans want us to give up our veto in MLF once it is operational; they are to pay the largest share of the European contribution to its cost and expect to have commensurate power in it. It is in this light that one must read von Hassel's ominous words in Foreign Affairs last January (see box on p. 1). "The decisive aspect of the project for a Multilateral Force," he wrote, "is the chance it offers to make the use of nuclear weapons a common allied responsibility. . . . NATO must be capable of employing nuclear weapons under conditions where it is not a sign of despair, but is governed by military and political considerations." This means the use of these weapons not in "despair" as a last resort but for "military and political considerations," i.e. as bargaining counters for military and political aims. This, for the Germans, means to blackmail Russia into restoration of their 1937 borders. These are the dangerous games into which Germany's dominant Christian Democrats and militarists would draw us.

MLF runs counter to all the hopeful elements in the military policies associated with Kennedy and McNamara. The tighter command and control they built up to prevent accidental war would be undercut by this dispersion of weapons and responsibility. Their effort to enlarge conventional forces in order to draw back from the brink and prevent escalation would be hampered by MLF. The $5 billion it would cost for duplicate missile facilities on vulnerable vessels will draw funds from conventional arms—NATO's real military need. Nor does it fit into the Grand Design of seeking a world settlement with the USSR; on the contrary, the very idea is enough (as we can see at Geneva) to serve the German goal of blocking any arms agreement until the Reich has its hand on strategic nuclear weapons. Most ludicrous of all is the notion that MLF will keep the Germans from going off on a nuclear binge of their own. MLF would give the Germans their first chance for training in the use of strategic nuclear weapons, their first chance to play with these monsters. Whoever heard of curing an alcoholic by giving him a job in a liquor store?

The Ideal Solution for Germany

"The ideal situation would be a Germany strong enough to defend itself but not strong enough to attack, united so that its frustrations do not erupt into conflict and its divisions do not encourage the rivalry of its neighbors, but not so centralized that its discipline and capacity for rapid action evoke countermeasures in self-defense. Such a Germany has existed only at rare periods. To help establish it must be a major task of Western policy. . . .

"As long as Germany remains divided, the danger of an explosion exists, whatever the wishes of the chief protagonists. Measures to control armaments in Central Europe, to be effective, should therefore accompany a political settlement. The natural dividing line for arms control schemes is the Oder, not the Elbe. The two problems of German unity and arms control in Europe are thus closely related. Unification without a scheme for arms control will frighten all the states surrounding Germany. A European security system without German unification is either a palliative or it will magnify conflicts in Central Europe."

Why The Pope Kept Silent—From the State Dept's Diplomatic Records

"Mr. Harold H. Tittman, Ass't to the President's Personal Representative to Pope Pius XII, to the Secretary of State."

"The Holy See is still apparently convinced that a forthright denunciation by the Pope of Nazi atrocities, at least in so far as Poland is concerned, would only result in the violent deaths of more people. Mgr. Montini [then Papal Under Secretary of State, now Pope Paul VI] however stated to me that the time may come when, in spite of such a grievous prospect, the Holy Father will feel himself obliged to speak out. . . . Another motive, possibly the controlling one, behind the Pope's disinclination to denounce Nazi atrocities is his fear that if he does so now, the German people, in the bitterness of their defeat, will reproach him later on for having contributed, if only indirectly, to this defeat. It has been pointed out to me that just such an accusation was directed against the Holy See by the Germans after the last war, because of certain phrases spoken and attitudes adopted by Benedict XV while hostilities were in progress. When it is borne in mind that Pius XII had many years of conditioning in Germany,* it will not seem unnatural that he should be particularly sensible to this particular argument. Vatican City, Oct. 6, 1942."

—Pps. 776-7, Foreign Relations, 1942, Vol. III, published 1952, one of several documents which show U.S. Allied and neutral efforts to inform the Vatican about the "death factories" and to elicit some protest.

 "Pius XII, as Nuncio to Germany, had been assured by the German Catholic aristocracy that Hitler would 'end the peril of Bolshevism'. . . . Not even the murder of the Catholic Action leader, Klausener in 1934, was sufficient to disillusion him. He even showed mild disapproval of the Papal Encyclical of March 14, 1937, in which Pius XI accused Hitler of breaking faith with the concordat, and on the day of his coronation, on March 12, 1939, urged 'patience and moderation' in the Vatican's dealings with Hitler."

VOL. XII, NO. 10 MARCH 9, 1964 101 WASHINGTON, D. C. 15 CENTS

What Some People Have Forgotten About God's "Deputy"

One of the elements missing in Rolf Hochhuth's play "The Deputy" and in comment upon it is recognition of the crucial role played by the Vatican in the rise of Fascism. The Vatican opposed modern liberalism from its very inception. It denounced Marxism, whether democratic or totalitarian. But everywhere it welcomed Fascism—in Italy, in Germany, in Spain, in Austria, in Slovakia and in Hungary. Many commentators have contrasted Pius XII, the central figure in Hochhuth's play, with his predecessor, Pius XI. But Pius XII, in being friendly to Hitler, was only following in the footsteps of Pius XI. Mussolini's seizure of power in Italy could have been blocked if the powerful Catholic Popular Party, and its priestly leader, Don Luigi Sturzo, had been allowed to follow the policy now being applied by Italy's Christian Democrats. An "opening to the left" which united the Popular Party with the Socialists and the Liberals against Fascismo, would have choked off this pestilence at the start.

Twin Pacts With The Devil

But Pius XI decided otherwise. He disliked Don Luigi and his party, which had won a following among the peasantry by its advocacy of land reform. He joined the industrialists and the army officers who, like their counterparts a decade later in Germany, saw Fascism as a protection for property rights against the clamor for social reform. The Popular Party was dissolved and Don Luigi driven into exile. In Italy, as in Germany, Catholic anti-Fascists were sacrificed for a concordant with the dictatorships. These pacts with the devil lent first Il Duce and then Der Fuehrer a cloak of Catholic approval when they most needed it. The March on Rome which Pius XI facilitated was the first step toward Auschwitz which Pius XII never condemned. The louts and paranoids Mussolini marshalled for his coup were the same type who later stoked the human furnaces for Hitler with Jews, gypsies and Slavs too weak to work for Krupp and I. G. Farben. More than the sin of silence lies on the consciences of God's "deputies." They were accessories in the creation of these criminal regimes.

Christian Anti-Nazis Abandoned, Too

"Clergy and laymen, priests and men of political life, who ventured to think and practice resistance, could count on the sympathy of their church leaders, neither in prison nor on the scaffold."

—Friedrich Heer, German Catholic historian, in his book, Die Deutschen, der Nationalsozialismus und die Gegenwart, quoted by Rolf Hochhuth in the appendix to his play The Deputy, p. 305 (Grove Press).

A second element has to do with Allied policy. While the Allies were pressing Pius XII to condemn Nazi atrocities against the Jews for its propaganda value, they were far from whole-hearted about saving the victims. I remember as a young newspaperman the coldness one encountered in the State Department on the subject of refugees and the inhumanity with which the British turned away from Palestine boatloads of Jews fleeing from Hitler's ovens; two, the Struma and the Patria, sank with their human cargoes. Last October 12, the State Department released a volume of diplomatic papers from the year 1943 (Vol. I: General) in which two painful stories are disclosed. One (at p. 134) is a British Embassy memorandum expressing fear lest the Germans "change over from the policy of extermination to one of extrusion, and aim as they did before the war at embarrassing

"Peace" Senators Limit Selves to Defense of McNamara Against Bomber Lobby

Few Speak and None Vote "No" As Congress Rubber Stamps Huge Arms Bill

Not a single member of Congress voted against the $17 billion weapons procurement authorization bill for 1965. It passed House and Senate last week after five hours debate in which only a handful participated. Attacking Secretary McNamara's cost-effectiveness program apparently required the privileged sanctuary of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the Council of State Chambers of Commerce, which offered plans for cutting the bill $1 billion and $1.4 billion respectively.

Nelson's Lone Protest

The small group of pro-disarmament Senators confined themselves this year to the safe position of defending the Secretary of Defense against the aviation lobby. But Sen. McGovern suggested he "may have some amendments" to the appropriation bill. Genuine dissent was limited to Senator Nelson's (D. Wis) eloquent protest against rubber-stamping the largest procurement bill ever when there is now no question about the capacity of both the United States and the Soviet Union for mutual destruction. Protesting that testimony on the bill had not even been printed before the debate, he questioned "what is apparently an established tradition—perhaps a national attitude—which holds that a bill to spend billions for the machinery of war must be rushed through the House and Senate in a matter of hours, while a treaty to advance the cause of peace, or a bill to guarantee the rights of all our citizens must be . . . thrashed over for weeks and perhaps months."

Debate in both Houses over whether to authorize an unrequested $52 million for bomber research revealed a new approach to defense spending which would maintain high budgets despite Rep. Vinson's statement that "we are coming up pretty close to our total needs." This would have us build weapon systems which have no rational purpose other than to force the Soviets to divert their more limited resources into building defensive counterparts. Thus Chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee Russell said, "If we eliminate the bomber and let the Russians devote all their resources to defend against missiles, they are sure to develop such a defense more rapidly than they would if they had to prepare two defensive systems . . . (whereas) we can afford to develop the two weapon systems and, at the same time, work on defenses against theirs." The U.S. at Geneva is trying to sell the idea of a bonfire for obsolete bombers. If the aviation lobby has its way, there will be plenty to burn.

Four Anti-Militarist Films

It is a pleasure to report that four—no less—films are now playing in Washington which attack the military and militarism. We recommend each of them highly. One is a savage satire on the nuclear age, "Dr. Strangelove, or How I Learned to Stop Worrying and Love the Bomb." Stanley Kubrick deserves a Nobel prize for it. The second is the superbly played "Seven Days in May"—the gifted Rod Serling has made a first rate movie script of a second rate book. Civics teachers anxious to explain the meaning of civilian supremacy in the U.S. Constitution could make no firmer impression than to take their classes to this movie. The third is "The Man in The Middle," the story of an attempt by the high brass to fix a court martial. The fourth is "The Victors" a film by Carl Foreman worthy to stand beside his "High Noon." Its final scene, a drunken knife fight between a U.S. and Soviet soldier in the ruins of Berlin is symbolic of the poisonous and suicidal cold war brewed by the Germans in the moment of their defeat. P.S. for Soviet readers: Paste this item on a postcard and send it to Marshal Malinovsky who, like the Pentagon, has been objecting to anti-war and anti-militarist literature and films. Capitalist or Communist, brass hats are alike.

The Games Our Military Play with Congress at Budget Time

"This amendment will be aimed at that part of the Navy procurement called the VAL aircraft. You will find the VAL explained on page 11 of the committee report. Anyone with the temerity to point out that the three-line explanation there comes to about $60 million a line will be met with the argument that the details are secret. To those of you who may feel slighted, I want to say to you that you are not missing a thing. I want to assure you further that the more you study this particular procurement the more firmly you will be convinced of the need for secrecy, not to protect the details of the program from the terrible Communists, but to keep the details from our taxpaying constituents.

"The VAL is a new attack aircraft for the Navy. The Navy called it a modification of an existing aircraft. It was just a tiny little modification—consisting of a new engine, fuselage, wings and avionics. If this can be done by reprogramming, the Navy can reprogram a barge into a battleship or a carrier into a catamaran.

"Why did they do it by reprogramming? Because, they said time was of the essence. So important was time that they waited from November until February before announcing that this little old $2 billion program was heading deep into the heart of Dallas. Everyone in the aircraft industry knew it was heading for Dallas back in December, but the Navy played games with Congress.

"[Now] to the merits of this aircraft. Today the Navy is producing one interceptor and preparing to produce another, but [it says] it needs a new attack plane [VAL]. The Air Force is producing one attack plane [A-6A] and preparing to produce another. And one amazing thing about it all is that the interceptor the Navy is producing and the attack plane the Air Force is now producing are the same plane. Another amazing thing is that the TFX which the Navy calls an interceptor and the F-111 which the Air Force calls an attack plane will also be the same plane.

"The VAL is designed to keep some production lines which were to close down this summer in operation. What will this magnificent new aircraft do? I quote from Admiral Thach, page 7319 of the hearings:

"QUESTION: Can you tell me any mission which your new VAL can accomplish that the A-6A cannot?

"Admiral THACH: No, sir.

"QUESTION: Is it not also true that the A-6A can accomplish a great many missions which the VAL cannot?

"Admiral THACH: That is also true, sir.

"This is a brand new $2 billion program, illegitimately conceived and dedicated to the proposition that the Members of Congress will vote for any military program because they would rather be called soft in the head than soft on communism."

—Rep. Pike (D. N.Y.), defense debate, Feb. 20 (abridged)

We Need Those Lie Detectors In Washington More Than in Saigon

The Most Hopeful News of the Week: LBJ (and Russell) on Civil Rights

The most encouraging news of the week was President Johnson's forthright endorsement at press conference of the civil rights bill as passed by the House and the defeatist tone of Senator Russell's appearance on CBS "Face The Nation" next day. Russell's admission that Johnson can nevertheless carry Georgia and his complaint that "brain-washing" has brought about increased support for civil rights in his State indicate that while the white supremacist Old Guard may not surrender it knows itself defeated.

The President's press conference, the first of its kind in his career as a political leader, went off well and should cure him of his nervousness about facing the press. His English was good (we were guilty of unfairness and intellectual snobbery a few weeks back in a slighting smart-aleck reference to his prose style). His conciliatory remarks about Panama, his tamping down of alarmist speculation about Vietnam and his remarks about world peace were encouraging.

Less Hopeful Indicators

One could breathe more easily, however, if it were not for less hopeful indicators behind the scenes. It was the White House itself which stimulated press reports that an extension of the war to North Vietnam was under contemplation. Johnson's hand-picked coordinator for Latin affairs, Tom Mann, in private speaks a very different language from that which the President used at press conference about Panama. Mann expresses "tough guy" views more suitable to the era of "dollar diplomacy" than to contemporary Latin America. He is arrogant and simple-minded—the kind of American diplomat who feeds stereotypes about Yanqui Imperialism. So will Johnson if he lets the Commerce Department go through with the plan to interfere with lard shipments to Cuba. We have made a big show of humanitarianism in exempting food and medicine hitherto from our embargo.

At his press conference, as in almost every speech he has made, Mr. Johnson emphasized the awful power a President now has to "destroy 100 million people in a matter of minutes" and added "our opponents can do likewise." He said simply, "I don't think the people of the world want that to happen and I think we are going to do everything that we can to avoid its happening." * But a recognition of the brink on which mankind stands requires more than caution in our bipolar relations with Moscow. It also requires a new flexibility and a new magnanimity in areas where we continue to impose suffering on native populations (as in Vietnam and Cuba in frustrated stubborness.

Almost as an afterthought, in his press conference of February 27, Secretary of State Rusk let slip the truth about Vietnam when he said "no miracle in the North is going to suddenly transform or eliminate the problem in South Vietnam." But if the war in South Vietnam is simply a case of aggression from the North, an effort to impose Communism on a helpless people "struggling for its freedom" (our official mythology), then of course a miraculous shift in the North would solve the problem. Rusk's remark implies that the problem is local, deep-seated and not to be solved from outside. This contradicts all that he and McNamara and the White House have been saying about the war for three years. There are reports from Saigon that we are going to use lie detectors on the prisoners we capture there. A pity we cannot use those lie detectors on our own top officials at home. Do they really believe what they continue to tell us?

 It is indicative that it was a Polish reporter, the able Zygmunt Broniarek of Trybuna Ludu who elicited this statement from the President and that the U.S. press paid so little attention to the answer.

The Phantoms That Bedevil Peace

"New Communist advances in Laos that brought a strong U.S. protest on Friday, were touched on only briefly in the news conference. . . . Informed sources, however, said nothing very encouraging about Laos came out of talks held in Moscow Friday between Ambassador Kohler and Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko."

—Washington Post Mar. 1 on Johnson press conference

"Vietiane, Laos, Feb. 29 — A neutralist military spokesman said today that a neutralist reconnaissance company dispatched to Phou Khe Mt. found no trace of reported units of Pathet Lao or North Viet Minh. . . . It was on the basis of these reports that the U.S. charged on Friday that the Communists had committed a 'flagrant' violation of Laotian neutrality."

—Same paper, same day, same page

"A right-wing military spokesman said Thursday . . . that six North Vietnamese battalions had taken part in the assault, though most military observers here were skeptical of the report. . . . Neutralist officers have been critical lately of what they consider highly exaggerated right wing reports of North Vietnamese participation in Laotian fighting. They have also indicated a belief that the right wing troops had fled their positions at Phou Khe before any infantry assault had been launched."

—New York Times from Vietiane, same day.

The Senate's Clearest Voice for Common Sense in Vietnam

"It is apparently France's purpose to work for a diplomatic rather than a military solution to the problems of the peninsula once known as Indochina . . . we should not spurn the participation. France has advantages here we do not have. Language, culture, and capital are hers. She could make good use of these advantages. . . . Our policy should be flexible enough to allow, even to encourage such exploration.

"Our policies need reevaluation, and central to this reevaluation is the defusing of Red China as a domestic policy issue. We must be able to discuss Red China as we discuss other nations, Communist or free.

"France is now attempting to draw the Chinese Communists to something closer to normal diplomatic relations. If this serves to better the exchange of information on attitudes and policy, then this will be to the benefit of all. . . . If we are to have anything like a peaceful resolution of southeast Asia, China must be party to the resolution."

—Bartlett (D. Alaska) in the Senate, Feb. 19.

Apparently Some British Officials Feared Too Many Jews Might Be Saved

other countries by flooding them with alien immigrants." Milton Friedman of Jewish Telegraphic Agency, the only Washington correspondent who paid attention to these documents, commented "It would appear the concern existed 20 years ago in some high places that too many Jews might escape from Hitler and burden the democracies with their presence."

Neither Jewish Gospel Helped

His Majesty's Government in the same memorandum said it was ready to take 4500 Jewish children and 300 women from Bulgaria but could not accept adult males from enemy occupied countries in Palestine owing to "the acute security problem" and the White Paper of 1939, which severely restricted Jewish immigration to the Holy Land lest this antagonize the Arabs. The British were not alone in this kind of thinking. The same volume at p. 296 contains a memorandum from the U.S. Chiefs of Staff objecting to a plan to move 4500 refugees from Spain to camps in North Africa lest this "cause resentment on the part of the Arab population." From a Jewish point of view, it was not the Pope alone who failed the test of conscience. Neither the Gospel of Jesus nor the Gospel of Marx prevented their highest respective spokesmen from making pacts with Hitler. In all the great capitals, political expedience came before humanity. The whole bitter story still feeds Jewish nationalism. When our people were thrown to the furnaces, few really cared.

It helps to heal our hearts that a young German should have written "The Deputy." It is also a good sign that the play should have aroused such animosity—like a painful memory dragged unwillingly from the subconscious of a whole generation. The protest and the shame indicate that under the hypocrisy and the cant there lives on a concern for human and moral values. The crematoriums should not be forgotten. That one set of human beings could do this to another set condemns our whole species. There are savages within us against whom we must be on guard. The excuses of race and statecraft that are used to justify murder, and silence about it, now threaten the entire human race with a "final solution."

This Alone Will Posterity Remember

"It could harshly be said: It was not the highest duty of the Pope to rescue Jews. The Pope can't save everybody. But it was his duty to keep Christendom in a literal sense from going to the devil: that in the middle of his West, Christians should do Satan's work, with which not only Germany but all Christendom will be forever stained. Posterity will over and over again look at this Pope and wonder about his silence. . . . Just as one can already see that of the whole history of Hitler and the Second World War, only two words will remain in the memory of mankind—Auschwitz and Hiroshima—so one also feels that of Pius XII there will survive only the memory of his silence."

—Sebastion Haffner, writing of The Deputy in the German illustrated weekly, Stern, April 7, 1963, quoted at p. 235 of Summa Iniuria oder Durfte der Papst Schweigen? (Rowohlt) a collection of German articles about Hochhuth's play.

For the play as presented in New York, Herman Shumlin deserves a high mark for courage, a lesser one for artistry. His version is an oversimplified and sometimes vulgarized shadow of the original. Gerstein, Jacobson and Fontana are all debased from Hochhuth's original conception. In the original, the SS man, Gerstein, who tried to help the Jews, was not a hysteric. Jacobson, the Jew hiding out in his apartment, was not the vulgar creature in Jerome Rothenberg's adaptation. Fontana, the young Jesuit who goes to Auschwitz in protest, is also diminished in the New York version. But Emlyn Williams is magnificent as the Pope. Severely shortened, the play as produced also focuses too narrowly on the moral responsibility of the Pope while Hochhuth's original brings the German people into the full orbit of guilt. But to see the play is still an experience we recommend as a moral and political duty, though the play in book form (excellently translated by Richard and Clara Winston for Grove Press) is essential to grasp the author's full design and memorable intention. It is Hochhuth's achievement so painfully to have twisted the conscience of the Church and the world.

Carry The Fight to North Vietnam? Hard Enough to Make Them Fight in The South

"Recent talk about sending South Vietnamese raiding parties into Communist North Vietnam is shrugged off by veteran U.S. advisers here. 'We have trouble enough getting the troops to fight in the south,' says one. 'What makes the Pentagon think they will do any better up north.' . . . In one typical week last week the U.S. military headquarters here tallied 2,800 actions by small government patrols. But only 3% of these made any contact with the enemy. . . . One day last month an L-D spotter plane reported seeing a band of guerrillas. A South Vietnamese army unit was nearby, and a U.S. adviser urged it to close in on the Reds. Instead the Vietnamese commander called for rocket-firing U.S. Army helicopters. Five of the aircraft, each valued at $250,000, were sent in to do battle with at most a half dozen enemy soldiers."

When A Nation's Leaders Fear to Tell the Truth

What McNamara's Computers Miss

"Most of the Vietnamese do not really care about the war; most of them do not want to fight. Under the circumstances this is understandable. There are numerous families in Vietnam without homes, and without a job. Even in Saigon there are people sleeping in doorways and on the sidewalks and begging for food. . . . In combat, when the Vietnamese do have a chance to fire on the Vietcong, quite often they refuse.

"There are some people who are profiting from this war. I have never seen so many colonels and generals in one place in all my life. They are living here at government expense, in beautiful villas with two or three servants per household. I have talked to so many who do not even want to go home because they could not afford such luxuries at home."

—Letter from the wife of a serviceman in Vietnam to Senator Young (D. Ohio) Con. Rec. Mar. 3.

Our emissary to Saigon, Secretary McNamara, seems to be as confused as he is confusing on the subject of the war in Vietnam. In January he made a statement which led people to believe that the U.S. was committed to total victory at any cost in that area. In his annual military posture statement Jan. 27 to House Armed Services Committee he said "the survival of an independent government in South Vietnam is so important to the security of all southeast Asia and to the free world that I can conceive of no alternative other than to take all necessary measures within our capability to prevent a Communist victory." This led many to believe that the U.S. was ready to extend the war in order to win.

Our "Options" Seen as Dangerous

But under questioning by the committee in closed session, he took a very different position. Unfortunately this was not released until Feb. 18 and was buried in more than 1,000 pages of testimony. The first time the matter came up was when Congressman Stratton (D. N.Y.) asked him, "Wouldn't you say that in the event that things do not go as well as you hope they will, that unquestionably we can't continue to withdraw any more of our forces?" This elicited a surprising answer. "No, sir; I would not," McNamara replied, "I don't believe that we as a nation should assume the primary responsibility for the war in South Vietnam. It is a counter-guerrilla war, it is a war that can only be won by the Vietnamese themselves." When Congressman Cohelan (D. Cal.) said he wanted to be sure "we are very conscious of other options that we might have to exercise if things were not going quite the way we want it," the Secretary answered, "It is the unsatisfactory character of most of those other options that leads me personally to conclude we should continue our program in South Vietnam." Among the other "options" of course is to widen the war by an attack on North Vietnam which might bring the Chinese in.

Later Congressman Pike (D. N.Y.) said he was "concerned with what I think to be a conflict between what we say about the importance of this area and what we actually propose to do about it." McNamara replied, "Well, I think they are in agreement and it goes back to the point I made earlier, that only the Vietnamese can win this war." He said it wasn't "artillery shells but the confidence of the peasants" that would "ultimately determine the outcome of the war" and he added that "doubling our military aid would not, in my opinion, substantially increase the effectiveness of their military operations." The question was raised again and elicited an even clearer answer later in these closed hearings:

Mr. LONG (D. Md.): If the Vietnamese war goes very badly, do you contemplate another Korean war from our point of view, our pouring in hundreds of thousands of troops?

Secretary McNAMARA: No, sir.

Mr. LONG: You mentioned before that this is an area we must hold at all costs?

Secretary McNAMARA: I don't believe that pouring in hundreds of thousands of troops is the solution to the problem in Vietnam.

These answers were supplemented by an even more sober reply from Army Chief of Staff General Wheeler to Mr. Becker (R. N.Y.). "It would seem to me," Mr. Becker said, "that in South Vietnam, and through North Vietnam and these other areas they [the Chinese] can keep sending them in for years (italics added), and eventually the South Vietnamese, no matter how much they may desire to save their own country, eventually are going to be weakened to the point where they can no longer do it." The basic fallacy

$300,000 Appropriation Moved to Floor Without Advance Warning to Avoid Debate

House Leadership Pulls A Fast One to Help the Un-Americans

In a surprise move that caught every abolitionist but one outside the chamber, the House March 4 authorized a whopping $300,000 for its Un-American Activities Committee. The authorizing resolution, $60,000 less than last year's, was brought to the floor only one hour after the Committee on House Administration had approved it. James Roosevelt (D. Cal.) inquired if "it was necessary to shroud this matter in such secrecy . . . because some Members may be ashamed of it." Whatever the reason, trickery of this kind is predictable and the liberals should have been prepared for it.

Burton Blocks Unanimous Consent

The measure would have passed by unanimous consent had it not been for the objection of freshman Congressman Phillip Burton (D. Cal.). This was a fitting congressional debut for Burton. For eight years as a California State legislator he defended civil liberties against loyalty oaths and witch hunts. Last month, running against seven other candidates, he won his congressional seat by a majority of votes on a platform that included medicare for all citizens, conversion from defense to public works, trade with Red China, and abolition of HUAC. His San Francisco district with 15% unemployed is one of the most depressed urban areas in the country. Is Burton the first of many dissident voices that automation will bring to Congress?

Two fine anti-HUAC speeches, one by Ryan (D. N.Y.) and one by Farbstein (D. N.Y.), also helped to redeem the liberals. Ryan deflated the committee with ridicule. He said only twenty-six of the almost 10,000 public bills introduced into the House last year were referred to the committee and yet it maintained a 61-member staff, the third largest in the House. Eleven of the twenty-six bills have been around for years. In its 26-year history the committee has been responsible for only three laws, including one to correct an error it made in writing the Internal Security Act.

The committee's main event in 1963 was to investigate travel to Cuba and pro-Castro activities in the United States. Hearings ran for more than six months, included forty-two witnesses and produced four publications totaling 632 pages. Ryan pointed out that when the chairman finally introduced a bill to ban travel to specific countries, it was appropriately referred to another committee, Judiciary.

When Injustice Is Not Unjust

In the Yellin case last year the Supreme Court for the first time reversed a conviction for contempt of the Un-American Activities Committee on the ground that it had failed to abide by its Rule IV which provides for executive sessions where a public hearing might "unjustly" injure the reputation of a witness. Judge Luther W. Youngdahl followed Yellin last week in reversing the contempt conviction of Bernard Silber who, like Yellin, had asked a private hearing. In reversing the contempt conviction of Frank Grumman, the Judge went a step further. Grumman had made no request for a private hearing before being called in public. Judge Youngdahl put the burden on the Committee to obey its own rules. He cited as an "improper" standard testimony by Richard Arens, then its staff director, to the effect that if the Committee knew a witness would be unfriendly it called him in public because then any injury to his reputation would not be "unjust"! Both Silber and Grumman were members of the American Communications Association.

However easy to ridicule, the committee remains a powerful instrument in the hands of racists and cold warriors. In the New York Times Feb. 17, Claude Sitton reported that the committee's files were being used to intimidate white integrationists in Alabama. This isn't the first time denial of civil liberties has been used against civil rights. In 1958 Chairman Walter took his red-hunters to Atlanta to slander white radicals and liberals active in the Negro cause.

Itself sustained by the cold war, the committee speaks for those who oppose peaceful accommodation and villify all who seek it. Rep. Farbstein recalled the letter the committee circulated among Senators during the test ban debate. The committee, referring to the lobbying activities of Women Strike for Peace, wrote that "excessive concern with peace . . . prevents adequate defense, hinders effective diplomacy, undermines the will to resist and saps national strength." Farbstein warned that if we are "to avoid a perilous future . . . we cannot cheaply dismiss any individual or any group of citizens by a slur on their motives." It remains the committee's one virtue to reveal more clearly than any critic the distance between us and a wholly free society.

Keating Protests Eastland's Seizure of Southern Conference Records

"I understand that the records of the Southern Conference Educational Fund, Inc., were subpoenaed October 5 at your discretion. I understand further that they were transferred to Mississippi October 27, ten days after a request by officials of the SCEF in the Louisiana Criminal District Court for a permanent injunction to bar removal of these records from the area.

"I further understand that on November 14 some members of the Internal Security Subcommittee approved a resolution to incorporate portions of this material by reference into the hearing record and to photostat it in full before returning it. That resolution was not brought to my attention until my staff specifically inquired January 27.

"I would therefore like to take this occasion to express my deep concern over the action taken. First, I question what federal legislative purpose is served by the subpoenaing of material already under review by a committee of a state legislature. Secondly, I am very much opposed to the subpoena of any records that are material to pending litigation in a state court. This strikes me as a startling violation of states' as well as individual rights.

"Thirdly, I am disturbed that, although a member of the subcommittee which has, in effect, ratified this action, I was not informed of this action or given any opportunity to express my dissent.

"Regardless of the nature of the group involved in this case, I believe the action taken by the subcommittee is most unfortunate and I strongly urge that no further actions be undertaken by the committee along these or similar lines without full discussion by the entire subcommittee."

—Letter from Sen. Keating (R. N.Y.) to Sen. Eastland (D. Miss.), Chairman of Senate Judiciary Committee.

One Day After Rusk's Secret Briefing on Vietnam, Morse Discloses Danger Ahead

An Expanded War in Asia Could Only Be Won If We Used Nuclear Arms

By Senator Wayne Morse *

When one looks at a map, and at the central position China occupies in relation to all the countries which frame the Indian Ocean, the China Sea and the Pacific Ocean, it is evident that it is China that is going to dominate Asia whether the United States likes it or not, and no matter what we choose to do about it.

As I said to the Secretary of State in the Foreign Relations Committee yesterday, those troops [in Vietnam] should be brought home. They never should have been sent there in the first place. American unilateral participation in the war of South Vietnam cannot be justified, and will not be justified in American history. As I have made clear to the State Department, this administration had better be warned now that when the casualty lists of American boys in South Vietnam increase until the mothers and fathers of those boys start crying "Murder," no administration will stand.

Southeast Asia Not Essential To Our Defense

We must keep in mind the fact that we have always considered southeast Asia to be beyond the perimeter of U.S. defense. Southeast Asia is not essential to U.S. defense.

China is the whole interior of the world's largest land mass. We are interested in preserving its fringes as U.S. footholds. That is as futile an effort as this country will ever embark upon. The concept of the Pacific as an American lake was possible only at the close of World War II when Japan lay temporarily prostrate.

It is not beyond the realm of possibility that China will embark upon the kind of aggression that Imperial Japan embarked on in the 1930's and 1940's, futilely seeking an outlet for her population and for her ideological designs. But that is a contingency that the United States cannot possibly prevent with foreign aid programs, military missions, by "showing the flag" with a few ships or even 15,000 troops.

I am completely opposed to increasing the scale of our participation in the Vietnamese war. I am opposed to it because American involvement in any Asian conflict is going to be nuclear involvement. I am satisfied that there is no other way this country could meet the manpower and geographic advantages that a Chinese-backed force would have. I am permitted to say, within the bounds of secrecy and in my capacity as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee who individually has passed a judgment upon American foreign policy in Asia, that we cannot win a land war in Asia with American conventional ground forces. (Italics added.) That is fully recognized by outstanding military experts.

New Policy Needed for A New World

"The world has moved beyond World War II. It is beginning to move beyond the cold war. When are the foreign and military policies of the United States going to move beyond World War II and the cold war? When will the United States develop a foreign and defense policy that will recognize that every event everywhere is not vital to us, and that even if it were, we could not put out enough money and manpower to control all these events?

"That is the foreign policy challenge that faces this administration. It is a challenge for a post-cold war, missile age international policy. It must take into account the breakup of the two dominant world blocs, and the technological changes that have bypassed the need for far-flung bases of the kind that were once needed to carry conventional war to two continents outside the Western Hemisphere."

—Morse (D. Ore.) in the Senate, Mar. 4 (abridged).

I listened yesterday to a briefing by the Secretary of State, which gave rise to this speech today. I say to the American people they have a right to a clarification of American foreign policy in Asia. They have a right to know what the plans of this government are in respect to Vietnam.

I am satisfied that this country would make the gravest mistake of its history by carrying a war, nuclear or otherwise, onto the mainland of Asia. What we might do if we were attacked was answered in World War II; but today we have not been attacked by any Asian country. Our responsibilities toward South Vietnam are no more than those of every other member of the South East Asia Treaty Organization. What joint policy has been worked out with these SEATO members for action in Vietnam? None.

The South Vietnamese government toward which we have exercised these unilateral policies is little more than our own creation. We constructed a government there in 1954, which we then propped up with huge amounts of aid and which we say invited American troops. The rationalization that our Government gives for American troops being in South Vietnam is that the South Vietnam government invited them in. But control of the South Vietnam government has been passed around within the American-financed governing clique until its association with U.S. support is closer than its association with the people of Vietnam.

 Abridged from a speech in the U.S. Senate March 4 which the press largely ignored.

India and Pakistan Only Taking U.S. Military Aid to War on Each Other

"CENTO does not exist for all practical political purposes, and Pakistan has belonged to it for only one reason —the U.S. aid she could get out of it. I have come to the conclusion that there never was a time when Pakistan would have fulfilled her CENTO obligations vis-a-vis Russia. And even the most obtuse must realize by now that Pakistan's membership in SEATO is rendered totally meaningless by her close ties with China.

"Pakistan has belonged to those organizations for one purpose only—to get military aid from the United States that would build her forces against her one avowed enemy —India. Not only does the United States not have any quarrel with India, but we have recently undertaken an expanded military aid program to India, which I believe is a mistake equal only to our heavy aid to Pakistan.

"India and Pakistan will string along American military men and AID officials to keep them happy, to keep guns and money coming, but they are going to put our aid to work strictly for their own purposes and not for ours."

—Morse (D. Ore.) in the Senate, Mar. 4 (abridged).

So Long As Rusk and McNamara Continue to Propagate Delusions

here lies in the words we have italicized. It is that the South Vietnamese war is an invasion, somehow run by the Chinese, when it is actually a rebellion by the South Vietnamese themselves. This was implicit in General Wheeler's reply:

> If we can ever get the Government leaders of South Vietnam in control of their territory and their own people —that is if the Government leaders identify themselves to the people as being the protectors of the population, advancing their interests politically, economically, sociologically and every other way—there won't be any way for the enemy to infiltrate, because guerrillas have to live among the people. Guerrillas can't survive unless the people hide them. Mao Tse-tung has a thesis that goes something like this—guerrillas hide among the population as the fish hide in the sea. This is a very true adage. Now, as I say, if the South Vietnamese government can ever achieve this degree of control of their own territory and people, you will have no guerrilla problem. There will be a threat and this will be the threat of the regular North Vietnamese forces, backed by the Chinese. However this is an entirely different problem than the one we are faced with today.

The Army Took The Same View in 1954

This clear-sighted view is characteristic of the Army. Gen. Wheeler's predecessor as Chief of Staff, Gen. Ridgeway, threw his weight on similar grounds against intervention in the same area when it was advocated by Dulles, Nixon and Radford in 1954. Unfortunately this realistic estimate was given in closed hearings and is buried in a voluminuous record. It is out of harmony with the demonological views impressed on American thinking by cold war propaganda. This has led us to see the Vietnamese uprising simply as a Communist plot, and Communism as an occult conspiracy with magical powers whereby a handful of infiltrating agitators can "infect" a whole population with Marxism-Leninism though these same natives can barely read the directions on a can of soup. It then seems logical to infer that this infection (like witchcraft) can only be stopped by burning out its source in Peking whence these diabolic subversives fan out like a corps of Fausts to seduce all these maiden minds.

The basic problem is not in Vietnam but in the USA. So long as these melodramatic nightmares color so much of American political thinking, there will be demands for extension of the war, though we can smash all North Vietnam and China with nuclear bombs without making the peasants in the Mekong Valley any more content with the corrupt and repressive governments we have maintained in power over them. This is no doubt what Secretary Rusk meant when he said cryptically Feb. 27 that "no miracle" in the North would solve the problem in the South. But such remarks are made sotto voce. Into the headlines which mold the public mind Rusk and McNamara continue to pour a picture of the conflict as an invasion from the North, supplied by arms from China. So long as they fear to tell the truth about the war, they cannot free themselves from the undertow pulling them toward its suicidal extension.

An Ambiguous Victory

Every newspaperman will be grateful that the Supreme Court has unanimously reversed the $500,000 verdict won by a Montgomery, Ala., police commissioner against the New York Times and four Negro ministers who signed a protest ad in it. While the case has been remanded, the review of the evidence in the opinion and the standards established make it unlikely that this suit will be renewed. But what of 11 other suits by Southern officials against the New York Times and five other suits against CBS for a grand total of $7,730,000—and what of the future? The decision held that "actual malice" must be proven and that the burden of proof is on the official bringing the suit where he claims a libel in "an otherwise impersonal attack on government operations." But what if the official is attacked by name, as was not the case in this New York Times ad? In effect the press and radio-TV are left at the mercy of Southern juries and the gamble of how the appellate courts review their findings of fact. The Anglo-American press struggled for centuries to free itself from the old common law which made criticism of public officials punishable as civil, criminal or seditious libel. Justices Black, Douglas and Goldberg protested that the First Amendment right to criticize public officials should not be made dependent as Goldberg said "upon the probing by the jury of the motivation of the citizen or press." The fear of long and costly litigation under this new ruling may serve to inhibit reporting about the South.

What Moscow Can Do About Matzoth, P. 4

If LBJ Ready to Talk Peace "Any Place, Any Time", Why Not in Vietnam?

"I want this government first of all to be dedicated to peace in our time, and do everything that we can conceivably do, any place, any time, with anyone to resolve some of the differences that exist among mankind. . . .

"Q. One of your speeches at the University of California indicated a kind of hint to me that we might carry the war to the North Vietnamese if they didn't quit meddling in what you call a 'dangerous game.' Are there any such plans that you can talk about, sir?

"A. No, and I made no such hint. I said it was a dangerous game to try to supply arms and become an aggressor and deprive people of their freedom, and that is true, whether it is in Vietnam or whether it is in this hemisphere, wherever it is.

"Q. Mr. President, do we face the decision on Vietnam of the order of magnitude of Korea, for example?

"A. No, I don't think so. . . .

'Some of our people become very impatient. They cut the water off on us in Cuba. . . . Some of them have said—some of the men have even wanted me to run in the Marines, send them in immediately. . . . There are going to be these demands from time to time, people who feel that all we need to do is mash a button and determine everybody's foreign policy. . . . But we are not living in that kind of a world any more."

—President Johnson's TV Interview March 15.

I. F. Stone's Weekly

VOL. XII, NO. 12 MARCH 23, 1964 WASHINGTON, D. C. 15 CENTS

The Poverty of Ideas in The Poverty Message

In his address to the Organization of American States on the third anniversary of the Alliance for Progress, President Johnson said "Progress in each country depends upon the willingness of that country to mobilize its own resources, to inspire its own people. . . . Those who are not willing to do that which is unpopular, and that which is difficult will not achieve that which is needed or that which will be lasting." These words may serve as the epitaph of his own "war against poverty," perhaps his administration. Anyone looking objectively at his poverty message and his preliminary remarks about it on TV the previous night must conclude that the most serious obstacle to a real assault upon poverty in this country is the poverty of ideas in the White House.

A Cal Coolidge Democrat

For the new President's consistent restraint in foreign policy and his sober realization of what nuclear war means, we are grateful, as we are grateful for the determination he has demonstrated in the civil rights fight. But the poverty message is deeply disappointing. In this, as in his address to the Organization of American States, Mr. Johnson emerges as a kind of Democratic Cal Coolidge, with a simple-minded faith in free enterprise as understood in Country Club locker rooms. As a politician, he is showing himself far more skilful than his Republican rivals, but these are no geniuses. This is the conventional politics good enough for the conventional world in which our upper and middle classes are comfortably cocooned. But in Latin America, as in Africa and Asia, and in our slums, are smoldering crises which cannot be dealt with by trite ideas and campaign rhetoric. The poverty message is completely lacking in any big conceptions while the OAS speech seemed wholly unaware that the Alliance for Progress is on the rocks and there may be little time before a revolution in Brazil or Peru confronts us with a new and many times bigger "Cuba."

Where Were You Then? Where Are You Now?

We went to an extraordinary luncheon last week for an extraordinary man. It was given for Aubrey Williams by the National Committee to Abolish the Un-American Activities Committee. He is one of those very few Southerners with the courage to be truly Christian in their relations with the Negro. Martin Luther King's assistant, the Rev. Wyatt Walker, said the Southern Christian Leadership Conference was born in Williams' backyard in Montgomery, Alabama. No one played a more inspiring role in the New Deal than Williams as head of the National Youth Administration. Now, in his 70's, he is still, as always, in the hardest fight—against HUAC. The luncheon showed that in a country which is constantly patting itself on the back for its recovery from McCarthyism too few are willing to stand up in the fight against HUAC. McCarthy was only another in the line of witch hunters which began with Martin Dies as head of HUAC in the 30's. For a quarter of a century this Committee has smeared and blacklisted some of the best Americans of our time. Its methods are the same as McCarthy's. Today in the South HUAC is being used against those fighting segregation. Yet at the luncheon it was pretty much the same slim handful, older and grayer, who fought McCarthy, who turned up against HUAC. Is there no way to grasp the silent by the lapel and ask them: Where were you in the fight against McCarthyism? Where are you now?

The simple truth is that reliance on so-called free enterprise has failed at home and abroad. The most bathetic part of Johnson's TV interview was his soggy tribute to the men who "head our big industries" and "are willing to get up at daylight and get to bed at midnight to offer employment and create new jobs." This may have been successfully calculated to leave not a dry eye in any house where elder statesmen of the National Association of Manufacturers were gathered before the TV screen. But an analysis on p. 22 of the manpower report the White House and the Labor Department sent to Congress March 9 tells a different story. Of 4,300,000 new jobs created in this country between 1957 and 1963 only 300,000 were "full time jobs generated by private demand." Government directly or through its procurement, mostly for war, created most of the new jobs. The country's growth lags because its business system sags.

Must Viet Peasants Go On Dying Because We Have An Election Coming?

With One Eye on Harry Byrd

The poverty message represented LBJ's moment of decision. Here he had to choose between pleasing Harry Byrd by turning off lights in the White House or alienating the conservatives by turning on some new lights in our national thinking. His nervous disavowal on TV of any intention to take from the haves to give to the have-nots was advance indication of where the choice would be made. Johnson built himself a war on poverty plank for the campaign by putting together some second hand lumber at bargain basement prices. But the idea of a general attack on poverty, which Johnson took over from Kennedy's agenda, cannot easily be stifled. It is up to the independent liberals and radicals of this country now to spell out a program in big terms and begin to sell it to the country. If that job is done, the politicians will come along on poverty as they are coming along on civil rights.

New ideas and movements need also to be generated from below on foreign policy. Trouble lies ahead in Panama if public opinion cannot be taught to see that the perpetual privileges we forced Panama to give us a half century ago are anachronistic in today's world. Johnson here illustrates that well meaning commonplaces are no substitute for positive leadership. We are not living in a world which is guaranteed to wait on the convenience of American elections. We'd better stop expecting the stars to stand still in their courses every other November.

Nowhere is this more true than in South Vietnam. Johnson seems to want to hold the war in suspense, neither withdrawing or expanding it until after the election. Lodge likes the war because it builds up his "image" of the brave sentinel on anti-Communism's frontiers. The Pentagon likes the war because it is a testing ground for new weapons and a training ground for new tactics. If a few more American boys are killed in the process, that is too bad. If more Vietnamese peasants have to be napalmed with their women and children to rout out guerrillas, that too is "c'est la guerre." But it is building a picture of America as a lazy giant who is prepared to sacrifice other people's lives and security because it lacks the intelligence and flexibility to adjust to realities.

Yet all this cannot be laid solely at the door of the White House. The number of voices raised against it in the Senate can be counted, literally, on the fingers of one hand. Gruening of Alaska last week joined with his colleague Bartlett and with Mansfield, Morse and Ellender to question this whole stupid war; Gruening had the courage to call for our withdrawal. But the press gives scant coverage to these speeches and the country is indifferent. So we have the silly comedy of our Secretary of Defense in South Vietnam pledging our support "forever" to another of those here-today-and-gone-tomorrow "strongmen." This latest military miracleman is idiot enough to whip up a campaign to extend his war to the North when he can hardly hold a 50-mile perimeter around his capital in Saigon. From such folly we seem temporarily to be saved. But how long before we start slipping?

Reform At Last

". . . the American government was long opposed to aiding public-controlled industrial development. This policy was particularly noticeable during the Eisenhower administration, and was the cause of considerable strain in Vietnamese-American relations. It gradually gave way before Vietnamese insistence upon at least mixed public-private ownership of new industries."

—South Vietnam: Nation Under Duress by Robert Scigliano (Houghton-Mifflin, 1964).

"Saigon, Mar. 8 (Reuters)—Premier Nguyen Khanh in a broadcast to his nation, last night promised sweeping reforms aimed at rebuilding South Vietnam. . . . Private enterprise would be encouraged as much as possible. 'The government will sell its commercial interests . . . to private investors and establish a stock market'."

—Washington Post, March 8.

This should make it easier for the peasantry to buy some good common stocks.

Gen. Khanh Does A Swift Job of Pulling The Wool Over McNamara's Eyes

"Saigon, Mar. 6 (UPI) Vietnamese Chief of State Nguyen Khanh has been quietly carrying out a major shakeup in this country's military command . . . to reward close supporters of his Jan. 30 coup. Khanh's shakeup was disclosed on the eve of a new Saigon fact-finding visit by Defense Secretary McNamara. The reorganization was reported causing concern as the new Vietnamese chief of state had assured Ambassador Lodge there would be no such major shakeup which could interfere with the war effort . . . almost all the new appointments have been made for political reasons. . . .

"Qualified U.S. military observers believe in some cases the new commanders are as competent as the ones they replaced. But in other cases the military qualities of the appointees are unproven, while in still others they are definitely inferior. The most prominent example of the third category is in the vital 4th army corps, which is responsible for the southern half of the Communist dominated Mekong delta.

"The original commander there, Brig. Gen. Co is considered an outstanding officer by American advisers. Co was replaced by newly promoted Major Gen. Duong Van Duc, an exile general who returned after the coup which overthrew the NGO family regime. Duc's military ability is believed inferior to Co's. He is also considered by some qualified observers to be somewhat emotional and erratic. Duc was one of Khanh's closest collaborators in the coup."

"Hoa, Hoa, March 9 (AP) . . . McNamara told newsmen that he feels there has been progress in South Vietnam since his visit here in December. He credited Khanh's reorganization of the nation's leadership."

Long of Missouri Takes The Offensive Against The Use of Secret "Mail Covers"

A Bill to End A Police State Practice by The U.S. Postoffice

A little known police state practice carried on secretly by the Post Office would be ended by a bill which Senator Edward Long (D. Mo) has introduced to prohibit "mail covers." The practice consists of recording all information on the outside of letters. It came sharply to public attention a few weeks ago when Roy Cohn's lawyer protested that his mail had been under this type of surveillance. Serious consideration is assured the bill by the support of Senator Johnston (D. S.C.), chairman of the Post Office Committee.

Used to Detect "Subversion"

Although almost unknown to the public, mail covers are frequent practice in the Post Office. Its Chief Counsel Louis Doyle admitted in 1962 to Senator Long that there were between 500 and 750 in operation on a single day. The number was probably higher during the McCarthy era when, according to Doyle, the practice was "useful from time to time in connection with espionage and subversion."

Doyle invoked two Court of Appeals decisions to defend the legality of mail covers. One, U.S. v. Costello (255 Fed 2d 876), held that mail covers do not violate the law forbidding detention and opening of mail. The other, U.S. v. Schwartz (283 Fed 2d 107), held that postal regulations are not violated when information from a mail cover is turned over to Justice Department.

Neither meets the issue squarely. Neither did Judge Archie Dawson in the Cohn case. He declined to dismiss on the ground that there was no evidence that the mail had been opened! It is obvious that the government by a mail cover can obtain valuable information without opening the mail. This is the kind of practice Brandeis had in mind when he said "at the foundation of our civil liberties lies the principle which denies to government officials an exceptional position before the law."

Let Freedom Ring
(But Make Sure The Wire Is Tapped)

"Freedom has been taking a real beating at the hands of Federal agents during the past few months. In September we learned that our military intelligence people in West Germany were wiretapping on behalf of a German intelligence agency because the agency itself was prohibited from tapping by the German Constitution. This was certainly a great example for the German people. Shortly after, there began to unfold a story of wiretapping at the State Department. The Deputy Assistant Secretary of State had through a 'misunderstanding' caused the tapping of the telephone of one of his subordinates. This was followed by the report that we are using a field-type lie detector on the Vietnamese people. A practice that is ensured to instruct them in the ways of free men."

—Long (D. Mo) to the Senate March 11 (abridged).

Like all clandestine surveillance techniques, mail covers should be banned as beyond effective public control. Mr. Cohn only learned of this through a tip. Not even the present Chief Postal Inspector knows the present extent of the practice. Any one of his 1,000 inspectors can authorize a "cover" and often do as a favor to FBI or local police.

Ironically, "mail cover" first came to public attention when a Senate committee found in 1954 that they had been used in investigating McCarthy. Now ten years later they are in the headlines again because of their use against McCarthy's one-time lieutenant, Roy Cohn. No matter to whom applied, they're dirty business.

Clark Questions the Right of Senators to Double in Brass As Army Reserve Officers

Mr. CLARK (D. Pa.). There is one more point I believe I should raise for the first time. There is a grave constitutional issue as to whether those holding commissions on active duty in the Armed Forces of the United States have any right, either to speak in a matter with respect to which there is an obvious conflict of interest, or any right to serve as Senators of the United States under the Constitution.

Mr. GOLDWATER (R. Ariz.). The Senator has just raised the question of the constitutionality of Reserve officers serving as Senators. I must remind him that I introduced a resolution at the first session of this Senate to call upon the Judiciary Committee to determine this question. I seriously resist the charge of conflict of interest.

Mr. THURMOND (D. S.C.). I am amazed that any member of this body should continue to bring up this question. In 1930, Congress enacted a statute on this very subject, in which it was held that a Reserve officer is not an officer or employe of the U.S. Government.

There is an effort in this country to bring about a sentiment against the military. I have commented today on a book, written by a man who is a confidant and adviser of Cyrus Eaton, Khrushchev's capitalist friend who wants to see this country unilaterally disarmed. The book I am referring to is called "The Passion of the Hawks." *

This man wants to downgrade the Military Establishment. The whole effort is to work toward disarmament. That is the motive behind this effort. Those who have been trying to impugn the motives of the Reserve officers are invariably, almost without exception, people who favor disarmament.

Mr. CLARK. In my view, the statute on which the Senator from South Carolina relies is unconstitutional.

—Abridged from the Congressional Record Feb. 21 in the midst of Clark's attack on the $52 million amendment which the bomber lobby attached to the annual defense bill over the objections of Defense Secretary McNamara.

* This book by Tristram Coffin, subtitled "Militarism in Modern America" (Macmillan: $5.95), which we recommend highly, gives a list of the 82 members of Congress who are Reserve Officers. The highest ranking are Major General Goldwater of the Air Force and Major General Thurmond of the Army. The Army has 34, the Air Force 23, the Navy 20 and the Marine Corps 5 officers in Congress. Mr. Coffin characterizes this as "an ingenious and almost fool-proof system" for organizing the political strength of the military. He writes, "The wearing of both the toga and the sword is plainly illicit and in violation of the Constitution" which says "No person holding any Office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office."

Easy Way For Moscow to End the Usual Flow of Ugly Pre-Passover Stories

Jews Worse Off In Soviet Union Than Anywhere Else In The Bloc

There is one easy way for the Soviet authorities to stop the flood of damaging stories in the Western press as Passover approaches about the difficulties Soviet Jewry has in obtaining matzoth. This is simply to reinstate the system whereby until 1962, and even in the worst days of Stalinism, the Jews obtained unleavened bread from State bakeries for the holiday.

It would also improve the standing of the Soviet Union in the outside world if Trud, the Soviet labor paper, would cease the publication of vulgar and scurrilous attacks on Israeli diplomats which seem to be an annual feature of this publication as Passover approaches. This year's article by "N. Ehrlich" is similar to those he has written in the past. If the Soviet authorities do not want Israeli visitors to leave behind prayer books in the few synagogues still open in the Soviet Union, they can easily make it unnecessary by allowing Soviet Jews to print their own.

Poland's Exemplary Record

One way to judge Soviet policy is by comparison with Poland. Poland, like Russia, has historically been a hotbed of anti-Semitism. Yet in Poland today the Jews enjoy a freedom that would seem like paradise to their Soviet brothers; it is not surprising that Soviet Jewry was not allowed to send a delegation to Warsaw last April for the commemoration of the 20th anniversary of the Ghetto Uprising.

The policy laid down by Gomulka after his restoration to power in 1956 contrasts sharply with Khrushchev's. In an official statement published that year by Trybuna Ludu, Polish Jews were offered freedom of choice among three courses: assimilation, the enjoyment of cultural and religious autonomy within the Polish nation or emigration to Israel. This has remained Polish policy since, and has been accompanied by an intense campaign against the survival of anti-Semitism among the people.

Each Communist regime in Eastern Europe seems to have a different Jewish policy. Yugoslav Jewry, before and since the break with Stalin, has never suffered from discrimination. In the bloc itself, Bulgaria, had little anti-Semitism either before or after the Revolution. In the bloc, the condition of the Jews is best in Poland; Hungary is next, then Rumania and Czechoslovakia. The Soviet Union's record is the worst. In each case the status of the Jews is an index of de-Stalinization, and of the cultural level of the ruling bureaucracies.

Among the Russian intellectuals today, the fight against anti-Semitism is as closely linked to the fight against Stalinism as it once was to the fight against Czarism. It is indicative that poets like Yevtushenko and writers like Nekrassov are champions of the Jews—and are constantly in hot water with the bureaucrats from Khrushchev down.

The famous veteran Soviet novelist Konstantin Paustovsky, accused Soviet authorities in 1956 of anti-Semitic views "of a kind worthy of pogrom-makers." That this has changed but little is indicated by the kind of cartoons which illustrate a booklet "Judaism Without Embellishment" published last year in the Soviet Union by the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences. These cartoons are of the vicious type which once appeared in the Nazi Der Stuermer. This whole Soviet record is a disgrace to socialism.

From An Appeal to Khrushchev

"Many of us are lifelong non-believers in any religion. Nonetheless we believe the the freedom to practice religious views should be allowed Jews of the Soviet Union in the same manner that such freedom is granted people of other religious persuasion. We are concerned that the process of restitution of Jewish cultural activities has been slow. The journals and theatres of much smaller groups are more plentiful. We are deeply troubled that there should be articles in Soviet journals of many Republics expressing hostility to Jewish people as such and using terms such as 'vermin', 'blood-suckers', 'parasites' in combination with caricatures of Jews."

The Only Way to Wage A Really Total War on Poverty in An Age of Plenty

"It is essential to recognize that the traditional line between jobs and incomes is being broken. The economy of abundance can sustain all citizens in comfort and economic security whether or not they engage in what is commonly reckoned as work. We urge, therefore, that society, through its appropriate legal and governmental institutions, undertake an unqualified commitment to provide every individual and family with an adequate income as a matter of right. This undertaking we consider to be essential to the emerging economic, social and political order in this country. We regard it as the only policy by which the quarter of the nation now dispossessed and soon-to-be dispossessed by lack of employment can be brought within the abundant society. The unqualified right to an income would take the place of the patchwork of welfare measures—from unemployment measures to relief—designed to assure that no citizen or resident of the United States actually starves."

Remember This Is Our Third Attempt to End Poverty

The President's spokesmen have now completed their presenation of his poverty program to the House Labor and Education Committee. They proved an impressive team. Sargent Shriver and Secretaries Wirtz, McNamara, Freeman, Hodges and Celebrezze spoke with an idealism and a concern which attested the high quality of the Cabinet Kennedy gathered and Johnson inherited. These were big men launching a big idea. The questions put to them were largely nitpicking.

Poverty has been put squarely into the arena of practical politics. But how fruitful this proves to be will depend on the way the program is shaped in the coming months of debate upon it. This is not the first but the third time in a generation that the idea of eliminating poverty has been broached in a big way politically. The first time was early in the New Deal when the Social Security system was established. The second was during Mr. Truman's Fair Deal when the Employment Act of 1946 was passed. It is urgent to remember that the compromises made on both occasions were crippling.

A War Which Could Already Have Been Won

If Social Security had been used as a means of redistributing income, financed by taxes on wealth rather than by regressive payroll levies on worker, consumer and entrepeneur, if it had established a guaranteed minimum subsistence for every American instead of a makeshift and inadequate dole against unemployment and old age, there would be little poverty today to make war upon. The radical New Dealers saw this clearly at the time but were defeated. In the same way, the idea of economic planning for full employment, which the Employment Act of 1946 was inte[illegible] embody, was so watered down in passage as to beco[illegible]ive. If that Act were working along the lines orig[illegible]nceived, the war on poverty would have been won two decades ago. So it behooves us now to examine this new program astringently, lest another historic opportunity miscarry.

The Johnson program avoids all direct attack on the problem. The program is based on the calculation that those 9.3 million families with incomes under $3,000 a year are living in poverty. Many breadwinners are not jobless but simply ill paid. One direct attack would be to extend the minimum wage to all workers and the hourly minimum to $1.50. This would make $60 a week, or $3,000 a year, the minimum wage. Another direct approach was touched on but quickly passed over by Walter Heller of the Council of Economic Advisers when he remarked to the House Committee, "Arithmetic tells us that the cost of levelling up all poor families to an annual income of $3,000 would be about $11 billion a year." Measured against the $50 billion plus we spend each year on war preparations or against the billions of oil, real estate and other profits which slip untaxed through the loopholes in our sloppy income tax system, this is no large sum. Paid out to the poor under such a minimum subsistence guarantee as is advocated in a newly released manifesto on "The Triple Revolution" (see boxes on pages one and two) this would wipe out poverty and quickly raise our faltering rate of economic growth.

Another direct attack would be by economic planning. Bernard Nossiter of the Washington Post in his new book, "The Mythmakers," a refreshingly iconoclastic survey of current economic realities, in one chapter provides the first account in popular form of the non-coercive planning methods

Poverty Plays 2d Fiddle to Private Business

Washington—Federal planners have put together a revised prescription for curing the Appalachian Mountain area's economic and social ills . . . the lesser emphasis on welfare, a diminished Federal role and a turn away from the industrial cooperatives mentioned in the fall proposals strongly boost its chances, strategists feel. 'It's watered down, but adding water can make medicine more palatable,' comments an official of one agency . . . [Appalachian Region] Commission officials say their cause will be aided in Congress . . . by the concept of providing only enough public activity to build a framework for private business to function. . . . The initial Appalachia plan called for a corporation that would engage in over-all economic planning. . . . Now the idea is for a Commission . . . to serve largely as a coordinator. There would still be a Federal State corporation, but with quite limited functions. —Wall Street Journal, March 19.

which have maintained a high level of growth and employment in less hidebound areas of the capitalist world. Norway, France and Japan have all combined economic planning with free enterprise in pragmatic mixed systems. This is what we were supposed to do under the Full Employment bill of 1946 until Taft, in taking the word "full" out of the title, took the essence out of its spirit. The idea of planning for full employment seemed too subversively close to socialism, a subject on which all we Americans have been brainwashed. Even the advanced intellectuals, some of them old-time radicals, who helped to frame the manifesto on "The Triple Revolution" to which we call grateful attention in these pages, avoided it lest it set the alarm bells ringing. The idea of economic planning is conspicuously absent even from their blueprint.

The Key Question

The key question is whether poverty is peripheral in our society or due to inadequate demand. If it is the latter, then some form of economic planning is necessary to deal with it. The President's program is based on the assumption that poverty is peripheral because only on this basis can it be fought with minimum disturbance to our dominant business class and its sacred myths about free enterprise. It is true that the Negro, the aged, the slum youth, represent special problems. But it is well to remember that when the government sets full employment goals as it does in wartime, then these special problems are soon solved. Neither race nor sex nor age nor disability is allowed to stand in the way as businessmen scrape the bottom of the human barrel, mustering and retraining every hand they can get. If aggregate demand is kept high by government planning and direction, all these human problems become soluble.

The worst features of the Johnson program are provisions which would subsidize the land speculator and the business man to get some increase in help to the small farmer and some increase in jobs. James Roosevelt for one fleeting moment touched on the realities when he said to Secretary Wirtz that he saw no point in "lending money just for somebody to set up a business when there is no chance for that business being a success." If goals are pitched high, jobs will be created and farm surpluses absorbed by those now ill fed.

This program does not even attack the peripheral problems in adequate fashion. Shriver showed how hollow was the talk of a "total war on poverty" when he assured the Committee in true Johnsonian fashion that it "does not raise the national budget by a single dollar." Our schools and our slums are scandals. The stunted youth Shriver would help are their product. The remedy is to wipe out the causes not to skim off the human effluvia and put them into work camps.

A Program to Meet A "Triple Revolution" in Cybernetics, Weaponry and Human Rights

"As machines take over production from men, they absorb an increasing proportion of resources while the men who are displaced become dependent on minimal and unrelated government measures—unemployment insurance, social security, welfare payments. These measures are less and less able to disguise an historic paradox: that a growing proportion of the population is subsisting on minimal incomes, often below the poverty line, at a time when sufficient productive potential is available to supply the needs of everyone in the United States. . . . The continuance of the income-through-jobs link as the only major mechanism for distributing effective demand—for granting the right to consume—now acts as the main brake on the almost unlimited capacity of a cybernated productive system. . . . The major problem is not how to increase production but how to distribute the abundance . . . . We propose:

"1. A massive program to build up our educational system . . . tens of thousands of employment opportunities . . . particularly for younger people may be thus created . . . an additional 100,000 teachers annually are needed.

"2. Massive public works . . . to construct dams, reservoirs, ports, water and air pollution facilities, community recreation facilities . . . For each $1 billion per year spent on public works 150,000 to 200,000 jobs would be created. $2 billion or more a year should be spent this way.

"3. A massive program of low-cost housing to be built both publicly and privately, and aimed at a rate of 700,000 to 1,000,000 units a year.

"4. Development and financing of rapid transit systems, urban and interurban. . . .

"5. A public power system built on the abundance of coal in distressed areas, designed for low-cost power to heavy industrial and residential sections.

"6. Rehabilitation of obsolete military bases for community and educational use.

"7. A major revision of our tax structure aimed at redistributing income . . . an expansion of the use of excess profits tax would be important. Subsidies and tax credit plans are required to ease the human suffering involved in the transition . . . from manpower to machinepower.

"8. The trade unions can play an important role . . . (a) use collective bargaining to negotiate . . . for those thrown out of work by technological change. (b) bargaining for prerequisites such as housing . . . and similar programs. (c) obtaining a voice in the investment of the unions' huge pension and welfare funds, and insisting on investment policies which have as their major criteria the social use and function of the enterprises in which the investment is made. (d) o[illegible]ization of the unemployed . . . and campaigns to [illegible] white collar and professional workers.

"9. Th[illegible]e licensing power of government to regulate [illegible]f cybernation to minimize hardship and the u[illegible]minimum wage power as well as taxing powers to provide the incentives for moving as rapidly as possible toward the goals indicated by this paper."

What We Are Doing to Innocent Villagers in Vietnam and Cambodia

Ordinarily the Associated Press will sell photos like the one on this page to non-subscribers for $15. We ran into a fog of double-talk when we tried to buy this one from the AP last week. Permission was refused, though for no clear reason. We obtained a glossy print through channels of our own. We think it tells a story every decent American should heed. This is what we are doing to the innocent in South Vietnam and Cambodia. The AP, early in our negotiations, wanted to be sure that we would not change the caption under the picture. Its caption said:

> INNOCENT VICTIM—A Vietnamese child, body completely covered with burns from a napalm bomb, is held by father after rescue from Vietnamese village near the Cambodian border. Child was found in a plain of reeds after Vietnamese Air Force bombers strafed a village, where Communist Viet Cong guerrillas sought to hide among innocent civilians.

The Right of Pursuit

The New York Times, in printing the picture, March 20 left out the reference to napalm bombs and said it was an injured Vietnamese child being comforted by its father after an air assault on a village near the Cambodian border. We suspect this was the Cambodian village which the Vietnamese with the aid of our "spotters" bombed on March 19. The U.S. now says this was a mistake. But our Vietnamese allies have long insisted (AP from Saigon, Baltimore Sun, March 21) that they should be "permitted to pursue Communist guerrillas a reasonable distance into Cambodian territory" and there, presumably, do what they do at home—burn out any village in which they suspect guerrillas may be hiding.

For this purpose, in addition to napalm, we supply "a phosphorous explosive, fired from artillery and also from fighter bombers" which "erupts in a white cloud, burning through everything it touches" (AP from Saigon, Washington Star March 22). "With explosives such as these," the same dispatch went on apologetically, "civilians are bound to get hurt." We hope the villagers, too, will see this as a kind of military traffic mishap. "The spectacle of children lying half alive with napalm bombs across their bodies," this AP report added, "was revolting to both Vietnamese and Americans entering a Cambodian village after it had been under air attack by government planes Thursday." That was March 19, the date of this picture. We hope you find it revolting, too.

Sen. Church: "Wars Against George Washingtons Not Easily Won"

Q. Is it your view that we are succeeding in Vietnam?

A. I'm not optimistic. If Ho Chi Minh, the leader of North Vietnam, is regarded by most Vietnamese people, North and South, as the authentic architect of independence from the French, as the George Washingt[illegible]f Vietnam, it will be hard. Wars against George W[illegible]tons are not easily won.

Q. Do you think the way out in Viet[illegible]o carry the war into North Vietnam, or even [illegible]

A. That is certainly not the way out. As [illegible]ook at the map, that is the way in. I would hope that we don't make South Vietnam a launching pad for another Korean War.

Q. Do you see merit in President DeGaulle's suggestion of a neutralist settlement in Southeast Asia?

A. If the whole of the archilepago could be neutralized, including North Vietnam, then I should think that this would be positively in the American interest, as well as in the general interest of all the people concerned.

Q. Do you think we can achieve the neutralization of South Vietnam so long as we are or appear to be losing?

A. It happened in Laos. It could happen in Vietnam.

Q. You don't agree with the official position that neutralization would mean giving Vietnam to the Communists?

A. Several neutral countries in that region are not Communist. Laos and Cambodia are examples. I thought we had gotten over regarding neutralism as anti-American.

Q. Then would you say the Geneva accords of 1962 on a neutral Laos are working?

A. It became obvious from the course of the fighting preceding that agreement that without it the whole of the country would soon have fallen under Communist control.

Though Death Toll 100,000 Annually, AMA Supports Tobacco Industry

Consumers Union Asks Total Ban on Radio-TV Ads for Cigarettes

The AMA is operating true to form. It sent a letter to the Federal Trade Commission urging "further research" rather than regulation of cigarette advertising. The FTC held hearings March 16-18 on its proposed regulations, which would require manufacturers to label packages with a health warning and advertisers not to contradict it.

The AMA letter arrived the day the Assistant Attorney General testified that responsible scientists had estimated the death toll from smoking at more than 100,000 annually. The Surgeon General's report didn't mention the figure, Dr. Hudley said, because it is only a rough estimate.

Press Still Burying The Story

This tobacco-tainted insistence on scientific precision has kept important information from the public since 1937, when smoking first was unequivocally condemned as a "health hazard" by a distinguished study group organized by the National Cancer and Heart Institutes. Following publication of their report, Harold Ickes accused New York newspapers of "omitting or burying evidence" against smoking. They're still doing it.

Mildred Brady, Assistant Director of Consumers Union, exposed this and similar tactics in her superb statement to the Commission. She said a 1962 report on "Smoking and News Coverage," published in the Columbia Journalism Review, concluded that while "newspapers have presented adequate coverage in the aggregate," they have left "the story so fragmented" as to create confusion. The New York Daily News distinguished itself in 1957 with the headline, "Cigies Assailed Again—Ho Hum." Mrs. Brady said that no major magazine has sponsored a health education campaign with regard to smoking except Consumer Reports, which accepts no advertising, and Readers' Digest, which carries no cigarette advertising. Among the networks, only CBS has featured programs on smoking—five in the last decade—and these have suffered from poor press previews and summaries influenced by advertising firms.

Mrs. Brady was the only witness who criticized the Commission's proposed regulations for being "far too permissive." She noted that only in Italy where all cigarette advertising has been banned has cigarette consumption been significantly inhibited. She proposed that advertising of cigarettes, like that of distilled liquor, be banned entirely from radio and television. She suggested that the Commission's rule 2, which pertains to advertising copy, be made as stringent as the regulations governing the advertising of new securities. This would confine copy to the brand name, the length, type and style of cigarette, the health warning, and where the brand may be obtained. "Surely, controls to prevent confusion in the advertising of a product dangerous to life," she said, "should be at least as demanding as those affecting the promotion of a sale that threatens only the pocketbook."

Another of her proposals worth promoting is the use of a state licensing system to control cigarette retailers. In many states, retailers have themselves sponsored similar proposals in their desire for a legal means to prohibit price-cutting. "Is it asking too much of the business system," she questioned, "that it support for the sake of the health of children proposals it fostered to curtail price competition?" That her testimony went unmentioned in the press is an indication of the answer.

[illegible] Accidentally Photographing?

"S[illegible]rities have suggested that the plane, equi[illegible]ally, would carry camera equipment and that a regular training mission would include practice photography. In this view, they might well have photographed East Germany accidentally after they strayed off course. If this were the case these [U.S.] officials said, Soviet authorities could have found the films when they inspected the wreckage of the plane. American authorities have been kept away from the wreckage. In any case, the Russians are expected eventually to produce evidence that they were on an intelligence mission."

—Henry L. Trewhitt, Bonn correspondent, in the Baltimore Sun, March 21, just before the three "strayed" U.S. fliers in that latest "routine training" incident on the East German border were released. Was this leak to prepare U.S. opinion for surprises at the trial? When will the military be ordered to stop playing dangerous games on so sensitive a border?

Opinion Poll Shows Bigger Vote for Neutralization Than Extension of The War

A Louis Harris opinion poll (Washington Post, March 30) reported a bigger vote for ending the war in Vietnam by neutralizing the South than for extending it by air strikes against the North. On neutralization: 35% were in favor, 28% opposed and 37% not sure. On extending the war: only 26% were in favor, 45% opposed and 29% not sure. "Back of this reluctance to carry the military campaign to North Vietnam," Harris wrote, "is the added fact that no more than 3 in every 10 have been recorded as willing to risk war with Red China or Vietnam."

Apparently the six Senators who have spoken up for neutralization are more representative than their numbers indicate. If a third of the people are for neutralization and another third "not sure" despite State and Defense Dept. propaganda, it is clear the President could mobilize strong support for ending the war on the basis of free elections in a neutral South Vietnam.

McNamara seems to have other plans. A Washington Star editorial the day this poll was published reported McNamara had said "privately on Capitol Hill" that if the war did not take a turn for the better in about six months (right after November, perhaps?) it would be extended. The idea of first consulting Congress or the country does not seem to have occurred to the Pentagon's computers.

What Fulbright, Too, Does Not Dare to Think

Behind the scenes, even more than in public, Senator Fulbright has long been a civilizing influence. He was the one voice in opposition at the inner Kennedy council on the eve of the Bay of Pigs. He has tried to inject some common sense and humanity into the boy scoutish delusions about the efficacy of counter-guerrillas which continue to dominate our bankrupt Southeast Asia policy. Now, in the stuffy, closed room of official U.S. foreign policy discussion, his speech comes as a welcome breath of fresh air. But judged by the standards of the outside world, and the world of the outsiders, the really free world, the world which is not chained by respectability to cold war clichés, the speech only illustrates how backward U.S. thinking is. Fulbright challenges the country to "start thinking some 'unthinkable' thoughts" but he himself does not dare rethink some of the basic "unthinkables" of our foreign policy. We offer a few samples:

The Tale of Two Canals

1. Panama, where Fulbright was at his best. Isn't it time we dared to think through the parallel with Suez? In 1956 when England, France and Israel invaded Egypt after Egypt seized that canal, we joined Moscow in forcing their withdrawal. Our oil companies did not want their relations with the Arab countries disturbed. In the case of both canals, rights had been imposed by force and chicanery in an earlier era. We allowed Egypt to expropriate British and French investors in the Suez Canal. We refuse to recognize Panama's right to a revision of the archaic terms of our own property in the Panama Canal. In the rest of the world this looks like a typical case of Big Power double standards, willing to be liberal but only about other peoples' property.

2. Cuba, where Fulbright is feeble. Even he does not dare ask us to measure our conduct against that of other Western powers. Holland in Indonesia, Belgium in the Congo and France in Algeria lost far more than we did in Cuba. Yet only a few days ago, without waiting for payment on seized Dutch properties, the Netherlands have resumed trade talks with Sukarno. The Belgians are supplying technical aid to the Congo. France has suffered from Ben Bella far more than we have suffered from Castro; three generations of Frenchmen were uprooted from their homes in Algeria. Yet de Gaulle continues to aid Ben Bella, who is much the same kind of radical socialist nationalist as Castro.

If de Gaulle had treated Ben Bella as we treat Castro, if he had cut off all aid and called on NATO to join him in a trade embargo, he would long ago have forced Ben Bella into the Soviet camp and brought into being a Soviet bridgehead on the other side of the Western Mediterranean, as we did by our folly in the Caribbean. De Gaulle would have poisoned his relations with Africa and the rest of the Arab world by prolonging a struggle against Arab nationalism he was wise enough to see he could not win.

We saw all this clearly—elsewhere. We supported the anti-colonial struggle in Algeria, in the Congo and in Indo-

The CIA, Like George III

FULBRIGHT: I agree that an element of civil war is involved, but a very strong element of outside interference is also involved. Such facts are difficult to document, but studies have been made. A CIA commission has made a study of the situation. It has been confirmed that the source of much of the trouble is North Vietnam. . . .

MORSE: I suppose we ought to have some appreciation of the British viewpoint at the time of the American Revolution, when the British did not look with favor upon the French assistance to the American Colonies. . . . The fact that one group in South Vietnam is obtaining assistance from North Vietnam and another group is obtaining assistance from the U.S. does not change in the slightest degree the fact that it is a civil war. . . . We do not like the sources from which the Vietcong are getting assistance and the Vietcong do not like the sources from which the South Vietnamese are getting assistance. But it is still a civil war.

Some Myths and Realities That Fulbright Overlooked in Southeast Asia

Morse Challenges Johnson to Extend His Peace Policy to Vietnam

By Senator Wayne Morse*

The President said yesterday [in his speech to the AFL-CIO Building Council] that today finds us just where we were 10 years ago in South Vietnam. But that is not quite true. We are $2 billion poorer for the economic aid we have put into that area of 14 million people and we are an unknown amount poorer for the military aid we have put in. We have added 15,000 U.S. troops to the ante since 1954. Over 200 Americans have been killed there. Even so, the military and political situation has deteriorated.

We are there we say at the invitation of the South Vietnamese government. But that government is our own creature. We know it and the world knows it. One might as well try to claim that the Soviet Army is in East Germany only at the invitation of the East German Government. A puppet is a puppet, and South Vietnam has not had more than a U.S. puppet government in its 10 years of existence.

"Forever" Called Optimistic

The most optimistic American forecast for South Vietnam was made by the Secretary of Defense when he said that we would aid that country 'forever.' If the policy stated by the Secretary of Defense is the policy of the Johnson Administration in South Vietnam, then every President 10 years, 20 years, 50 years from now will find himself where Eisenhower and Johnson found themselves. But the price will go up every decade just to keep the U.S. in the same place.

The President does not believe it necessary to send Marines into Cuba. Why, then, does the President believe it necessary or desirable to send our Special Forces to South Vietnam?

We took a tiger by the tail 10 years ago and no one in high office knows how to let go of it. So we call that a commitment. What is really meant is face and prestige. We backed a puppet there 10 years ago and we are afraid the world will laugh at us if we recognice that it has been a flop.

There are no Chinese soldiers fighting in Vietnam; there are no Russian soldiers. The only foreign troops are Americans. Every time an American dies in Vietnam, the flag should be lowered to half mast over the Capitol, over the White House, over the State Department and over the Pentagon because those boys are dying in the execution of a unilateral policy that no longer has a direct bearing on the defenses of the United States. I am satisfied that once the American people obtain the facts about American foreign policy in South Vietnam, they will repudiate the policy.

President Johnson said yesterday, 'And that is why we must follow the Prophet Isaiah many, many times before we send the Marines, and say, 'Come now and let us reason together.'

Mr. President, when is the United States going to apply your words to Vietnam?

Abridged from a Senate speech March 25 in which he took issue with Fulbright's support for the war in Vietnam.

Low Blow and Lame Apology

"One would think that the State Dept. would recognize that it had been damaged enough by the application of the tactics of McCarthyism not to resort to the use of the same tactics. The Secretary of Sate last night in Salt Lake City out McCarthyed McCarthy.

"I find in the press report of Secretary Rusk's speech that he applied the word 'quitters' to those of us who disagree with our present policy in South Vietnam. The Secretary is further quoted as saying, 'That is what the Communists want most. Their favorite slogan is "Yanks, Go Home." Insofar as anybody here or abroad pays attention to the quitters, they are giving aid and comfort to our enemies.'

"The Secretary of State knows very well that he is using the phrase which defines treason in our Constitution. Mr. Rusk would not use these disreputable tactics if our policies could withstand logical analysis."

—Morse (D. Ore.) in the Senate March 20 (abridged).

"I was thinking of the mail I get at the State Department."

—Rusk's lame apology on Face The Nation March 22.

"American citizens, be they U.S. Senators or any other citizen, should have the right to make such protests without having a Secretary of State call them quitters or traitors."

—Morse replying in the Senate March 23.

Does Our Civilian Right Hand Know What Our Military Intelligence Left Hand is Doing?

"Moscow, March 27 (UPI)—The Soviet Union, in announcing the release of the RB-66 officers, asserted for the first time today that it had photographic evidence on which to try the fliers as spies. An official statement said the fliers were being released because the U.S. had expressed its 'regrets' and had given assurances there would be no more such overflights."

—New York Times, March 28.

Q. Mr. Secretary was the release of the two American fliers today in any way contingent upon public assurances on the part of the U.S. that there would be no longer any overflights over Communist territories?

A. Well, it is not a contingency (sic) because that does not lend itself to a condition. We have already indicated that we recognize that this plane was where it was not supposed to be, and we have also indicated that we have taken additional measures to try to prevent this kind of straying in the future. But this is not a condition in any sense. . . .

Q. Mr. Secretary . . . what about the Russian claim that they have evidence that the fliers were spying?

A. . . . We are ourselves convinced because we know what their instructions were . . . that they were not engaged in any mission over East Germany. Now, it is true this was a tactical reconnaissance aircraft as a member of a tactical reconnaissance squadron. It had certain equipment on board. And I suppose the Russians looked at this pretty hard. But I think I will just leave it at that, until we have a chance to talk with these fliers and find out exactly what happened because it is, quite frankly, a little mysterious as to how they could be that far off course."

—Secretary of State Rusk's press conference March 27.

"The President said he had given instructions to the Defense Department 'and followed through very, very vigorously' on the necessity for pilots to 'observe the corridor assigned to American planes flying over East Germany.' His purpose was to prevent another incident."

—Washington Post from Austin, Tex., March 29.

Justice Department Courageously Sides Against Expropriated U.S. Sugar Interests

Behind The Miracle of A Supreme Court Decision Upholding Cuba

Conclusions rather uncomplimentary to democracy flow from the Supreme Court's decision in the Cuba sugar case. How much more wisely men can act when they are not subject to the ignorant passions of the majority and when they are supported by a great tradition, that of the law! It is something of which we can be proud that, in the midst of the mania which has seized this country on the subject of Castro, the Supreme Court should rule 8-to-1 in Cuba's favor and against U.S. investors he expropriated. No elected official would dare hand down such a judgment.

There could hardly have been a more unequal contest. On one side, filing briefs amicus on behalf of the U.S. sugar interests involved, were some of the stuffiest and most expensive leaders of our bar. On the other side was the firm of Rabinowitz & Boudin, a team famous for its civil liberties work.

Et Tu, Mr. Justice Harlan?

The lower courts had upheld the claim of expropriated U.S. sugar interests to $175,000 in Cuban sugar receipts on deposit in New York banks. Those judges ruled that our courts have a right to treat foreign expropriation decrees as invalid "if in violation of international law." The Supreme Court was asked to uphold these rulings by the big guns of the corporate bar, concerned with oil, sugar and other clients who fear expropriation elsewhere. It must have been painful to them to lose 8-to-1 (only Mr. Justice White took their point of view) and to have the opinion written by Mr. Justice Harlan, a Wall Street corporation lawyer before his elevation to the bench. Even Holmes could not have been more Olympian in his detachment and insight (see box below).

Another marvel occurred during argument. The No. 2 man of the Justice Department, Deputy Attorney General Katzenbach appeared to ask that the lower courts be reversed, Cuban law upheld and the act of state doctrine reaffirmed. This ancient Anglo-American doctrine holds that the courts of one country cannot pass on the validity of the public acts a foreign government takes on its own territory. This was sound law but risky politics, and Attorney General Kennedy deserves credit for it.

To jettison this common sense rule in order to satisfy the anti-Castro passions of the moment would be to invite trouble. Only recently the U.S. itself argued the act of state doctrine when Swiss courts tried to interfere with our seizure of the Nazi-tainted I. G. Farben's American assets during the war. Expropriations for one reason or another are a common feature of the international landscape, by no means confined to Communist or even colonial countries. Our courts in the past have upheld the doctrine and refused to interfere when private suits were brought in past years to seize Mexican and later Russian Soviet assets in this country as compensation for property expropriated.

The Justice Department argued that decisions by American courts "striking down foreign official acts of state which impair American property interests will probably not be viewed abroad as dispassionate applications of neutral international law principles" but rather as "reflecting merely parochial American views partisan to American national interests." It said the way to deal with expropriations was by diplomacy. It cited successful negotiations with Mexico over seized U.S. agrarian and later oil properties. It pointed to the settlements reached with Yugoslavia, Rumania, Bulgaria and Poland on their post World War II property seizures and it said similar negotiations with Cuba "may prove possible in the course of time." A major obstacle is the State Department's fear of practicing the diplomacy the Justice Department advocates.

A Victory for Political Freedom

The Emergency Civil Liberties Committee and their counsel, Leonard Boudin, deserve applause for their successful defense of three students at Indiana University arrested under a 1951 State law "to exterminate Communism and Communists and any and all teachings of the same"—the barbarous language is that of the statute. Judge Nat U. Hill of the Monroe County Circuit Court held the law unconstitutional under the Supreme Court's 1956 decision voiding a similar Pennsylvania statute in the Steve Nelson case. The students were members of the Young Socialist Alliance, a Trotzkyist group.

A Supreme Court Decision Which Views The World With Olympian Detachment

"There are few if any issues of international law today on which opinion seems to be so divided as the limitation on a State's power to expropriate the property of aliens. . . . Communist countries, although they have in fact provided a degree of compensation after diplomatic efforts, commonly recognize no obligation on the part of the taking country. Certain representatives of the newly independent and underdeveloped countries have questioned whether rules of state responsibility toward aliens can bind nations that have not consented to them and it is argued that the traditionally articulated standards governing expropriation of property reflect 'imperialist' interests and are inappropriate to the circumstances of emergent states.

"The disagreement as to relevant international law standards reflects an even more basic divergence between the national interests of capital importing and capital exporting nations and between the social ideologies of those countries that favor state control of the means of production and those that adhere to a free enterprise system. It is difficult to imagine the courts of this country embarking on adjudication in an area which touches more sensitively the practical and ideological goals of the various members of the community of nations. . . .

"Against the force of such considerations, we find respondents' countervailing arguments quite unpersuasive. Their basic contention is that U.S. courts could make a significant contribution to the growth of international law. . . . But given the fluidity of present world conditions, the effectiveness of such a patchwork approach towards the formulation of an acceptable body of law concerning state responsibility for expropriations is, to say the least highly conjectural. Moreover it rests upon the sanguine presupposition that the decisions of the courts of the world's major capital exporting country and principal exponent of the free enterprise system would be accepted as disinterested expressions of sound legal principles by those adhering to widely different ideologies."

—Mr. Justice Harlan's decision in the Cuban sugar case.

Behind Latin America's Blind Oligarchies Too Often Stands Our Own

nesia. As long as it was somebody else's colonialism, we were all against it. But in Cuba when Castro dared touch the properties of United Fruit and Standard Oil, we rang down an iron curtain hard. That's something else we dare not think about.

Fulbright's Bravest "Unthinkable"

The closest Fulbright comes to the really "unthinkable" is his recognition that the character of the Latin American oligarchies makes it unlikely that social reform there can be achieved peacefully. But even he does not venture to say that behind the local oligarchies stand powerful private North American interests strong enough to frustrate even liberal U.S. policies as they did recently when they drove Juan Bosch out of the Dominican Republic, its first elected President in a generation, a man who was both a reformer and a democrat. The sugar and oil companies said he had to go, and he went.

Fulbright wisely asks us to look ahead and decide whether, if peaceful reform fails, and there are revolutions elsewhere in Latin America, we will tolerate or support them if they are not Commmunist but follow the Mexican or Nasserite pattern. He did not mention our bitter hostility to Mexican agrarian reform, or the Dulles veto on Aswan that nearly drove Nasser into the Soviet camp. Castro, too, tried to follow an independent or Titoist course, but we wouldn't let him. What needs even more to be said at this moment is that our Latin policy is turning in the other direction. With serious trouble ahead in Brazil and Chile, we are dropping hints that we are not as opposed as Kennedy was to military dictatorships. We preach social reform, but in a showdown prefer the bayonet. That way lies temporary relief and ultimate disaster. This, too, needs to be thought about before we find ourselves, rather than Castro, isolated in this hemisphere.

3. China. Here Fulbright makes China's abandonment of Formosa the condition of better relations. This is one of the most pernicious "unthinkables" of U.S. policy. When we deal with a subject on which both sides in the China civil war despite all their other violent differences are agreed, i.e. that Formosa is part of China, we had better reconcile ourselves to this as a fact of life. It is we who someday will have to renounce this distant island on another nation's doorstep.

Who's Snowing Whom?

"Gen Khanh is developing a plan for national mobilization of all personnel and resources in South Vietnam. . . . We will provide the necessary financial assistance. . . . About $50,000,000 will be added to our foreign aid programs as a result."

—Secretary McNamara on NBC-TV "Sunday" Mar. 29.

"Khanh's bold-sounding proposal for a 'national mobilization' . . . so far has produced no results except confusion among government officials and panic among Saigon's non-mobilized youth. . . .

" 'The Vietnamese national mobilization plan has been announced in Washington and written about in Saigon,' said one source close to the Vietnamese government, 'but that's about all that has happened. . . .'

" 'Washington has jumped the gun on this mobilization idea,' one reliable American source said. 'Washington is probably seeking American popular support because more money will be poured in here. So much has been written about the Vietnamese not being with the war effort that Washington wanted to show the American people they are'."

—New York Herald-Tribune from Saigon same day.

4. Vietnam, where Fulbright was poorest. Here he sees the picture askew, as do McNamara and Rusk. The truth is that we are not defending South Vietnam from an invasion. We are continuing the French effort to impose a military dictatorship and foreign control on a people with an ancient sense of nationhood and a deep longing in modern times for democratic government. China's desire for trade with the West, Ho's desire for trade with the South and the National Liberation Front's program for a democratic neutralized South Vietnam provide the elements for a viable settlement. But in this inflammable area, Morse, Mansfield, Bartlett, Gruening, Church and Ellender have been more ready than Fulbright to think the unthinkable.

How the Missile Makers Rob the Government

The missile manufacturers have been robbing the government blind. This, in brief, is the finding of a Senate Government Operations subcommittee. Its report, "Pyramiding of Profits and Costs in the Missile Procurement Program" (Sen. Rept. 970) came from a committee chaired by a Southern conservative, McClellan of Arkansas. It bore the signatures of a Republican as far to the right as Mundt of South Dakota and a Democrat as tender to the missile-aviation lobby as Jackson of Washington. The hearings on which this report was based were held two years ago. The long delay in filing it will lead the knowledgeable to suspect prolonged haggling by the Defense Department and the missile makers to cut this and soft-pedal that. Yet, to McClellan's credit, it emerged as one of the most critical studies of the arms business since the Nye committee inquiry in the 30's.

Still the Same Cost Plus Racket

The McClellan investigation showed that 30 years after cost-plus contracts were outlawed in the wake of the Nye revelations, virtually the same methods are still being used, now thinly disguised as "estimated total costs plus fixed fee." The word "fixed" is to be read in a poetic sense. If the estimates weren't high enough to start with, they can be revised upward. The more the contractor charges, the more he makes, since the fee is a fixed percentage of the whole. In addition, thanks to a new wrinkle in missile procurement, the less the contractor does, the more money he makes. The new practice of making one producer the prime contractor for a whole "weapons system" enables him to pyramid already padded profits.

This is how it worked in making the Nike missile, "by far the largest program for Army ordnance." Each Nike system comprised four major sub-systems: electronic, aeronautical, mechanical and automotive. The last, for example, was the truck on which the missile was carried. Each "sub-system" was separately produced and even separately delivered to the Army. But by making one company, in this case A.T. & T.'s Western Electric, the prime contractor, it could collect an overall fee on the whole job, though 75% of the work was done by others. Thus from 1950 to 1962 it took a 7.9% fee on $1.5 billion in Nike orders, or a profit of $112.5 million. But only $359 million of the work was actually performed by Western Electric. So it actually earned $112 million on $359 million, or a sales markup of 31.3%. It is not surprising that from 1951 to 1960, Western Electric's annual rate of return before taxes on average net investment in doing government business was 28.3%. If the Johnson Administration really wants to save money, it might keep the lights turned on at the White House some night and study these figures.

Why They Insisted on Paying Rent

"Much of Western Electric's Nike production was done at two government surplus plants, which under the ordinary method of doing business with the Government would have been supplied to Western Electric without cost. However Western Electric, instead of having the plants supplied free, rented them from the Government. Western Electric included the rentals as part of its overall costs and then charged the Government a profit on these costs. The total rentals paid to the Government by Western Electric for these plants amounted to over $3,000,000. When added to Western Electric's costs, the rentals generated additional profits to the company of $209,000. In such a situation, there could be little resistance on the part of Western Electric to having the Government raise the rent, because as the rent went up, so did Western Electric's profit, since the complete amount of the rent was repaid by the landlord back to the tenant together with a profit."

—Senate Report on Pyramiding Missile Profits.

Western Electric farmed out the aeronautical, automotive and mechanical "sub-systems." But instead of subcontracting them separately, it made Douglas Aircraft the "prime subcontractor" for all three. This gave Douglas a chance to do the same kind of pyramidal padding, and of course the more Douglas padded, the larger the total on which Western Electric took its overall cut. Douglas Aircraft farmed out the mechanical sub-system to U.S. Steel's Consolidated Western Steel, and the automotive sub-system to Fruehauf Trailer. Douglas then turned in a bill to Western Electric for $645 million plus a 7.6% fee or $46 million. Examination by the committee showed that only 17% of this work was done by Douglas. Its real fee was 44.3%.

The committee found similar pyramiding in the bills submitted for the Atlas and Bomarc missiles. General Dynamics/Astronautics earned a 178% fee on the work actually performed by it as prime contractor for the Atlas. Boeing's success in applying the same methods on the Bomarc are indicated by its average annual rate of return to stockholders' equity during the 10 years 1951-60 on government business. This was 74.3% before taxes and 35.6% after, an extraordinary return on risk-free business.

This pyramiding of profits was soon the target of criticism from government auditors. By 1953 the Army's Chief of Ordnance thought millions of dollars might be saved by buying Nike spare parts and components directly. But the civilian secretaries, in what the McClellan committee calls "an unprecedented action" gave Western Electric a veto over such purchases. It graciously consented to allow direct procurement but only for screwdrivers, pliers, anti-freeze and paper cups!

In negotiating with the missile makers, the Army depends for technical advice on its Missile Command at Redstone Arsenal in Alabama, which theoretically manages 21 missile systems costing more than 2½ billion dollars. "In the 18 years from the time it retained Western Electric," the Army, according to the McClellan report, "has regularly and consistently permitted the competence of its own technical forces at Redstone Arsenal to deteriorate." As a result it has to depend on Western Electric for the facts upon which to make its decisions.

In the Hands of One Army Colonel

As if to make even more sure that it could not bargain effectively, the Army put the bulk of its missile procurement in the hands of one Army Colonel for most of the last ten years, a practice "hardly calculated," the committee observes, "to provide the arms length relationship so essential for proper Government procurement." This Colonel was displeased when an auditor (see box bottom p. 3) called attention to the fact that in one contract Douglas Aircraft was being allowed a total profit of $1.2 million on a total effort of only $3,000. The full amount was paid without question. The Committee notes that the same Colonel is still in charge of contracts with Western Electric and was "distressed to learn from Lt. Gen. John H. Hinrichs, Chief of Army Ordnance, in April 1962 that if production of the multi-billion dollar Zeus [anti-missile] should be ordered" the Army intended to contract the program in the same way through Western Electric.

Instead of eliminating the evils uncovered by these hearings, Secretary McNamara set up ("think-tank" style) a high-sounding Logistics Management Institute, with a board of trustees drawn mainly from the universities, which gave it an academic facade. When we sent a reporter around to find out who actually staffed the Institute, it took two hours of argument before the names were angrily released. It turned out that almost all the staff were from industry, including Douglas, Boeing and General Dynamics. The committee notes sourly that as a result of "reforms" worked out by the Institute the overall fee on the latest Western Electric missile contract went up instead of down.

Just Helping Small Business

"As a matter of fact I think Douglas Aircraft has an enviable record of subcontracting and supporting the small business program. . . . If reasonable profit earned in the discharge of these responsibilities is to be the subject of criticism, then those of us who are attempting to operate in the spirit of the small business program are being penalized."

—Donald W. Douglas, Jr., pres. Douglas Aircraft, before the McClellan committee, April 4, 1962.

"The Douglas subcontracted work amounted to more than $495,000,000 for Nike production. Its total inplant effort amounted to less than $103,000,000. More than $209,000,000 of the Douglas out-of-plant effort was in the Fruehauf Trailer and Consolidated Western Steel (a U.S. Steel subsidiary) subcontracts. These two contracts produced profits for Douglas of over $14,000,000. . . . Douglas argues that important assistance to small business rises from substantial subcontracting. The subcommittee fully concurs that a much larger portion of defense work could and should be given to small businessmen, but it hardly considers Fruehauf Trailer and U.S. Steel as small business."

—McClellan Missile Report March 31, 1964 (and see box below on how Douglas helped a small business man).

Unfortunately the committee's recommendations are not as vigorous as its findings. The committee is torn between its observations and its preconceptions. The Nye committee 30 years ago recommended nationalization of the armament business not only to stop profiteering but to end the sinister influence of these "merchants of death" in the councils of government. Today the armament industry is nationalized in the sense that most of its work is done in government owned plants with government tools and government funds. But industry runs the show. The committee stultified itself by starting from the premise that "unquestionably this nation's great industrial might is best put to use in producing our weapons when properly motivated toward producing a profit."

How Uncle Sam Was Taken For A Ride in A "Redesigned" Nike Missile Truck

"Perhaps the most striking example of savings effected during breakout (the term for breaking a subcontract out of the prime contract and buying directly, to avoid profit pyramiding and to allow competitive bidding—IFS) involved the missile highway transporters. They were designed to carry several Ajax-Nike missiles or parts of the Nike-Hercules missile. The Government had ordered 520 of them from Western Electric. Western Electric subcontracted the job to Douglas Aircraft which in turn sub subcontracted it to Fruehauf Trailer. By the time the 520 trailers were delivered, with the addition of each firm's profits, the trailers bore a price tag of $12,000 each.

"The Government was finally successful in getting permission from Western Electric to procure a quantity of these highway transporters from firms other than Western Electric. It was agreed that some would be procured from Douglas Aircraft, and another lot at the same time directly from Fruehauf Trailer. The price on those bought from Douglas dropped to $10,700; the price on those bought from Fruehauf dropped to $10,300. [Notice that up to this point the contracts had been kept in the same "family" of 3 big firms—IFS.]

"In June 1959 the Government needed another 578 highway transporters. Procurement officials in the Pentagon finally made the decision that this relatively simple trailer could be offered competitively. Bids were sought from various manufacturers throughout the U.S. The winner of the competition was the Henney Motor Co., of Canastota, N.Y., which bid $5,304.31 per unit.

"Shortly after Henney was awarded the contract to produce the 578 trailers, Western Electric made Government funds available to Douglas Aircraft to 'redesign' the highway transporter. . . . Within 6 months after Henney was awarded the contract, the design was so complete that Douglas Aircraft was awarded a contract, in January 1960, to produce 100 of the new transporters. The contract with Henney was terminated after only 266 were produced. Douglas' price for each of the new models was $34,000."

—McClellan report on missile profits. This story had two sequels. The Henney company, which employed 300 to 400 people in its small town area, went out of business. In 1961 a contract for the redesigned truck was put out for competitive bids, and won by a Tulsa concern "which bid $10,000, less than a third of Douglas' price."

This, of course, is the religion of American business. Who holds to it need not be surprised to see the arms monopolists make off with as big a buck per bang as they can steal.

The Same Racket As in Telephones

The committee's first recommendation is for the President to appoint "a high-level study group to reassess the government's procurement practices." This should be apple-pie for our skillful armament wire-pullers. A convocation of stuffed shirts from our better heeled universities could well end up with a recommendation that the government stimulate private enterprise by paying rent on the Pentagon to A.T. & T. It seems to run the place anyway. Whether one studies the missile business or space contracts or satellite communications, or civilian telephone business, one comes sooner or later on an alliance between A.T. & T. and the Pentagon, with the latter as junior partner. This is what makes the committee's second recommendation so naive. This is that, maybe, we ought to regulate the arms monopolists as we do the utilities and the telephone business. The committee seems to be unaware of the fact that the system of profit pyramiding in missile procurement resembles the system by which A.T. & T. has long hamstrung regulation of the telephone business. In the contract pyramid, there is no "privity of contract" for the government below the prime contract, i.e., it cannot inquire into or revise the prices paid subcontractors and sub-subcontractors. In much the same frustrating way Federal and State regulatory agencies are unable to look into the prices Western Electric charges the telephone companies for equipment. The more they pay their corporate alter ego, Western Electric, the more they can charge the public for telephone service.

In this connection I would like to call the attention of the FCC, the public utility commissions and the Justice Department to the table at p. 39 of the McClellan report. The purpose of this table was to show that Western Electric takes a lower markup on its sales to the government than on its non-government business, which is almost entirely telephone equipment. But, in the process of showing this, it also disclosed profits on the telephone business much larger than ever suspected before. The table shows that its profits before taxes as a percentage of net investment on its non-government business in the ten years 1951-60 averaged 22.2% a year, and ran as high in one year as 33%. The rate of return supposed

Boeing Warns Low Profits Imperil Defense

"Serious consideration should be given as to whether the profits now competed for by industry are high enough—high enough, that is, to foster the competition and attract the caliber of management, the technical skills and the capital which will result in the acquisition of the best possible defense equipment at the earliest possible date and for the least total cost. There is great danger to our Nation's continuing ability to protect itself if profits are established at too low a level."

When An Auditor Went "Out of Line" and Objected to Exorbitant Profits

"This report has given the details of the procurement of a group of Nike launcher loaders. In that case, Douglas Aircraft, with total certified inhouse costs of just over $3,000, was permitted to make a profit of over $1,200,000, while with total certified costs of just over $14,000, Western Electric made almost another $1,000,000 in profit. The actual work was done by the third tier sub-subcontractor Consolidated Western Steel [U.S. Steel]. The subcommittee received in exhibit a Government auditor's report in which he was severely critical of the profit rate being taken by Douglas Aircraft. Col. Graham's* reception of this finding is indeed remarkable:

The Chairman (Sen. McClellan): Here is an audit report that says this fee is not reasonable.

Col. Graham: Sir, it is not normally the responsibility of an Air Force auditor or a Navy cost inspector to comment on fees.

The Chairman: You think he was out of line, then, in making the comment that the fee was not reasonable?

Col. Graham: I do not say he was out of line, sir. I simply say it is normally not part of his responsibility.

The Chairman: He was not censured for doing it, was he?

Col. Graham: I have not any power of censure over the Air Force auditors, sir.

"Col. Graham has auditors, lawyers, price analysts and technical advisers to assist him in arriving at prices that are fair and equitable to the Government:

Mr. [Jerome S.] Adlerman [general counsel, the McClellan subcommittee]: Did this (auditor's report) go through four, five or six boards?

Col. Graham: It went through two boards and my own office.

Mr. Adlerman: And nobody commented on it?

Col. Graham: I can't find any evidence in the file that they did.

"The subcommittee must conclude that something was seriously amiss at the New York Ordnance District when a comment of unreasonableness, containing the shocking figures that it did, would go unnoticed or uncommented upon, through various stages of review, all of which we set up as a result of past congressional investigations in order to close serious drains of Federal funds. . . . It cannot be claimed that this item just slipped through as an unimportant one, because this was a major expenditure in the most important program in the largest Army Ordnance district office."

—McClellan committee report on missile profits.

 Col. John Wm. Graham, in charge of the New York Ordnance District since 1953; contracting officer on $2 billion of the $2½ billion in contracts awarded to Western Electric on the Nike missile; he "remains to this day as the Army's contracting officer with Western Electric."

We Need to Know More About the Missile Monopolists Than Their Profits to be allowed the telephone monopoly by regulation is between 6 and 7%. This is all it could make on its equipment, too, were it not for the device of putting it in a separate wholly owned corporation, out of regulatory reach.

Corporations may not have souls but they sometimes seem to have a sense of humor. In 1957 there was a conference at Redstone Arsenal to discuss a rising volume of complaint about Western Electric's missile profits. Its vice-president, Fred Lack, pleaded "that Western is regulated by the Public Utility Commission [sic], who constantly look over their shoulders. If the Government profits were reduced, the Commission might suggest that telephone profits be reduced." We had to go on paying more for missiles so we could go on being charged more for telephone calls.

The Military and Anti-Trust

It is a pity there is no other committee of Congress to take up the task of investigation where the McClellan committee left off and look into the influence of A.T. & T. on the missile race itself. Its influence in other spheres is documented, if not widely known. Senator Long of Louisiana, in the unsuccessful filibuster against the communications satellite bill put the whole story into the Congressional Record on August 17, 1962. He asked the Senate then, "Is the Department of Defense a secret arm of the American Telephone & Telegraph Company?" For 30 years the Pentagon has helped A.T. & T fight off attempts to break up the Western Electric combination and force competition in telephone equipment. The military bureaucracy tried to prevent Attorney General Clark from filing an anti-trust suit for this purpose in the Truman Administration and it helped A.T. & T. defeat the suit with a consent decree in the Eisenhower Administration. The Pentagon went so far as to slip private government memoranda to A.T. & T. when a House committee under Celler investigated this whole sellout.

As far back as the years before the first World War, parliamentary investigations in Germany and England began to expose the role played by arms makers in fomenting tension, suspicion and war. A corporation like A.T. & T. is a faceless private collectivity cranked up for one purpose only and that is profit. It is as intrinsically un-moral as an IBM machine. What part did it and other missile makers play in the fake missile gap hysteria before the 1960 elections? In the decision to go ahead and build a stupefying total of some 1200 missiles even after the gap was found to be non-existent? In the plan for a $5 billion dollar multilateral missile force in NATO, which has the additional advantage to the missile monopoly of blocking disarmament negotiations? What is their influence in the Pentagon now that we stand at a fateful crossroads? Down one road lies relaxation of tension and a minimum missile deterrent. Down the other lies a $20 billion anti-missile program which will raise the arms race and tension to new heights and force our cities to begin to move underground in vast blast shelters. We ought in self-defense to know more about A.T. & T. and General Dynamics and Boeing than their profits.

Multi-Million Dollar Free Ride Dept.

"Figures were introduced by the subcommittee staff showing Douglas Aircraft profits of $63,800,000. Donald Douglas testified that the corporate profits were only $34,000,000 before taxes, if consideration was given to costs unreimbursed under the contracts. Attempts were made during the hearings to get a breakdown on the apparent discrepancy between subcommittee figures and Douglas figures. Douglas insisted that the disallowed costs were specifically assignable to the Nike contracts. . . .

"The hearings on the Nike program ended on April 18, 1962. On April 27, 1962, the chairman received from Douglas the requested breakdown of the $34 million. The subcommittee learned to its amazement that Mr. Douglas claimed that the $34,000,000 discrepancy consisted of more than $23,000,000 in costs incurred in the development of the DC-8 commercial jet airliner, that more than $1,000,000 additional related to costs incurred in developing the DC-7 commercial aircraft, the DC-6 commercial aircraft, and even the DC-3 commercial aircraft. The latter was a pre-World War II airplane."

Fulbright on The Cost of the Cold War, P. 2

Prophetic Warning From One of the Victims in Brazil's Reign of Terror

"This [industrial] development of which we are so proud has brought about no change at all in the living conditions of three-fourths of the country's population. Its main feature has been a growing concentration of income, both socially and geographically. . . . The majority of the Brazilian population has reaped no benefit. . . . Economic development has produced social results of an extremely negative character. Because of the anachronistic structure of Brazilian agriculture, it has led in many regions to a relative increase in the rent from land, thus rewarding parisitic groups. Similarly . . . a variety of subsidies—in the name of development—have very often put a premium on investments which . . . fostered a still greater concentration of income in the hands of privileged groups. . . .

"Over half of the Brazilian population gets its living from the land. If this sector maintains its present rigidity, every peasant movement will tend rapidly to adopt revolutionary techniques of the Marxist-Leninist type. . . . The imposition of a right-wing dictatorship, making the whole political structure rigid, would also create favorable conditions for an effective revolution of the Marxist-Leninist type. . . .

"If we are to avoid dictatorial regimes, whether of a social class or ideological group or rigid party machine, we must (a) prevent all forms of retrogression in our social and political systems and (b) create conditions for fast and effective change in the country's archaic agrarian structure. . . . Political retrogression will not come haphazardly, but as a reflection of panic among some privileged groups. . . . Where structures are rigid, preventing gradual adjustment, these pressures may create cataclysmic situations, leading to emergency solutions or preventive coups."

—Celso Furtado, then Minister of Economic Planning under Goulart, now banned from politics by the military, writing in Foreign Affairs, April 1963.

VOL. XII, NO. 16 APRIL 20, 1964 WASHINGTON, D. C. 15 CENTS

A New Alianza — for Reaction and Revolution

The attitude of the American government on Brazil is a tragedy. In the gigantic struggle now underway between Moscow and Peking for leadership of the revolutionary movement in the colonial world, our government's blind folly aids the Chinese. As Maurice Duverger wrote in an article "End of 'Kennedyism'?" in Le Monde April 10, the overthrow of Goulart helps one understand "why Marx wrote a century ago that ruling classes would never accept without violence the loss of their privileges." In a world of thermonuclear weapons, peace is a necessity and peaceful reform its corollary. Revolutionary uprisings in Latin America will poison the atmosphere of politics at home and abroad, making humane policy less likely. The world is sick of hatred and killing, whether among nations, races or classes; the embers have barely cooled in Auschwitz and Hiroshima. Yet now we have made the dispossessed in Brazil and elsewhere feel that their misery cannot be ended without bloodshed. The Kennedy Administration, for all its failings, at least gave them some hope. President Johnson had best stop now and realize that he is extinguishing it.

Even A Token Land Reform

The nature of the new Brazilian regime was made unmistakable by the first act of its military chief, Gen. Branco. This was to cancel Goulart's land reform decree. It would have affected only some 3 percent of Brazil's privately owned land. It was based (London Financial Times, April 2) on an unused law 22 years old which allowed the government to requisition land up to 6 miles on either side of all roads, railways and canals. It was the only legal device available to Goulart. It was not more than a token gesture in a country where 60% of the people depend on farming for their livelihood but 8% of the landowners own 75% of the tilled land. For years we have been preaching agrarian reform to Latin America. Now we support a military regime which has blocked its first beginnings in Brazil. Last July when the Brazilian Chamber of Deputies was within reach of an agreement on broader measures of land reform, two extreme right wing parties blocked it. The leaders of those parties, Governor Lacerda of Guanabara and Gov. de Barros of Sao Paulo were the chief civilian architects of the anti-Goulart uprising and are now the favorites of U.S. policy. The Roman Catholic Bishops of Brazil issued a collective statement last July in favor of agrarian reform, declaring that payment in bonds rather than cash would not be a violation of property rights. But Goulart's message to Congress March 15 asking a constitutional amendment authorizing such payment was among the excuses for the military take-over.

Scholar-Statesman at Work

Mr. John SCALI (ABC State Dept Corr): Do you think that what happened in Brazil advanced the cause of democracy in the Western Hemisphere?

Mr. McGeorge BUNDY (Spec. Asst. to the President for International Security Affairs): Yes, I do.

—On ABC-TV's Issues and Answers, April 5.

The constitutional reforms Goulart proposed to Congress would have created a more democratic Brazil. He asked that the literacy test on the right to vote be lifted and that in the Army the non-commissioned officers and privates be given the same right of the ballot now enjoyed only by the officers. Today Brazil though a nation of close to 80 millions has a Congress elected by 11 million. The privileged were especially reluctant to see the vote extended to the lower ranks of the

A Second Great Speech by Fulbright: The Cold War in American Life

"Too Much To Pay For Life in a Honky-Tonk"

By Senator William Fulbright *

Of all the changes wrought in American life by the cold war, the most important by far, in my opinion, has been the massive diversion of energy and resources from the creative pursuits of civilized society to the conduct of a costly and interminable struggle for world power. The result has been accumulating neglect of those things which bring happiness and beauty and fulfillment into our lives.

The cold war has put a premium on avoiding innovation at home because new programs involve controversy as well as expense and it is felt that we cannot afford domestic division at a time when external challenges require us to maintain the highest possible degree of national unity. This is the price that we have been paying for the cold war, and it has been a high price indeed.

The Consent of the Misgoverned

At least as striking as the inversion of priorities which the cold war has enforced upon American life is the readiness with which the American people have consented to defer programs for their welfare and happiness in favor of costly military and space programs. Indeed, if the Congress accurately reflects the temper of the country, then the American people are not only willing, they are eager, to sacrifice education and urban renewal and public health programs—to say nothing of foreign aid—to the requirements of the Armed Forces and the space agency. I sometimes suspect that in its zeal for armaments, the Congress tends to overrepresent those of our citizens who are extraordinarily agitated about national security and vigorous about making their agitation known.

Without becoming militarist in the sense of committing themselves to the military virtues as standards of personal behavior, the American people have nonetheless come to place great—and, in my opinion, excessive—faith in military solutions to political problems. We are permitting the vast Military Establishment largely to run itself, to determine its own needs, and to tell us what sacrifices are expected of us.

A Malady That Outlived McCarthy

"The fears and passions of ideological conflict have diverted the minds and energies of our people from the constructive tasks of a free society to a morbid preoccupation with the dangers of Communist aggression abroad and subversion and disloyalty at home. The problem did not end with the McCarthy era of a decade ago nor is it confined to the neurotic fantasies of today's radical right. The cold war malady affects a much broader spectrum of American society. It affects millions of sensible and intelligent citizens whose genuine concern with national security has persuaded them that the prosecution of the cold war is our only truly essential national responsibility."

—Sen. Fulbright at the U. of North Carolina, Apr. 5.

The abnegation of responsibility by the Congress in this field is strikingly illustrated by its debates or, more accurately, nondebates, on the defense budget. When, for example, Senator McGovern, of South Dakota, suggested last September that defense spending might be reduced by five percent, the Senate, with virtually no discussion, voted the McGovern amendment down by a vote of 70 to 2. Again this year, Congress is speeding the enactment of the Defense budget with splendid indifference to its size and content.

Many Americans may regard huge military and space programs as the only truly urgent requirements on our national agenda, but it is difficult to believe that this enthusiasm is shared by the 4.2 million Americans who are unemployed or by the 30 million Americans who have incomes of less than $3,000 a year.

The cold war has diverted us from problems both quantitative and qualitative. The quantitative problem is essentially to devise ways of elevating the one-fifth of our people who live in poverty to the level of the four-fifths who live in greater material abundance than any other society in human history. While the attention and energy of our public policy have been focused through these postwar years on crises in Berlin and Cuba and the Far East, America has been more and more taking on the physical appearance and the cultural atmosphere of a honky-tonk of continental proportions.

FCC Chairman Says TV More Concerned With Its Commercials Than Its Freedom

"During the past year the Commission renewed the licenses of the Pacifica Foundation radio stations which had been on deferred status for over three years. Complaints originally came to the Commission from several sources and varied from disgust over allegedly obscene programming to charges of the possible affiliation of key personnel with the Communist Party.

"When a regulatory agency is called upon to handle allegedly obscene communists, it indeed has a hot potato on its hands. The Pacifica potato was admittedly handled gingerly for too many months, but I am proud that the Commission showed its calluses while I was its Chairman. It issued a forceful, broad-gauged opinion clearing Pacifica of the charges levied against it. In my judgment, this action will stand as a bulwark against the enemies of free broadcasting and free speech.

"At every public meeting of broadcasters I have attended, a speaker has only to declare himself in favor of "freedom" to be rewarded by an automatic burst of applause. If ever there was a time when the freedom of broadcasting was at stake, this was it. Who took action in this case?

"Which State Association sent delegations to Congress charging that the FCC had deferred the Pacifica licenses for an unwarranted period and was operating outside its jurisdiction? Which of you wrote me a letter urging the Commission to dismiss these charges and to reaffirm the Commission's time-honored adherence to the principles of free broadcasting?

"When you display more interest in defending your freedom to suffocate the public with commercials than in upholding your freedom to provide provocative variety—when you cry "Censorship!" and call for faith in the founding fathers only to protect your balance sheet—when you remain silent in the face of a threat which could shake the first amendment's proud oak to its very roots—you tarnish the ideals enshrined in the Constitution."

—FCC Chairman William Henry to the National Association of Broadcasters, April 7 (abridged).

Mississippi Appealed to Black's Dissent in the Case of A Negro Communist

Ironic Aspects of the Supreme Court's Decision in Barnett Contempt Case

From a Negro point of view the Supreme Court's decision in the Barnett case must seem another example of how the law somehow bends to the white man. Though the Court 5-to-4 upheld the right to try Governor Barnett and Lt. Gov. Johnson of Mississippi for criminal contempt without a jury, it warned in a footnote that the conviction might be reversed if the penalty imposed were not a "petty" one.

In the perspective of the long struggle to end summary trial without a jury of criminal contempts, this was a gain. For the first time there seems to be a majority on the Court prepared to uphold trial by jury in criminal contempts where substantial penalties are imposed. Negroes may note bitterly that this swing toward the liberal side came in the case of a Mississippi governor whose defiance of Federal law cost two deaths and risked the life of James Meredith.

Red Menace But . . .

The pleadings by the State of Mississippi make curious reading. On the one hand its Attorney General, Joe T. Patterson, invoked the Red menace. If the U.S. may punish the State, he argued, "by unlawfully impeaching, pauperizing and imprisoning the Governor, we need not wait for Communism to destroy our great Constitution." On the other hand, he appealed to Mr. Justice Black's reasoning in a dissent six years ago on behalf of two Communists, one of them a Negro, Henry Winston, who lost his sight under prison treatment.

In that case, Green v. U.S., a majority 5-to-4 upheld 3-year sentences for criminal contempt without a jury trial on Winston and Gil Green for their flight from a Smith Act conviction. Black argued that convictions for criminal contempt without a jury trial were unconstitutional. He led a dissenting minority of four liberals again in defense of Barnett. But this time there was a difference in the outcome. The same majority (except for White) which was willing to uphold a 3-year sentence on the two Communists now warns that it will reverse sentence on Barnett and Johnson unless it is a minor penalty. Otherwise there must be a jury trial.

On this issue Mississippi invoked the history of labor's long fight against "government by injunction." The story of how a Federal judge broke the Pullman strike in 1895 and sent its leader, the Socialist Debs, to jail without a trial is retold in Mississippi's brief with an indignation that comes strangely from the State where labor's rights to this day are least respected.

None of this was really relevant. Nowhere did the pleadings or the court touch on the essential realities. Barnett and Johnson were far more guilty than Green and Winston of conspiring to overthrow the government by force and violence. This was rebellion and Barnett should have been jailed under martial law. In leaving defiance, weakly, to the courts and contempt citation, the government got entangled in the jury trial issue, which was confusing and misleading.

Trial by jury derived from the idea of preventing feudal class oppression by letting a man be judged by his "peers," i.e. his own class. The jury system breaks down where (1) a dominant white majority is determined to oppress a Negro minority and (2) the case involves not enforcement of criminal law but of racial justice. Before a jury of his peers, Barnett was sure of acquittal. Even under this ruling, after some light penalty, he will get away, literally, with murder and emerge a hero.

Better Speak Up Now

Two hundred women from 25 States came to Washington last week to lobby for peace in Vietnam, and heard Senator Gruening (D. Alaska) tell them it is time the U.S. got out of a civil war we should never have entered in the first place. All the polls show the handful of Senators like Gruening who call for peace speak for substantial, perhaps majority, opinion. But unless other organizations follow the example of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom and begin sending delegations here, we may plunge further into this war. A Wall St. Journal story (April 13) says the U.S. is already arming the South Vietnamese with bombers that can reach Hanoi and that the decision to let them loose will depend on how the White House sizes up the effect on the election. The Khanh regime is fast falling apart, and the alternative to a negotiated peace is full-scale U.S. entrance into the war. Now's the time to speak up.

How Red Herring and Racism Were Dragged In Against the Landrum (Anti-Poverty) Bill

Mr. REUTHER (UAW): The rich are getting richer and the poor are getting poorer. . . . In 1953 the richest 1% of the nation's families got 24% of the family income. In 1955 they got 26%; in 1961, 28%.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (R. N.J.): You can advocate sharing the wealth, Mr. Reuther, but that will not get us to the problem of discussing this bill this morning.

Mr. REUTHER: I am not advocating sharing the wealth. This whole question of how we learn to share abundance is the key to the future of our society.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN: I found his statement to be extremely provocative. It smacked to me of socialism, and perhaps this Landrum bill with its billion dollar expenditure will be one small step in that direction.

Mr. REUTHER: I would like to be invited back, if you will give me enough time to have a philosophical discussion about what socialism is. It is quite obvious that you don't understand what socialism is.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN: Is it your feeling that this Landrum bill should be aimed primarily at alleviating the problems of the Negroes?

Mr. REUTHER: Obviously the fight against poverty should be color-blind. But the Negroes, because they have been discriminated against more than any other group, would get a larger benefit out of this because they are the victims of poverty more than any other group.

Mr. LANDRUM (D. Ga): I want to have it clearly understood with reference to this bill under my name, and I am proud to have my name upon it, any assistance that it might be providing towards the Negro race is a source of pride to me. I come from a section of the country that has been bombarded with a great deal of demagoguery. There are many, many Negroes in the country who are poor.

I join the distinguished labor leader here, with whom I have disagreed on many points. I join him in saying that this effort to remove poverty from the American scene must be color blind.

—Before the Senate Educ. & Labor Com., Apr. 9 (abr.).

The Regime We Hailed as Constitutional Is A Reign of Terror

armed forces which had developed (as The Times of London noted in an editorial April 2) "a strong sense of kinship with the civilian labor movement, increasingly frustrated by economic development which seems always to enrich those who already have enough without doing much for those who have almost nothing." Even with the restricted franchise, when Goulart 16 months ago put to a plebiscite the question of restoring strong presidential powers, he won 9 to 1 over the same military and right wing opposition which has overthrown him. These are the men we praise as defenders of democracy.

Not Smart Politics

Our national leadership must look pretty poor to sophisticated Latin Americans. Why the rush to approve the Brazilian coup d'etat before the situation had clarified? There seem to have been two counter-revolutions. The first was the overthrow of Goulart and his replacement by the president of the Chamber of Deputies, Senhor Mazzili. This could be disguised as constitutional, if you overlooked the fact that the military had deposed the President. This revolt was followed in a few days by a second one, when the Congress refused to grant sweeping purge powers asked of it by the military and Lacerda's extreme right wing party. The first revolt had the support of centrist and moderate right parties. The second did not. The regime as it emerged from the second revolution has the support only of the extreme right and the military. It is so rigid that it is bound to defeat itself. Shrewder middle of the road politicians like former President Kubitschek, who realize that some social reform is necessary, see the U.S. supporting die-hard elements who have only minority support even in the favored classes. The difference between Kubitschek and Lacerda is like the difference between a Taft and a McCarthy, between a thoughtful conservative and an unscrupulous rightist demogague. To put our chips on Lacerda and the military is not smart politics.

No enemy could have hurt us more than our own action in endorsing as constitutional a military regime which has purged one-tenth of the Brazilian Congress, jailed at least two State Governors among thousands arrested, dissolved Peasant League and labor unions in the impoverished northeast, and ended freedom of the press. The military chiefs have imposed an "institutional act" Congress refused to pass. "While the measure is aimed at Communists and leftist extremists," the Washington Star explained April 12, "no proof of Red activities is required nor is any judicial appeal provided." This is a reign of terror. The jails are full. Two ships in Rio harbor are being used for the overflow. So is the island of Fernand Noronha, on which we have a tracking station. Johnson, Rusk and McGeorge Bundy hail all this as a triumph of freedom. The leader of the moderate Labor Party in the chamber of Deputies spoke history's verdict when he protested "There is no justice, no law, no order in the Brazilian nation now. It would be better in these circumstances to shut down Congress and do away with this farce of democracy" (London Times from Rio, April 6). What he calls farce we call the new Johnsonian pragmatism. As the Scripps Howard man at State Department explained (Washington Daily News, April 3) there are "Good military coups as well as bad ones. The one in Brazil this week exemplified the good kind . . . Bad democratic elections as well as good ones. The one in Chile next September may demonstrate that." When we fear the democratic verdict, we invite the military to take over. This is a new Alianza—for reaction and revolution.

Goulart's Own Ignored Defense

Montevideo, Uruguay, April 5 (AP)—Joao Goulart, ousted President of Brazil, said his regime and the reforms it fostered were to prevent a Communist takeover. Asked about charges by those who led the revolt that his government was becoming Communist, Goulart replied: "That was the great banner waved against my government and I was highly mystified."

Action on land expropriation, banking regulations, administrative and taxation changes was "to restrain Communism in Brazil," Goulart declared.

These proposals, he added, were constitutional and were designed to "gain maximum democracy, to defend the popular economy and the poor people of Brazil."

Time We Caught Up To The Rest of the Capitalist World

The war on poverty may become more manageable if we begin by regarding ours as an underdeveloped country—underdeveloped in its ideas. For a half century, since the outbreak of the first World War, the business man has brainwashed this country into so pious a belief in something called free enterprise that we are incapable of facing the real problems of a real world. A simple-minded horror of socialism and a simple-minded faith that the business man knows best are at the root of our troubles in foreign and domestic policy. It explains, for example, our slap-happy attitude toward the Brazilian coup, and it explains why the war on poverty proceeds in a benevolent fog.

A Real Political Difference at Last

This fog will not clear up until we begin to recognize that unaided free enterprise is failing, and that we cannot successfully wage the war on poverty without adopting "socialistic" measures, such as overall economic planning through the Federal government. It is the great virtue of the report filed by the Senate's subcommittee on employment and manpower under Senator Clark (D. Pa.) that it says this, though tentatively and gingerly. Indeed it opens up, for a change, a meaningful difference in our two party system, long stalled on a stale dead center. Here the five other Democrats on the subcommittee—Randolph, W. Va., McNamara, Mich., Pell, R.I., Kennedy, Mass., and Metcalf, Mont.—stand with the chairman for reactivating the Employment Act of 1946 and making it an instrument of economic planning. Of the three Republicans, Prouty of Vt. and Jordan of Idaho, attack this as "guided capitalism" while the third, Javits of New York, oscillates between his liberal insights and his need to keep his party card. On the one hand he recognizes that the government "must play its own positive role in the private sector of the economy." On the other hand he feels that "the subcommittee's majority proposal implies a note of rigidity and planning inconsistent with a free economy." It's hard to be a Republican.

It's also not easy to be a liberal Democrat. Note the word "implied" in that last quotation from Javits. The majority were so nervous about their main recommendation that they buried it in a very muffled report—somewhat like a man trying to talk through a heavy blanket—and left the most important observations to implication. It was left to the minority to state clearly what the majority was afraid to say. This is how Prouty and Jordan put it. "Implicit in the majority's proposals," they wrote, "is the assumption that if the establishment of overall national economic goals is desirable, then the establishment of growth targets for specific industries would be even more desirable." So it would.

If our mixed society were invigorated by an infusion of socialist thinking, we would recognize boldly that poverty represents an untapped market, that unemployed hands are potential wealth, that the presence of idle facilities and resources they can work upon, is not a curse but an opportunity. The Federal government ought to do more than set general goals. There is no reason why it cannot inventory specific needs for specific industries. If we knew how many pairs of shoes, how much plumbing, how much lumber, and how much clothing would be needed to raise the miserable millions on the fringe of our society to decent living standards, we would see the market and the jobs the war on poverty could open.

When LeMay Asked for 100 Megatons

Mr. MAHON (D. Tex. Chrm. Subcom. on Defense Appropriations): You were talking about the Russians being able to do this and that. As a result of this philosophy of what the Russians could do a few years ago we developed the bomber gap and we appropriated $800 million, I believe, to stop the bomber gap and later we were told there was no bomber gap.

As a result of this same reasoning as to what the Russians could do, we developed the missile gap. Everyone admitted generally speaking there was a missile gap. Now we come along later and everyone says there never was a missile gap.

Now, are you by this testimony opening up a so-called megatonnage gap which will never occur and which will be just as phony as the bomber and the missile gap?

Gen. LeMay: This is entirely possible, Mr. Chairman.

—1965 Defense Budget hearings rel. April 14.

The majority nowhere dare speak in such concrete terms. But the mere suspicion of such a possibility fills the minority with alarm. In sounding it they make a revealing admission. This admission shows how backward our own country is compared with the other advanced capitalist countries. "It is not too much to say," Senators Prouty and Jordan protest, "that the majority's recommendations eventually would replace our system of decentralized decision-making by millions of individuals and businesses with a system of economic planning and control by the Central Government. This," they then admit, "is the drift of affairs in other Western countries. [Our italics.] The U.S. surely will be pushed in the same direction if the economic planners among us have their way."

To understand this more fully let us turn back to the majority report. The majority report recommends action to reduce the level of unemployment in this country to 3% by 1968. This, under the most optimistic assumptions, will require a $5 billion dollar a year increase in Federal expenditures and considerable "guidance" from the Federal government. Actually (according to a financial page column by Harvey H. Segal in the Washington Post April 20) unemployment has fallen below 3% in the past half century only

Another Urgent Peace Warning The Press Ignored, Despite Startling Revelations

Morse Declares War Already Being Extended Secretly into North Vietnam

The press blackout on the handful of Senators opposing the war in Vietnam is scandalous. Senator Gruening of Alaska called attention April 15 to the fact that American casualties this year were twice those of last and said that in his five years in the Senate "I have never received mail comparable in volume and in virtual unanimity to the recommendation I made on March 10 that the U.S. should get out of South Vietnam." This is another index of how poorly the press reflects opinion. The worst example of suppression was the failure to report Senator Morse's speech of April 14 with its sensational revelations from Aviation Week. We give the gist of this in the abridgement and the box below.

By Wayne Morse

In the April 6 issue of Aviation Week (see box below) there is a very interesting article. I do not know how it happened to get into print. The story points out that operations have gone beyond the borders of South Vietnam. That has been a growing practice. I am reading these paragraphs because I have heard Senators say in the cloakroom that they really do not think there is much danger that the war will be escalated into North Vietnam. If the advocates of our present policy could only get a wide section of American public support for that kind of operation, we would start losing American boys by the scores.

Nuclear Weapons to Be Used

Mr. President, we cannot answer charges that will be made against us if we escalate the war into North Vietnam. If we escalate it into North Vietnam, I warn the Senate that the plan is to use nuclear weapons. I have been heard to say before that if we drop nuclear weapons on North Vietnam, we had better start looking around the world for friends.

In looking at the consequences if we used nuclear weapons to escalate this war into North Vietnam, we ought to be forthright enough as a nation to say, "We want to do everything we can to try to settle this dispute in South Vietnam by resorting to peaceful procedures of international law." We have not tried that. We have not even tried to use it. We have not endeavored to create a SEATO trusteeship, or to pursue the meaning of what de Gaulle had in mind concerning a program for neutralizing this area of the world.

Better Recheck Those Computers

"Today the government of General Khanh is vigorously rebuilding the machinery of administration. . . . He is an able and energetic leader. He has demonstrated his grasp. . . ."

—Secretary McNamara: speech on Vietnam, Mar. 26

SAIGON—Vietnamese political observers say a coup against Premier Maj. Gen. Nguyen Khanh is only a matter of time. These observers, who accurately predicted the two previous coups, feel a third coup is inevitable — either through assassination or military might. In fact these observers predict a fourth coup: 'The next coup will solve nothing. Anyone can seize power, but no one has enough support to stay in.' Gen. Khanh is concerned enough to sleep in a different house each night, to admit to foreign correspondents that his wife is worried and to house her and their 4 children 350 miles from Saigon."

—New York Herald-Tribune, April 19.

The newspapers today stated that there is some evidence the Vietcongs are trained in North Vietnam. I do not think there is any doubt about that—just as the South Vietnamese are trained by U.S. military. All that means is that two foreign powers are training the participants in a civil war.

I am greatly concerned about the danger of escalating the war. I think we ought to give a great deal of heed to the article from which I read.

The article shows that we have already aided and abetted the extension of the war beyond the borders of South Vietnam. I am fearful that as the proof of that becomes clearly established—as I believe it can be—we may wake up some morning to find charges being levelled against us in the United Nations because I do not believe we have any international law basis for being in South Vietnam as a combatant.

Aviation Week Disclosures Show McNamara Not Telling The Truth

Saigon—War against the Communists already has erupted over the borders of South Vietnam in hit-and-run guerrilla raids and infiltration moves as far north as China. . . . With U.S. backing in aircraft, weapons and money, an estimated 50,000 elite South Vietnamese troops are being trained to take the offensive in over-the-border strikes at Communist supply centers and communications routes. Despite Defense Secretary McNamara's implication in Washington March 26 that the decision has not yet been made to extend the war, it is known here that guerrilla strikes against the Communists have been increasing since last summer. . . .

Key factor in the current raids is airlift provided by Air America, a U.S. cargo company incorporated in Delaware under a maze of legal obscurities that camouflage its U.S. government sponsorship. . . . U.S. military advisers here are optimistic that extending the war beyond the borders, plus a stable government in Saigon, will force the Communist insurgency to collapse in a year. . . .

Special forces, which now constitute one-tenth of the half million South Vietnamese under arms, are essentially airborne troops not connected with any formal military organization. They rely on Air America. . . . In its open operations Air America is a parent company of the Civil Air Transport (CAT) airline. . . . But in its covert operations, Air America uses numerous secret airstrips in South Vietnam and Thailand. . . .

Hub of Air America's activities in Southeast Asia—open and secret—is Din Muang airport at Bangkok, Thailand. . . . Southern Laos, the principal pathway for reinforcements from North to South Vietnam, is only 125 miles wide. By operating from fields in Eastern Thailand and from the northern part of South Vietnam, Air America can penetrate to the interior of Laos on relatively short flights. . . .

Air America has been flying in Laos under charter to the U.S. Aid Mission in Vientiane (Laos). Much of this work consisted of hauling medicines, food and clothing to refugees of the Laotian civil war. On March 18, after protests by the Communist Pathet Lao that Air America was mixing its relief airlift with military airlift, Seaboard World Services was hired for the refugee airlift job. . . .

Last Fall when U.S. officials decided that it was impossible to win the war by confining it inside South Vietnamese borders, they began an expanded program of training the special guerrilla forces at secret bases. Courses emphasized techniques of operating beyond national borders."

—"South Vietnamese Raiders Extending War" from Aviation Week (April 6).

A Step-by-Step Account of How A Phoney Story Was Deflated

Theodore Draper's "Scoop" About A Secret U.S. Aid Offer to Castro

The phoniest yarn of the past week was Max Frankel's page one story in the New York Times April 13 on Theodore Draper's article, "Fulbright and Cuba" in the New Leader of that date. Draper claimed that just before Castro closed his trade agreement with Mikoyan in February of 1960, "the U.S. made an effort—until now a closely guarded secret on both sides—to offer Fidel Castro's regime aid and cooperation." Frankel wrapped this all up as a work of high scholarship.

Weasel Words at State Dept.

The State Department's reaction that day was as phoney. Its spokesman, when asked about the story, said the U.S. in 1959 and early 1960 had "repeatedly . . . indicated to the Cuban government its desire to hold full and frank discussions." But in the course of questioning he admitted that in these "exploratory exchanges . . . the question of U.S. aid did not arise."

Next day the State Department was asked about a follow-up story from Roy Rubottom, then Assistant Secretary of State for Latin American Affairs. Rubottom claimed he had offered Castro aid in that period. The spokesman said that during Castro's visit here in April, 1959, Rubottom met with some of the officials who accompanied Castro "and invited them to indicate Cuba's needs." He said the Cubans "rebuffed Mr. Rubottom's offer." The next question was, "Can you say how?" The answer was, "I would assume by simply being unresponsive." This colloquy followed:

"Q. Well, what does that mean? Why indicate Cuba's needs? What types of needs are you referring to there?

"A. In terms of economic programs.

"Q. Are you suggesting this was the last attempt ever made with the Castro government?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Well how does that fit in with your statement yesterday that no aid was offered to them?

"A. The matter at hand yesterday was the story involving a year later, which was the subject of a news story.

"Q. Can you be more specific about this offer, Bob? You say 'invited them to indicate Cuba's needs.' Was this a formal session with a formal presentation, and an extensive discussion or just a brief—

"A. Well it was formal in the sense that it invited a submission of some ideas on areas in which the U.S. could be helpful.

After the spokesman admitted that Castro himself was not present at these "discussions," another question finally cut through the fog to solid ground:

"Q. Was there ever a time in which the U.S. indicated its desire to talk about Cuba's economic needs to Fidel Castro himself?

"A. Not that I am aware of."

Next day the New York Times (April 15) printed a letter from Sergio Rojas Santamarina, a former Cuban Ambassador who in June 1960 took refugee in the Argentine embassy in Havana. He claimed the Argentine Ambassador as intermediary for U.S. Ambassador Bonsal offered Castro $300,000,000 in U.S. aid if Castro would end his "vicious campaigning" against the U.S. and negotiate outstanding differences. But when the former Argentine ambassador himself was interviewed (New York Times, April 19) he denied that he had conveyed any "specific offer of financial aid" in his talks with Castro.

Lest Cuba Flourish

"Bleak as this sounds, U.S. officials hasten to disavow any notion that economic woes threaten Castro's downfall. . . . The Castro government can probably claim some recent headway in improving the lot of the average Cuban. . . . Distribution problems are being untangled; transportation is improving; rationing may even be eased on some items this year. 'You just can't sink this island economically,' says one veteran of the Cuban scene. Adds a colleague, 'Every day Castro remains in power, he becomes less weak politically.' But U.S. officials do think their economic squeeze on the island is making Cuba, as one puts it, 'look a lot less rich than it otherwise might' to other Latin lands. And that is a major aim of the U.S. trade embargo. . . ."

—Wall St. Journal, "Troubled Cuba", April 16

How to Speak to the National Press Club and Keep Every Word You Say Out of Print

Q. On the basis of your experience with Castro, would you classify him as a wild-eyed irrational kook?

A. Castro is crazy like a fox. Castro has been brilliantly —there is no adverb I can think of that is more appropriate—playing the U.S. against Russia, and both against Communist China, for some years and with considerable success. The fact is that whether or not various elements in the U.S. want to realize it, the island of Cuba belongs to Castro. These oversimplifications of Castro being a pawn of Khrushchev are simply absurd. His relationship with Khrushchev can be likened to looking through two ends of a telescope. Khrushchev may be looking through his end and seeing how Castro is serving his purposes, but I can assure you Castro is looking through his end and he knows how he is using Khrushchev.

Q. Do you believe Communist Cuba will develop a viable economy and is the U.S. missing the boat by not maintaining political and commercial contact with the Cuban people?

A. The Cuban economy has been in very great difficulty. This has been due to a variety of factors, especially at the outset to a shortage of spare parts since virtually everything in Cuba came from the U.S. I am not in a position to appraise how effective the embargo has been. It has not deterred a number of our allies from making an honest dollar. I am sure, however, of this: No one is hungry in Cuba.

He also unquestionably has been growing in strength. His primary drive has been toward the youth of Cuba. Lenin once said, 'Give me the children of a country for four years and I can assure its future.' Castro is now in his sixth year with these children. There is no question that among them, whether one wishes to attribute it to the government schools, the heavy indoctrination and characterize it as brain-wash—however one wants to characterize it—there is no question but that the youth of Cuba, whatever they may think of the Communist party or Maxism, they are fanatically devoted to Fidel.

And I may add that, in my judgment, Cuba today is more Cuban and Latin than Marxist.

—James B. Donovan, who negotiated release of the Bay of Pigs prisoners, before the National Press Club, April 10, in questions and answers few newspapers reported, perhaps on the principle that anything good said of Castro, is (as Orwell might have said) un-news.

How Planning May Provide More, Not Less, Economic Freedom

under the impact of war-created demand in 1918-19, 1943-45 and 1951-53. The one exception to this pattern is the year 1926, the one time this level was reached in a truly peacetime economy. The record suggests that our free enterprisers left to themselves will never achieve this goal. Yet, as the majority points out, "Countries such as Sweden, France, West Germany and Japan have, by aggressive monetary, taxation and expenditure policies maintained a high level of production and unemployment levels below 2% by U.S. definitions." In all these countries, though in varying ways, the central government has set out goals and planned to reach them. Their high growth rate and our lag testifies to the effectiveness of planning in a mixed society.

What Only Government Can Do

This does not mean, as the minority insists, replacement of "decentralized decision-making by millions of individuals and businesses." It does mean establishing a mechanism for making the kind of decisions no individual business man can make. No individual business, no matter how powerful, can take the decisions required to end the decay of a whole region, as in Appalachia, or to raise a whole segment of the population out of misery and into the normal market. Business men understand this very well when it comes to the kind of government interference they like; our network of tariffs and subsidies represents central planning for their benefit. What they fight against is central decision-making in the social sphere, for the benefit of the poorer classes, though experience at home and abroad has shown that they too benefit by it. Such central decision-making would not replace decentralized decision by individuals but provide a better context for those decisions. Let me illustrate.

The individual shoe manufacturer cannot figure that he could sell a million more pair of shoes if Harlem and Appalachia were released from poverty. He has to make his output decisions on the basis of the restricted market which is the only one he can count on. Only the central government can decide to set production goals in the wider terms of human need and then take the steps to make these goals possible by guaranteeing the necessary purchasing power. The setting of the goals themselves gives the decentralized decision makers confidence that they can expand output without going broke on unsold surpluses.

Alsop's Latest

To the delight of Senators Smathers and Eastland, Joseph Alsop has discovered that the civil rights movement is being infiltrated by Communists. Martin Luther King, CORE and SNNC were all given the treatment in his column April 15. Next day Smathers hailed Alsop in the Senate as a "totally responsible" journalist. The adverb seems a little strong for those who remember Alsop's role in propagating the bomber and missile gap myths. Smathers said he was writing J. Edgar Hoover for more details and on April 18 Eastland told the Senate, "He (Alsop) is saying the same thing Jim Eastland has said since the 1954 Supreme Court decision." This new Alsop scoop, like his bomber and missile gap campaigns and his famous discovery that people in China were eating after-births, seems to be an intelligence agency leak.

We cannot imagine anything more foolish for our foolish intelligence agencies to do than to trot out the tired old Red scare against the civil rights movement. We cannot imagine anything likely to enrage Negroes more than the hint that they are being, somehow, artificially "agitated." It is not ideology, it is frustration and despair which are tearing the civil rights movement apart and driving it to wild words and action. A silly column like Alsop's can only add to the self-destructively blind rage of those who have lost faith in white men's comprehension.

This is what the majority means when it says that one of the lessons to be drawn from foreign experience "is that policy measures which set overall goals and determine overall rates of employment growth and price stability without involving Government in the market process may result in more rather than less economic freedom." How explain this seeming paradox? "Once assured of full employment and production," the majority report continues, "labor organizations and private firms have been less given to restrictive practices or monopolistic tendencies and have therefore required a lesser degree of government control."

How to Make Peace in Cuba, Vietnam and the World

1. Cuba. It might be well to remember that the last Communist satellite which shot down U.S. reconnaissance planes ended up a few years later by switching from the Soviet camp to a U.S. protected neutralism. That was Yugoslavia. We're not predicting such an outcome for our relations with Cuba but stranger things have happened. The story illustrates the virtue of patience and the folly of too deep an emotional entanglement with today's quarrels. In any case our Cuban obsession is again making us ludicrous in the eyes of the world. First there's a world crisis because the Russians send troops to Cuba; now there's a new crisis because they're leaving. When the last ones go, 24 anti-aircraft missile sites capable of shooting down U-2s will be in Cuban hands. Castro says he won't stand for aerial reconnaissance; we threaten action if he interferes. What do we do? Beg the Russians to remain—at least until after the election?

No Cuban Planes Over Florida

We suppose it's hopeless to point out that it's a violation of international law to enter another nation's airspace against its will; we're parties to treaties which establish this. We don't invite Cuban planes to fly over Miami, Florida, to check by aerial photography whether any new Bay of Pigs invasion is in preparation. If Russian or Chinese planes ever appear over our territory, we'll shoot them down. We stopped sending U-2s over the Soviet Union when the Russians shot one down, and we use satellites and oblique angle photography instead. We could do that over Cuba, too. But it would, we suppose, hurt our national pride not to be able to violate international law over such a small country.

We have one war on our hands in Vietnam. Do we want another in Cuba? Since 1961, the number of right wing dictatorships in Latin America have risen from three to nine;* we helped bring many of them into power; we co-exist peacefully with all of them. The latest, Brazil, is our pride and joy. It's about time—just to show our impartiality—we coexisted peacefully with the one leftwing dictatorship in the hemisphere. We suggest that James B. Donovan be sent back to Cuba to negotiate compensation for U.S. property owners as part of a deal to include resumption of trade and diplomatic relations; we can see a lot more on the ground from Havana than up in the air from a U-2. Secondly we suggest that Donovan explore the offer made by Cuba to the United Nations just before the missile crisis to accept demilitarization of the island if given firm international guarantees against aggression. Finally we propose, since we're afraid Castro might export revolution, an ideological non-aggression pact between the U.S. and Cuba whereby both sides agree not to finance, train or arm groups openly or covertly designed to overthrow the regime of either country, or any other country in the hemisphere. We believe this could be made a politically attractive package at home.

Just in Time

"Goulart later, March 30, declared in a nationwide TV broadcast that he would continue to seek economic reforms despite opposition to his program by his political enemies. He charged that this opposition was financed by illicit remittances from big foreign companies (drug manufacturers and petroleum companies) and landowners." [Parenthesis in original.]

—Facts on File, March 26-April 1, p. 103

"New Brunswick, N.J.—American drug companies in Brazil would have been expropriated on April 7 if the Goulart government hadn't been overthrown, P. B. Hofmann, chairman of Johnson & Johnson, said at the annual meeting. Mr. Hofmann said he understood that a decree already had been written and signed to expropriate U.S. drug manufacturing operations in Brazil. He described Johnson & Johnson's operations in Brazil, employing 2,200 persons, as 'our biggest problem.' He added, however, that with the new Brazilian government the outlook is much better."

—Wall Street Journal, April 15

2. South Vietnam. Last August a leader of the South Vietnamese National Liberation Front told Georges Chaffard of Le Monde (Aug. 24) that the Front did not wish to exchange one dictatorship for another nor to become dependent on the North. We propose that this be explored to see whether the Front would end the guerrilla war if free elections under UN auspices were held to establish a democratic regime. The Front has been on record since August 15, 1962 for a neutral belt to include South Vietnam, Cambodia and Laos (Georges Chaffard: Indochine, Paris 1964 p. 193). Such a belt could end the war in South Vietnam and trouble in Laos. A neutral, democratic Republic in South Vietnam would provide a face-saving exit for our own country and an end to the misery of its people.

What would China's attitude be? "The French delegation" at the SEATO conference in Manila "was said to have maintained" according to a dispatch in The Times of London April 16 "that Chinese fears of South Vietnam being used as an American base would have to be dispelled before a neutralist solution could be achieved." One way to do this would be to restore the 1954 pact which ended the Indochinese revolt against the French. Then Cambodia, Laos and Vietnam were to have been neutralized. Our CIA violated those accords in Laos, provoking revolt and intervention from the

The Clark Report Shows Failure of "Free Enterprise" to Meet The Jobs Crisis . . .

If the President, by his poverty message, served the historic purpose of putting poverty into the headlines, the Clark report* serves the purpose of sketching in the true dimensions of the problem and of the steps necessary to deal with it. For the first time since the passage of the Employment Act of 1946, a group of Democratic Senators suggest, though gingerly, the need for a planned economy and for an unprecedented expansion of public expenditure. We recommend a close study of it. Even the Republican minority (Prouty, Jordan and Javits), though opposed to planning, have some excellent suggestions for long overdue reforms in social security and in the lagging "food stamp" plan. Above all the humane Senator Clark of Pennsylvania and his Democratic colleagues (Randolph, McNamara, Pell, Kennedy and Metcalf) deserve applause for moving the country toward a war on poverty which could be more than a deceptive metaphor. For as Ralph Helstein of the Packinghouse Workers told a Socialist Party conference on poverty here two nights before the Clark report was released, "This is the first war we ever began by announcing we would fight it on a balanced budget." The very next day, as if to emphasize the ambivalence of the Administration's approach, we heard Mr. Johnson boast that total Federal employment, thanks to the absence of an accelerated public works program, was down 13,000. "That figure, I know," Mr. Johnson said, "will interest Senator Byrd." A war on poverty, waged with one eye on Senator Byrd, can easily become a series of retreats.

Three Million Fewer Jobs

Where the Clark report calls for vigorous amplification by others is its failure to say loudly and clearly enough that free enterprise cannot solve our problems. But the unmistakable facts themselves are there. Let us summarize just what is this "manpower revolution" as described in the Clark report. In the 10 years 1947-57, employment in industry rose three-quarters of a million per year. But in the six years from 1957-63 "despite substantial increases in output and creation of new products and industries," employment in the industrial sector actually declined by 300,000. The number of workers engaged directly in production was about 500,000 less than in 1947. In construction, though activity is up 17% since 1956, there has been no increase in employment. "When agricultural employment is included," the report says, "the goods-producing sector has experienced a net loss of more than 3 million jobs over the last 6 years." This is the rate at which machines have been displacing men.

No Longer The Poverty of Horatio Alger

"The 20% of American families with annual incomes under $3000 are of increasing concern not only because the general level of affluence has left them relatively more depressed, but because poverty in America has been changing in nature. The American frontiersman knew poverty as he struggled to build a society sufficiently productive to offer a more abundant life. The immigrant knew poverty as he entered a new land and prepared his children to move upward in the economic and social scale. In both cases, poverty was a transition stage to better things. Poverty in modern America tends to be a permanent state, concentrated among certain disadvantaged groups and in many cases continuing generation after generation."

—Clark Report: Toward Full Employment

It is against this appalling backdrop that we must measure the magnitude of the unemployment problem. This is figured at a persistent 5½% of the work force, though the real rate may be between 7 and 9%. Yet only to keep joblessness from rising any higher, to keep pace with population increase, we need 3½ million new jobs every year through the rest of this decade. To reduce unemployment to 3%—the goal set by the Clark report for 1968—we would have to create somewhere between 6 and 8 million new jobs a year. So-called free enterprise cannot begin to meet a challenge of those dimensions. On the contrary it has been failing steadily to keep up with the need for jobs. In the six years from 1957 to 1963, when total non-farm employment increased 4.3 millions, "The net increase in full-time employment generated by the private profit-making non-farm sector of the economy has been only 300,000 jobs since 1957."

That is an average of 50,000 a year. Measure that against the 3½ million jobs we need to take care of the youth coming up, or against the 6 to 8 million jobs we need to reduce joblessness to 3% of the population, and you can see how hollow and dangerous is all the pious nonsense about free enterprise which is the ideology and religion of our businessman's civilization. Without a change in our thinking, our society

 Toward Full Employment. A Report by the Subcommittee on Employment and Manpower, U.S. Senate. Joseph S. Clark, Pa., Chairman. Edward D. Friedman, Counsel; Dr. Garth L. Mangum, research director. This is the second of two articles dealing with the report. The first appeared last week.

Despite Privation, Too Little Use Being Made of "Food Stamp" Program

"How effective has the administration been in helping to resolve one of the most challenging problems of our time —the problem of sharing our huge agricultural surpluses with people who are hungry?

"With respect to the existing direct distribution of food packages—a program for which the States and localities bear the entire administrative costs—a few food items have been added, including peanut butter and, from time to time, canned chopped meat. But, in general, the program has been limited to about 10 items including butter, non-fat dried milk, dry beans, milled rice, cornmeal, flour, lard, rolled wheat, and cheese.

"As to the 'food stamp' program, hailed as a bold new step forward, the actual expenditures show that it was, indeed, a limping step. For of the $50 million allocated only $13.5 million was spent in 1962 and just $18.6 million in 1963. Although over 200 communities have asked to participate, the program has been limited to 45 areas.

"Some problems [have been] developing even in so small a program. Participants have found it difficult to meet the requirement that ['bonus stamps'] be purchased once a month in a lump sum. For example, a family of five with a monthly income of $105 must put up $46 in a lump sum to receive 'bonus stamps' amounting to $42.

"Despite the privation in many poverty stricken areas, the administration failed to use more than a fraction of the money allocated for the food stamp program."

. . . Planning and A $5 Billion Annual Stepup In Public Works Advocated will stumble into serious social struggles in the years ahead.

Abroad capitalist societies less wedded than ours to simple-minded myths about free enterprise have succeeded, as the Clark report shows, in holding unemployment below 2%. Various combinations of central planning in mixed societies with large areas of public ownership have made this possible. But what capitalists in Japan, Germany, France, Sweden and Norway take for granted looks revolutionary here. Yet without such "revolutionary" steps we cannot hope to meet the challenge of the manpower revolution. The Clark report does not say this strongly and clearly. But the message is there all the same.

On The Most Favorable Assumptions

If the Clark report is less outspoken than it should be, it is more outspoken than the labor movement. Where the labor movement calls for $2 billion a year in public works, the Clark report says that on the most favorable assumptions about private sector employment, it will take a $5 billion a year increase in Federal expenditures every year between now and 1968 to reduce unemployment to 3%. Those assumptions, as may be seen from the footnote on pages 40-1 of the report, a bit of dynamite in small type, are highly improbable. More will be required, unless the government by central planning for the private sector orchestrates an industrial expansion commensurate with human need. This, which is accepted as good sense in capitalist societies abroad, will bring an hysterical outcry about socialism here.

The choice is not between free enterprise and planning. The choice is between an economy planned on a profitably restricted basis as now, or one planned for maximum human need. The choice is not between an individualistic capitalism and collectivism. The choice is between a society planned by the private collectivisms we call corporations, planned to suit the needs of the fortunate, and a society planned by the whole collectivity for the benefit of all its members. It is here that a strong infusion of old-fashioned socialist analysis and thinking is essential just to move us abreast of the other "capitalist" nations with their mixed societies and pragmatic forms of central direction for the maintenance of demand. This is where the Socialist Party, whose Michael Harrington did so much to put poverty on our political map, could perform a service, and it was this which led me with so much interest to its conference on poverty.

The Paradox Which Could Be Fruitful

"The U.S. finds itself in the interesting position of having idle manpower and industrial capacity and immense backlogs of unfulfilled public needs for which the manpower could be used and the funds expended. It was in reference to this paradoxical situation that the Swedish economist, Gunnar Myrdal, remarked to the subcommittee, 'It is almost fortunate, as I see it, that you have such tremendous amounts to be done in reconstructing your cities and modernizing your transport system.' . . . These needed expenditure increases plus additional amounts to offset possible reductions in defense expenditures or other existing programs make an attack on accumulated social ills . . . not only possible and desirable but a necessary condition for full-employment."

—Clark Report: Toward Full Employment

Unfortunately our politics are so lopsided that everything (including me) is skewed to the right. The people we call conservatives are usually reactionaries like Goldwater or crypto-Fascists like the Birchers. The liberals, as may be seen from the Clark report, are just about where the conservatives are in Western Europe and Japan. And the Socialists, as I heard them at their conference, are not much more than militant liberals. And even I, in trying to popularize some familiar Socialist concepts from the past, am only in desperation advocating the modernization of American capitalism!

Perhaps the most important suggestion at the Socialist Conference was by Prof. Aaron Levenstein of City College when he said that if computers can solve the problems of production, they can solve the problems of distribution. It would be good to get away from stale talk of public works and down to the brass tacks of matching our production system to the needs of our people. A national inventory of human need, in concrete terms of specific commodities and services—food, clothes, housing and education—would lay the basis for a Plan really to transform America. Let's feed poverty to the computers and we'll soon see how much work there is for idle hands to do. In the 30s we spoke of production for use, not profit. Down this road lies the only way to wage a really unconditional war on poverty at home and abroad.

The Inadequacies and Injustices of Our Social Security System

"What is even more disturbing is the increase in the number of social security beneficiaries who must apply for welfare. In 1950 about 300,000 persons were under both programs. Today the figure is over 800,000 meaning that almost 4 out of every 10 welfare recipients (37%) are on social security. The question may legitimately be asked as to whether social security has any real meaning to these people.

"What is the cause of this growing dilution in the meaningfulness of the social security benefit? Certainly the major factor is the size of the benefit itself—a worker's benefit which can be as low as $40 a month and which averages just a little over $75 a month. These are benefits at poverty levels.

"Moreover, there are devices built into the social security system which actually hinder a worker who has the initiative to try to bring himself up to a level of decency. The principal offender is the social security "retirement test" or income limitation. Let's see how this affects our average retired worker and his spouse. He and his wife receive benefits totaling about $103 a month, or $1,236 a year. He can earn $1,200 a year without losing any benefits, but this only brings the family income up to $2,436, considerably below the annual family income level of $3,000 which administration spokesmen say indicates the "poverty" line. If our aged worker decides to earn another $600, he will find that earning this additional amount has cost him $350 in benefits. But the "treadmill" is only warming up for when his earnings pass $1,700 a year the social security law requires that for every dollar of earnings a dollar of benefits will be lost.

"This is a perfect example of the right hand not knowing what the left hand is doing. The administration declares "total war" on poverty but does not suggest amendment of existing programs which are perpetuating the disease."

There Can Be No Missile Freeze Until The Germans Are Frozen Out

other side. We broke the pact by sending our military into South Vietnam. Restoration of the Pact would, of course, include North as well as South Vietnam. The pact pledged all these countries not to allow foreign military bases, not to make any military alliances and not to allow foreign military personnel on its territory. Both North and South Vietnam would again be neutralized — another face-saver for the world's most Oriental Western country.

North Vietnam Wants Peace

What of North Vietnam? On three occasions, Western foreign correspondents have been told by Ho Chi-minh or Pham Van Dong, North Vietnam's Prime Minister, that North Vietnam was prepared to postpone reunification if trade were resumed in peace between North and South; the normal exchange of Hanoi's surplus coal for Saigon's surplus rice would wipe out most of the trade deficits on either side. China, for its part, needs peace in Southeast Asia in order to expand trade with the West as a substitute for the supplies it used to get from Russia. De Gaulle as intermediary is in the best position to draw these strands together in negotiation for a durable peace in the area. The conjecture of forces favors a settlement.

Admittedly, from a narrow political point of view, it would be more comfortable to let the Vietnamese people go on suffering—and Americans dying—in Vietnam until after the election. Johnson is afraid of being outflanked on the issue by Lodge and the Republicans; McNamara, in light-headed fashion, has staked his political future on the war. But there is no reason to believe the war can be kept on ice until after November. Our puppet forces have lost the will to fight. Johnson may soon have to choose whether to intervene with U.S. troops to please the hotheads or take constructive steps toward peace, steps which, as recent polls show, have substantial support among the American people.

Suckers For Arms Salesmen

"An atmosphere now prevails, based on the few significant successes that more [weapons] breakthroughs are just around the corner; that all one has to do is give large sums of money to industry and they will be produced. The military became like the poor boy allowed to roam freely in a large toy shop before Christmas.

"The military men, because they are not generally knowledgeable in this area and because of the high respect they accord men in industry, are frequently persuaded to support developments conjured by sales engineers. In many cases such projects are offered just to keep the organizations alive. Once the contract is obtained, the contractor is protected by the mantle of military necessity. Frequently the only people knowledgeable about what is going on are the contractor personnel themselves who have a vested interest in seeing to it that that contract is kept going. What concerns me most about this military-industrial complex is that it has decreased our national strength by equipping our fleet with unreliable weapons."

—Adm. Rickover, 1965 Defense Approp. Hearings

3. The Big Picture. We believe President Johnson is deeply devoted to the cause of peace. We are impressed with what he has said, almost in every speech he has made, of the urgency and necessity of peace. His offer of a missile freeze and his new joint action with Khrushchev on a cutback in nuclear materials output represent initiatives for which the new Administration deserves credit. We are inching our way toward a settlement with the Russians, though as yet the only agreements whether written, as in the nuclear test ban treaty, or tacit, as in the uranium cutback, reflect no more than a recognition on both sides of how badly basic resources are being wasted in overkill preparations.

To move beyond this to genuine measures of disarmament, however, will require greater flexibility and more imagination on our part. The obstacle is the NATO multilateral force. We cannot talk of preventing the proliferation of nuclear weapons while at the same time giving the Germans greater access to them—against the wishes of most of our allies as well as our opponents. Nothing will come of the potentially fruitful freeze proposal until we are ready to freeze the Germans out of the nuclear picture. April 22

Vacation Notice

Dear Readers:

We can't go on a vacation this summer because of the two conventions so we're taking our usual vacation now and combining it with a trip abroad, hoping to report among other things on the water crisis in Israel and the Middle East. So we are suspending for three weeks. The next issue will be the one dated June 1. It's been immense fun back on weekly schedule. Our deepest thanks for the many kind letters received about it, few of which unfortunately (we ask forgiveness) we have been able to answer.

Not Just One But Two "Integration" Problems: Darker Oriental Jews As Well As Arabs

I. F. Stone's Weekly

VOL. XII, NO. 19 JUNE 1, 1964 WASHINGTON, D. C. 15 CENTS

An Affluent Society But Living Beyond Its Means

To see Israel again after eight years is to be struck at every turn by the triumphant evidence of progress. The flood of new immigrants, which has more than tripled its population since the achievement of independence 18 years ago, is reflected in a continuous building boom. The dismal acres of shanty towns (ma'abaroth) hastily erected for new immigrants were still distressingly visible in 1956. Today they have given way (except for a hard-core of 3,000 which still clings to the old hovels) before whole new neighborhoods—and cities—of towering apartment houses. The roads have widened, the traffic jams grown worse. The country throbs with expansive vitality. Israel has become an affluent society. Even in the once Spartan kibbutzim, the outhouse and the cold outside shower have been replaced by private lavatories and running hot water, provided by individual solar heaters. Everywhere there are flowers. Even in Tel Aviv the whole new northern extension of that rather grubby city has become downright pretty with tree-lined boulevards and flower gardens. Not all the changes are to the taste of those who loved the old Palestine. The Dan Hotel in Tel Aviv has become as over-sumptuous as its counterparts in Miami. The Desert Inn outside Beer Sheva, no longer a sleepy Bedouin town, might be in luxurious Palm Springs, except for the mezuzoth beside every door and the Arab-with-camel on duty at the entrance. The dolce vita has arrived, as the old-timers complain, complete with juvenile delinquents and call girls.

No More Fedayeen

The other big change since the spring of 1956 is in the sense of security. Then infiltrating fedayeen from Egyptian training centers in the Gaza strip and Sinai were shooting up settlements at night and making travel after dark hazardous. The Sinai campaign later that year may have been a humiliating setback for England and France, but for Israel it put a stop to these terrorist raids, smashed Czech and Soviet arms dumps across the Egyptian border and established a UN force at the narrow straits where Eilat's access to the Red Sea had been shut off by Nasser. This much was accomplished, whatever the wisdom of the retaliatory spiral which led up to the Sinai campaign, and its cost in the alienation of Afro-Asian sympathy from Israel.* Today one can travel everywhere with assurance. Unusually heavy rains had turned the country greener and lovelier than we had ever seen it in seven previous trips. Our visit was a succession of unforgettable scenes: Haifa's gleaming harbor from the top of Mt. Carmel, the wide lawns of Mishmar Ha-Emek, the rich green vistas of the once malarial Valley of Israel, the holy places of Nazareth, Tiberius and Safad, lunch on the eastern shores of Lake Galilee at Ein Gev within the shadow of the Syrian border, the mauve hills at twilight which look down on the fertile collectives in that narrow "finger" of Israel which stretches northward between Lebanon and Syria. Later we saw Ashdod, Israel's biggest seaport rising on the dunes where the Philistines once dwelt, and Kiryat Dan, a new complex of factories and farms to the north of Beer Sheva. We saw old friends in kibbutzim like Shoval and Hatzor nearby which were once lonely military outposts and are now thriving centers of rural industry as well as agriculture, for since 1959 the industrial byproducts of the collective settlements equal or surpass their agricultural output. The climax was our climb up those venerable hills to Jerusalem. There one can still step backward in time, and savor ways of life centuries apart. A fashionable crowd takes tea on the veranda of the King David overlooking the walls of the Old City and a few blocks away little boys in ear curls and suspenders rock back and

"Your struggle against imperialism and exploitation give me the right to call you comrade, my dear friend, President Nasser."

—Premier Khrushchev at the Aswan Dam, May 14

"NASSER: Our nations, hand in hand, will shape a better future. Our mutual affection has an historic background, and I believe that our common interests in so many areas will draw us ever closer. Have you ever found an Arab, a Minister or a simple man in the street, who is not friendly to the Germans?

"FREY: Certainly not.

"NASSER: You will never find one because there aren't any. That would run counter to our mentality. Our sympathies in the Second World War were on the German side. The Speaker of our Parliament was then imprisoned for pro-German sympathies.

"FREY: We would gladly have won the war and freed the Speaker and all the Arabs.

"NASSER (laughs heartily): We will work together for freedom and peace on the basis of justice. For us Arabs this means the right to the unity of our nation on our hereditary territory and for you Germans it means exactly the same—reunification in one State. That is our heart's desire. All my good wishes to the German people and for you personally, my dear Dr. Frey, and for your great purposes."

—This was an interview given by Nasser in Cairo, on the eve of Khrushchev's visit, to Dr. Gerhard Frey, publisher of Germany's leading neo-Nazi organ, the* Deutsche National und Soldaten Zeitung, *and published verbatim under flaring headlines "War With Israel Unavoidable" in its issue of May 1.

forth over their pious schoolbooks in the back alley yeshivahs of Mea Shearim, keeping alive a medieval universe of orthodox Jewry.

Beneath the prosperous and picturesque surface there are problems grave enough to threaten Israel's future. But for those who have seen the crises of its earlier years it is impossible not to be optimistic. I first saw Palestine November 2, 1945, the day the Haganah began the war against the British by blowing up the watch towers from which they laid in wait for illegal immigrant ships; it seemed hopeless for so small a force to challenge so great an empire. In the spring of 1946 I travelled with the illegals on one of these Jewish Mayflowers. In 1947 I saw the British impose martial law on Tel Aviv in an effort to wipe out the terrorist campaign against them. In 1948 I was a witness to the joint attack of the Arab States on what was then an ill-prepared tiny community of 650,000 Jews.* In 1949 and 1950 I saw the lack of food and the letdown in morale which followed the war and the onset of the Arab blockade. To have seen such odds overcome makes it hard to take too tragically the problems of the dynamic, confident and expanding Israel of today.

A Growing Trade Deficit

They are nonetheless serious. The first is fiscal: Israel is living beyond its means. Its rate of economic growth is topped only by Japan's and few countries can match its steep rate of increase in exports. But in 1963 its adverse surplus of imports over exports was still $420 million and in the first quarter of 1964 its trade deficit rose to three times that in the first quarter of 1963. Capital imports have been running ahead of the trade deficit so that the government's cash reserves have been growing. But of total capital imports in 1963 of $500 million, $162 million was in German reparations and restitution payments which will now decline sharply. Israel will soon have to meet the challenge of austerity and better distribution of income. Its affluent society, like America's has little-seen but wide fringes of poverty. An ostentatious luxury by the rich does not make this more bearable. And there, as in America, the problem of poverty is intensified by color and "race." Israel has a double "Negro" problem. The darker Jews from the Orient and North Africa, as well as the Arab minority, suffer from prejudice.

The usual Jewish attitude toward the Arabs is one of contemptuous superiority. Our driver northward was a Jew who had fled from the Nazi advance into Hungary but that did not save him from racist habits. When I suggested that we give a boy a lift, he refused, saying the boy was an Arab. When I asked what was the difference, he said Arabs smelled bad. I said that is what anti-Semites said of us Jews in the outside world but this made no impression. His attitude, it is painful to report, is typical. Israel is a country not only of full employment but of labor shortages. Thousands of Arabs do the menial tasks of Tel Aviv. They find it as hard to obtain decent lodgings as Negroes do in America and for the same reasons; many "pass" as Jews to circumvent prejudice. In Haifa I visited the only secondary school attended by both Jews and Arabs but even there the classes turned out to be separate. The State of Israel has done much in a material way for the Arabs but the sense of humiliation outweighs any improvement. The spectacle fills one with despair. For if

Bonn's Strange Delay

"Bonn—Herr Hoecherl, the West German Minister of the Interior, told the Bundestag yesterday that Dr. Erhard had given his approval to amending the passport laws with the intention of hindering the disputed activities of German scientists and technicians in Egypt. He expressed regret, however, that the efforts of his Ministry to draw up a bill had so far met with little outside support.

"The Minister's replies failed to satisfy the Social Democrats. They pointed out that 10 months after a unanimous Bundestag resolution, a Bill had still not been tabled, or a date given by the Government when it would so so. For more than a year now, Israel had been urging the Federal government to devise ways to stop German citizens helping the Egyptians develop offensive weapons. Herr Hoecherl maintained that 'exceptional legal difficulties' had prevented the Federal government from responding before.

"An SPD [Social Democrat] member argued that it was not only legal difficulties but political pressure from Arab countries that had induced the Government to hold back."

Nasser Turns One Face Toward A French Socialist Editor, Quite Another to a Neo-Nazi

"Yemen is not your last combat. . . . Now it is necessary to look toward Palestine."

—Nasser to his shock troops, quoted in the French independent Socialist weekly,* France-Observateur, *April 30.

"War is not a solution. . . . It is relatively easy to begin a war, but who can know where it will lead or how it will end? No, we do not want war. But we are rendered uneasy by the logic of Israel's development."

—Nasser to Gilles Martinet, of* France-Observateur, *interview in its issue of April 30.

"FREY: Do you regard a peaceful solution of the Israel problem as possible?

"NASSER: Absolutely not. . . .

"FREY: Your Excellency, allow me to ask quite brutally: Will you crush Israel?

"NASSER: I hope so. . . .

"FREY: Will you be able to clean up the Israel question within a generation?

"NASSER: In schaa Allah (If Allah wills).

"FREY: If the German [reparations] payments [to Israel] should one day dry up . . . (hiatus in original).

"NASSER (Interrupting): That is an especially sad chapter, a burden on our friendship. The German payments are the elixir of life for Israel. Israel is unthinkable without your supplies. I no longer understand the Germans.

"FREY: Those payments were based on the murder of Jews.

"NASSER: But the lie about six million murdered Jews is not taken seriously by anyone, not even by the simplest man here in our country."

—Nasser's interview with the publisher of the* Deutsche National und Soldaten Zeitung *in its issue of May 1 which we picked up at a newstand in Athens on our way to Israel.

 In Underground to Palestine (1946) I told the story of the illegal trip and in This Is Israel (1948) the story of how Israel won its war of independence.

Jews, after all their experience of suffering, prove no better than the rest of mankind once in the majority, what hope for a world as torn apart as our is by tribalism and hate?

Yiddish Becomes Upper Class

More progress is being made in dealing with Israel's other integration problem—that of the Jews from the Orient and Africa. For these — unlike the Arabs — are people Israel wants. That does not save them from being looked down upon. Half the people of Israel are now from countries where Yiddish is unknown. But in Israel, for the first time, the tender language of East European ghettoes has become an upper class tongue. The Ashkenazi, the Yiddish-speaking Jews, hold the commanding positions in the community. The Sephardi, or Oriental Jews, speaking Arabic, French or the Old Castilian of the Spain from which they were driven five centuries ago, are the hewers of wood and drawers of water. They make up half the population but their children are only 15% of those in secondary schools and only 5% of those in the university. Their cultural level is lower. They cannot afford to send their children to the higher schools. Discrimination has given them solidarity and "communal" tickets have begun to appear in local elections, pitting Sephardi against Ashkenazi. The right wing parties are making demagogic appeals to the Oriental Jews. On the other side one Yiddish speaking meshuganah has just published a book to prove that the Yiddish-speaking from the West are the only true Jews! The government is trying its best to give preferences to the Orientals where equally qualified. It fears lest Israel run into a situation like that of Belgium where after 150 years the conflict between Walloon and Fleming divides the nation. Fortunately the common language of Hebrew, and the melting pot of school and Army, are available to ease Israel's divisions. Education is seen as the key to amalgamation but education costs money and here we come to Israel's other big headache, that of defense.

The amount spent on defense is a secret but some notion of its magnitude may be gathered from a veiled figure in the budget. This shows that about a third goes for an item called "Security, special budget and reserve." This has been rising. It was less than $300 million or 28.3% of the 1963/64 budget and close to $400 million or 30.9% of the 1964/65 budget. The next largest item was education, but this is less than 8% of the budget. Were the arms race in the Middle East to end, Israel could afford to make secondary education free, too, as elementary education is now. Nothing could do more to develop her human resources and end the rankling inferiority of Oriental Jew and Arab. Another way to measure the impact of the arms race is to notice that "security, special budget and reserve" amounts to more than German reparations, UJA, private gifts and donations of food surpluses put together. If Israel enjoyed real peace, she would no longer be dependent on the bread of charity.

Why Some Want Nuclear Arms

"In Paris, Gamal Abdul Nasser made it clear that he intends to make war on Israel, though the threat was couched in diplomatic language. To say that unless Israel implements UN resolutions concerning the repatriation of Palestinian refugees, these refugees will use force to achieve their aims, and the Arab States assist them, in practice means war—for though the UN resolutions speak about 'repatriation or resettlement', the Arab states will certainly prevent any attempt to reach agreement on the basis of resettlement and compensation, and Israel cannot afford to permit repatriation of hundreds of thousands of hostile Arabs.

"The Egyptians are meanwhile reported to have providentially fixed the date of their attack on Israel for Easter 1966, by when they hope to have sufficient missiles available to wipe out the major Israeli population centres. The German scientists are continuing their work in the missile sphere. . . .

"There is nothing inherently improbable about the 1966 date for war in the Middle East. The best way of delaying such a war—barring resolute UN action in advance, which seems wishful thinking at the moment—is further strengthening of Israel's striking force—especially as regards unconventional weapons."

—The Israel Economist, April 1964

However one looks at it, peace is Israel's overriding problem. It's hard for a poor country to keep up with the Joneses in armament. "In the war for independence," said one of

An Appeal By Israeli Liberals Against A Nuclear Arms Race in the Middle East

"Our Committee is concerned with the prevention of nuclear arms in the Arab-Israeli area. We support the denuclearization of the whole Middle East, but lay stress on the Arab-Iraeli region (which includes a part of Northern Africa). The reasons are obvious:

"1. There is little danger of war between other Mid-Eastern States. The Israeli-Arab relations, however, are permanently strained and often on the brink of war. Two wars occurred between Egypt and Israel in the last 15 years: 1948 and 1956.

"2. The main antagonists, Egypt and Israel, have densely populated centres, among the densest on the globe, the Egyptian Nile delta and the Israeli Mediterranean coast. Even a 'primitive' nuclear encounter would destroy millions of human beings (and two of the most important traditional sites of the Western World). Owing to geographical, technological and other limitations no warning system is feasible. The deterrent aspect of nuclear weapons has no meaning here, since the first strike may finish the job.

"3. Although Egypt and Israel are small parties, their military conflict would have immediate international implications. With a nuclear background, it may provoke a universal disaster.

"4. Both in Egypt and in Israel, there are influential circles who favor a nuclear 'option.' The attitude of President Abdul Nasser is at least equivocal. Israel, being a democracy, is discussing the problem openly. Our Committee initiated the debate, and it is continuing at a growing measure. Egypt, with its one-party system unfortunately has no such possibilities.

"International friends of both countries, who care for the fate of humanity at large, may be helpful by bringing together responsible leaders of both sides. You are surely aware that Lord Russell and his friends expressed their deep anxiety over the current developments in our area, by publishing their message to the rulers, Prime Ministers, and peoples of the States concerned. The reaction was not encouraging. An unofficial approach to influential individuals and groups may perhaps be more fruitful at this stage."

—Committee for the Denuclearization of the Israeli-Arab Area. Among its members is the philosopher, Martin Buber.

those tireless old-timers who make Israel the dynamic community that it is, "a Spitfire was hot stuff. We could buy one second-hand for 2,000 pounds. Now the Mystére costs us $750,000; the Mirage, $1,000,000; the super-Mirage, $1,250,000. But planes and tanks are given to Egypt by the Russians for very little. They gave Nasser 15 submarines and a flotilla of Komars, swift mosquito boats armed with missiles which can shoot from 30 kilometers offshore. Now we're afraid Egypt may get enriched uranium from Moscow, too." Between Russian aid and German scientists there is a real fear that Egypt may some day be the instrument for a second go at Hitler's "final solution." Khrushchev's visit stirred deep anxiety. "The Government of Israel regrets," Prime Minister Eshkol told the Knesset pointedly May 20, "that in spite of the Egyptian ruler's aggressive declarations against Israel he receives political support and supplies of arms from sources that generally advocate peace and co-existence." It is tragic that Israel could not have joined its neighbor in rejoicing over so fruitful and historic an achievement as the Aswan Dam. And it was mischief-making demagogy for Khrushchev to join the Arab States in stigmatizing as an imperialist plot the beginnings of the Jordan water scheme which could benefit the whole area and does no more than put to use millions of precious gallons otherwise wasted in the Dead Sea.

Jews and Germans

"I am 75 years old and my age disqualifies me from appearing on the Junior page, but I cannot resist an urge to compliment Mr. Kurt Schwarzer most warmly on his letters.

"Are we, as Israelis and as Jews, going to be given a lesson in our own Talmudic teachings by a German and a Christian namely to 'Show love to your neighbor because he is like yourself?' Moreover the word 'neighbor' does not refer only to members of our own people because a few verses further in the text, the Egyptian is designated by the same term. And 'Do not despise the Egyptian, for you were a dweller in his land' and 'The sons shall not die for the sins of their fathers, but each one shall die for his own sins.'

"If we condemn outright all Germans and abstain from all contact with them, are we then better than the Nazis who had condemned all Jews? This mentality might help us build up a political state of Israel—a haven of refuge for the remnants and for the persecuted—but it will never be a true Jewish State, the guardian of the spiritual heritage of our ancient Kingdom and of the rich ethical and moral legacy of our long Exile."

—Dr. Elias Frenkel in a debate among German and Israeli youth in the Jerusalem Post May 15.

The Shadow of Ben Gurion

To inflame the Arab-Israeli quarrel is to risk no small conflagration. Eshkol's statement on the eve of his visit to the United States reiterated previous denials that atomic development in Israel was designed for other than peaceful purposes. But doubts persist. There are circles in Israel which see nuclear arms as a necessity for survival. They fear that neo-Nazi German scientists are using Egypt as a proving ground for "unconventional" weapons. The arms race between Egypt and Israel can become the next hot spot in the proliferation of nuclear arms. A committee of distinguished scholars and scientists in Israel (see box bottom of p. 3) have began to agitate for a denuclearized Arab-Israeli area but there is no echo from Egypt, where a police state represses free opinion. Behind the quarrel which is dividing Israel's ruling party, the Mapai, the quarrel between Ben Gurion and Eshkol over the irrepressible Lavon affair, is a struggle between younger military men who put their faith in force and an Old Guard which wishes to steer a course of moderation away from the apocalyptic adventurism of Ben Gurion. The Suez affair showed that B.G. and the military were able to carry on secretly behind the back of civilian government. They might do so again. If the conversations with President Johnson strengthen Eshkol, they will make a contribution to peace. Now is the time to prevent Egypt and Israel from wasting their substance and endangering the world in the blind alley of a nuclear arms race. I hope to report further on this in a later issue.

Why Our Man in Laos Runs An Opium Den, P. 3

Look Who Now Laments The Decline of Moscow's Power in South-East Asia

"Washington, May 29—The most dangerous new element in the foreign policy crisis now confronting President Johnson is the resounding collapse of Russian power in Southeast Asia. . . . For nearly a decade—from the fall of Dienbienphu in 1954 until last year—Russia was a significant power in the East-West pulling and hauling over Southeast Asia. Indeed it was the major Communist military presence in Laos, where Soviet planes were busy airlifting supplies to the Pathet Lao rebel forces.

"Russia played the game hard, and against America's best interests. But it contributed on the whole a stabilizing influence highly valued by U.S. officials . . . a restraining influence on North Vietnam, for a while, even on Red China. For example, Moscow played a key role in checking the Pathet Lao grab for Laos in 1962, when a direct collision with the U.S. threatened. The Soviet also helped American negotiators engineer the patchwork Geneva agreement on Laos, then worked to put it into effect. . . .

"American Kremlinologists regard Russia's present noisy declarations of support for the Communist effort in southeast Asia as just a smoke-screen. They feel this is Moscow's way of confessing that it is really no longer in a position to influence its old partners. . . . This fact greatly complicates and limits the choices of action for the U.S."

Some Truths About Laos Adlai Helped to Hide

Adlai Stevenson's speech to the Security Council on Southeast Asia was a moral disaster. He deserves better employment than reading the repellant scripts of the State Department. Once before on Cuba, as now again on Indochina, he found himself assigned the defense of the indefensible. Morse was right when he told the Senate last Thursday that the speech "extinguished a light of world statesmanship," and that Stevenson should have resigned rather than make it. Morse was particularly disturbed, in view of the growing speculation about the use of nuclear weapons, because Stevenson declared the U.S. ready to "'take whatever means are necessary" to enforce its will in Southeast Asia. As an exercise in the disingenuous and the palpably false the Stevenson speech topped even McNamara's March 26 address on Vietnam to the National Security Industrial Association. A striking example pointed out by Morse: Stevenson cited the special report by the Indian and Canadian members of the International Control Commission in June, 1962, accusing North Vietnam of violating the Geneva accords by armed aid to the South Vietnamese rebels. Stevenson did not mention that the report also accused the U.S. of violating those accords by its military activity in South Vietnam! We had a right to expect something better from a man like Stevenson.

Three Rightist Coup d'Etats

Stevenson spoke of the alternation of periods of calm with periods of limited aggression in Laos. He failed to mention that the "periods of calm" have been broken by the intrigues of our military-intelligence establishment. The recent outburst of fighting was a reaction to the third attempt by the rightist military on our payroll (Laos was long the only country in the world whose Army was entirely paid by the U.S.) to overthrow a coalition regime headed by Souvanna Phouma. The first time was in 1958, the second in 1960. Morse told the Senate we should have taken our case against the violation of the Geneva accords in Laos to the United Nations. In his judgment the U.S. "has a case it can prove" in an international investigation. The fact is that our first effort to overthrow Souvanna Phouma has been investigated and by a committee of our own Congress. In the spring of 1959 the subcommittee on foreign operations of the House Government Operations Committee took 984 pages of testimony on what we were doing in Laos. They showed gross violation of the Geneva accords by the United States.

What If The Mistake Had Been Made With An Atom Bomb A La Goldwater?

"Cha La, South Vietnam, May 25—At six one morning about two weeks ago, an Air Force plane swept low over Cha La. What followed was one of the more tragic mistakes of the war in South Vietnam. Major Victor Chandler of Austin, Tex., watched in shocked dismay as a plane whipped back and forth over the rice paddies and pineapple groves on which Cha La depends for its prosperity. Major Chandler recognized it immediately as a defoliation plane. Obviously the pilot had misread the map. Plant-killing chemicals intended for enemy country deeper South sprayed the ground below. Major Chandler's shouted protests went unheard.

"That, Col. Jim Keirsey of Durant, Okla., senior adviser to a South Vietnamese division, said grimly later on, was the last defoliation mission flown on the Ca Mau peninsula—until we get some things straightened out. But that does not save Cha La's paddies and pineapple growers. Today their green is slowly turning to brown, and the months ahead look bleak indeed. Cha La is the outpost we have selected to turn into a model town."

—Jim G. Lucas in the Scripps-Howard press May 25.

The Geneva accords provided for free elections to reunite Laos as well as Vietnam. We blocked free elections in Vietnam but failed in Laos. In the spring of 1958 elections reunited the northwestern provinces under Pathet Lao control with the rest of the country. A coalition government was formed under Souvanna Phouma and the Pathet Lao troops taken into the Royal Lao Army. The U.S. used its power to overthrow Souvanna Phouma and set up a military dictatorship. The Leftists were purged from the Parliament, the Pathet Lao troops thrown into concentration camps and their leader Prince Souphanouvong, Souvanna Phouma's half-brother, was jailed on trumped up charges of treason. The troops and the Prince both broke out, and renewed rebellion with them.

We Overthrow Phouma Again

Souvanna Phouma came back to power again in 1960 in the wake of a revolt by a parachute Colonel, Kong Le, disaffected by the corruption whose roots in the U.S. aid and military program were uncovered in the 1959 investigation. Souvanna Phouma again set up a coalition Cabinet intended to reunite the country. He offered the post of Deputy Premier and Minister of the Interior to our favored military man, Gen. Phoumi Nosavan. But Nosavan with the support of the U.S. and Thailand began a military revolt instead. Its failure led the U.S. to agree to the 1962 Geneva conference at which a new coalition government was set up under Souvanna Phouma. Our military and intelligence agencies caused the Kennedy Administration a lot of trouble during the prolonged negotiations; they opposed a new coalition Cabinet; the were never reconciled to it. The rightist military they favored overthrew Souvanna Phouma again in the coup of April 19.

The U.S. reacted quickly against the coup—it could hardly have done otherwise in view of the united opposition by Moscow and London—and forced the reinstatement of Souvanna Phouma as Premier. But it would be a mistake to believe that this put a happy ending on the affair. The U.S. military in South Vietnam was as hostile to the neutralist regime in Laos as in Cambodia. Just as those who favor neutralization believe it must be applied to the whole region so the military see the existence of neutralist regimes in part of the region as a bad example for war-weary South Vietnam. The U.S. has allowed the men who made the coup to remain the real power in Laos. They have sought to achieve their aims more subtly and to use Souvanna Phouma as their front and captive. The U.S. which shut off aid in 1958 and 1960 to overthrow Souvanna Phouma has not cut it off this time to force the rebel Generals out of power.

Those Invaders From Red China

"Pro-rightist Meo tribesmen have captured two Communist Chinese soldiers in Phongsaly Province in the far north of Laos. . . . This was the first definite evidence that there are Red Chinese troops in Laos. . . . One of the captured Chinese is said to be an officer, and the other is a sergeant. Both men, in their 20s, were wearing Chinese uniforms when captured."

—UPI from Vientiane in Washington Daily News May 23, which played it under banner headlines on page one "First Evidence of Chinese Red Troops in Laos."

"Coupled with Kong Le's indictment of the North Vietnamese was a report by a Western observer that right-wing troops at Paksane are holding two men who were found to be carrying Communist Chinese documents when they were captured by Meo guerrillas in northern Laos. He said he was shown the captives and the soldiers told him they were an officer and a noncom but did not say whether they were Chinese."

—AP from Vientiane in Washington Post May 24.

"The Vientiane headquarters of the right-wing army claimed a wave of terror followed the capture of two Chinese Communist soldiers in the northwest corner of Laos bordering China. The right-wing official bulletin, Laos Presse, said that Communist Chinese authorities, together with the Pathet Lao and North Vietnamese, arrested all village and district leaders and people in the area and killed and tortured many.

"The right-wing army had claimed the two Chinese were captured May 8 in Muong Sing, 20 miles southeast of the Chinese frontier. The two men were reportedly brought to Vientiane, but Western newsmen have not been able to find them."

—AP from Vientiane in Washington Star May 27.

Calmer View of The Laotian Fighting Taken By The Responsible British Press

"Recent advances by the Left-Wing Pathet Lao forces in Laos have certainly jolted this part of Southeast Asia, but after visiting Laos and Siam as well as South Vietnam in the last two weeks it is possible to suggest that the Pathet Lao's immediate territorial objectives are probably more limited than appear from a distance. . . .

"1. Regaining all territory lost or threatened by earlier Right-wing probes since 1962. . . . Right-wing advances there last year had threatened, and occasionally cut, the main Pathet Lao supply line from North Vietnam.

"2. Establishing complete control over the central Plain of Jars, where until recently the whole of the neutralist army of 9,000 men and some units of the Right-wing forces were said to be 'dug in.' . . . Since the coup, the Right-wing forces had been deliberately withdrawn in the hope that the Pathet Lao would not attack the purely neutralist force, but the Pathet Lao have preferred to take the opportuniy to gain an even easier victory than usual with the excuse that under the new Vientiane regime 'neutralists' no longer exist except on their side—to which some have indeed defected. . . .

"They may be poised now to demand objective No. 3—the reconvention of the Geneva conference of 14 nations to consider the Right-wing breach of the 1962 agreements, followed by a restitution of a 'coalition Government' on their own terms."

—The Guardian (London) from Saigon, May 21.

"The critical situation which developed last week in Laos after the pro-Communist Pathet Lao forces occupied the neutralist headquarters in the Plain of Jars seemed to have eased somewhat by the week-end. The situation, both on the spot and diplomatically, remained confused, but the tone of the Chinese press showed that Peking supports Prince Souphanouvong, the Pathet Lao leader, in declaring that he wishes merely to restore the situation as it was before the recent Right-wing coup in Vientiane and to have the declared amalgamation of Right-wing and neutralist forces cancelled. Both China and the Pathet Lao appear, therefore, to be content to consolidate their recent gains in the Plain of Jars, and to be working for a restoration of tripartite coalition government in Laos."

—Diplomatic Correspondent, The Times (London) May 25.

The Generals insisted that Souvanna Phouma agree to reorganize his Cabinet, to appoint new members named by the military and to merge the neutralist forces with the rightists. He agreed over the protests of the Pathet Lao. On May 16 the Pathet Lao attacked and took the neutralist headquarters on the Plain of Jars. Souvanna Phouma in a press conference two days later (Le Monde, May 20) disclosed that he had been warned by Prince Souphanouvong that the Pathet Lao would attack if he agreed to these changes particularly the merger of the armed forces. Indeed Peking claims that the attack was a revolt by neutralist troops objecting to the merger. Le Monde (May 19) in reporting the attack said that "of the ten battalions of Leftist troops which have participated since Saturday in the offensive on the Plain of Jars, six came from the neutralist camp and even constituted, so one is told officially, the elite troops." These battalions passed over to the Pathet Lao, Le Monde reported "because they rejected the integration of the armed forces decided upon by Prince Souvanna Phouma in the wake of the rightist coup d'etat."

Notorious for False Battle Reports

Whether an uprising or an attack, the fighting seems to have ended with resumption by the Left of the control it had over the Plain of Jars before the cease-fire of June, 1962. These movements were not much more than skirmishes with few casualties, and indeed little contact between the opposing forces. The neutralists with Kong Le seem to have withdrawn as soon as shelling began, or even when hostile forces appeared in the neighborhood. But all this has been blown up in the headlines of the U.S. press as if it were a major war. Laos is not very accessible to the outside world. Few reporters get to Vientiane. Fewer still ever get to see a battlefield. They are dependent for their information on the military, local and U.S., in rightist-controlled Vientiane. These have made Laos notorious for exaggerated battle reports.

In 1959 false reports of North Vietnamese and Chinese invasions created a crisis atmosphere on the eve of Khrushchev's visit to Eisenhower but when a United Nations commission investigated it could find no evidence of these supposed incursions. Then in June 1962 another crisis was generated by false reports that the Pathet Lao were marching on Thailand; Lao troops fled in panic across the Mekong river but reporters, when they arrived in their wake, could find no trace of the invading army. Now again the dispatches fed the headlines with reports of invading Red Chinese and North Vietnamese. Proof of the former seems to have evaporated (see box top of page two) while the only proof of the latter we have seen was an AP dispatch from Vientiane in the Baltimore Sun May 30 which quoted some villagers near the Plain of Jars as saying that Communist North Vietnamese must have been among troops they encountered because "military commissary agents bought two dogs as well as rice and chickens from them and this proved foreigners were among the Red soldiers because Laotians do not eat dogs." On such rubbish the peace of the world may hang.

Some Merger

"Although the coup of right-wing generals had dissolved somewhat under pressure from Western governments, it did result in a merger of neutralist and right-wing armies."

—Washington Sunday Star's Weekly Summary, May 24

"Vientiane, May 21 (AP)—Still unused in the fight against the Pathet Lao is a rightist army of about 50,000 troops, allies of the neutralists in the coalition government. Military authorities said it was impossible for the rightists to move from garrison centers in the major towns without leaving vital routes open to the pro-Communists and that air transport necessary to carry out a sufficiently rapid reinforcing move was not available."

—New York Times, May 22.

"Thus far Laotian army right-wing forces haven't been heard from. They are concentrated mostly in the Laotian panhandle. Their combat record is, to put it charitably, undistinguished."

—Keyes Beech of the Chicago Daily News Service from Vientiane in the Washington Post May 27.

Why Our Favorite General in Laos Opened A Gambling Joint And An Opium Den

"Phoumi Nosavan is 44 years old. No one questions his intelligence, his guile and his political sense. . . . He linked his fortunes to those of Prince Boun Oum and the Americans. When Boun Oum disappeared from the political scene two years ago, Phoumi Nosavan entered the coalition government of Prince Souvanna Phouma and patiently began the slow process of regaining his place as the No. 1 man in Vientiane. Last year Phoumi Nosavan hesitated. The Americans had left, drying up the source of those dollars without which the hundred and twenty Generals of the nationalist army [which General Phoumi commands—IFS] would not remain faithful. What to do? Play the neutralist game? Or bring about so anarchic a situation in Laos that the Americans would have to intervene directly? . . .

"In the meantime, a thunder clap in Saigon. Last November 1, a group of Generals overthrew the Diem regime. In Vientiane Phoumi was worried. He had a great many Generals around him. Some of them might be tempted to adventure politically. It was necessary to calm the impatient, and for that to find money.

"One then witnessed at Vientiane some remarkable financial operations. To begin with the abattoirs of the capital, which are very profitable, were assigned to the military. Then—again for the profit of the army—Phoumi Nosavan authorized the opening of a gambling house. One could play there at roulette, dice or dominoes. The Asian passion for gambling emptied the pockets of Vientiane inhabitants for the profit of the General Staff. . . .

"Finally, the latest monopoly of the military in Vientiane: an opium den. It is the only one in the whole world which exists legally. Since its opening, it has always been full. It is very primitive, but contains 150 cots. A pipe costs 70 kips, that is to say about 100 old francs [about 20 cents]. That is not much when one smokes only two or three; it is a great deal when one smokes 50 or 100 pipes. The money rolls in.

"To forestall the expected criticism from their American allies, the Vientiane military hit upon a wonderfully clever idea. They put a placard over the doorway of the opium den: 'Clinic for The Cure of Addicts'."

—G. Penchenier, well known French writer on military and South-East Asian affairs in Le Monde (Paris) May 24-25, one of a series of four articles (also May 23, 27 and 28) on the three Indochinese States we recommend highly.

A Sad Footnote to Nehru's Death; The Supreme Court's Belated Action on Loyalty Oaths

Dr. Leo Szilard Matched His Humanity to His Science

Dr. Leo Szilard helped to create The Bomb and then spent most of his life trying to save humanity from it. He rose, as if by sheer will, from what was supposed to have been his death bed from cancer to found the Council for A Liveable World. He set his fellow scientists and his fellow men a noble example. We mourn his passage. . . .

To all that outpouring of sorrow and eloquence about Nehru we would add only a small, sad note of our own. When Nehru last appeared May 16 before the central Committee of the Congress party, he was given an ovation. But when he ended (so London's Peace News noted May 22) there was meagre applause. He had spoken of his hopes for peace with Pakistan and he had dwelt with sorrow on the violence done to Moslems by the Hindus in India. So long as Gandhi and Nehru led the Hindus against the British, they were adored. But when they tried to restrain the evil passions of their own people: Gandhi was shot by a Hindu religious fanatic. Nehru's last public reception was cold. . . .

The Height of Treason

More shocking than any Southern mob is the record remorselessly set forth by Mr. Justice Harlan for a unanimous Supreme Court in NAACP v. Alabama. For here Alabama's best people, its judges and highest law officers, stand convicted of conspiring to abuse basic concepts of fair trial for eight years in their campaign to outlaw the NAACP. Among the charges against the NAACP, along with aid to the Montgomery bus boycott, was that it tried to pressure the Governor of Pennsylvania and the Penn State football team into "a boycott of the Alabama football team!" This was the very peak of its high treason. . . .

Loyalty Oaths and the First Amendment

"A teacher must swear that he is not a subversive person. . . . The Communist Party is declared in the statute to be a subversive organization. Does the statute reach endorsement for Communist candidates for office? Does it reach a lawyer who represents the Communist Party or anyone who supports any cause supported by the Communist Party? . . . Is it subversive activity to attend international convention of mathematicians and exchange views with scholars from Communist countries? Would any person supporting peaceful but far-reaching amendments be engaged in subversive activity? Could one support participation by this country in a world government? We also conclude that the 1931 oath offends due process because of vagueness. The oath exacts a promise that the affiant will, by precept and example, promote respect for the flag and the institutions of the U.S. and the State of Washington. . . . The oath may prevent a professor from criticizing his state judicial system or the Supreme Court. . . . Or it might be deemed to proscribe advocating the abolition of the Civil Rights Commission, the House Committee on Un-American Activities, or foreign aid."

—Mr. Justice White invalidating loyalty oaths required by the State of Washington for teachers and other public employes.

Two notions, one simple-minded, the other sinister, lay behind the wave of loyalty oath legislation which inundated this country in recent cold war years. One was that "subversives" would be inhibited from their "subversion" by a loyalty oath; the other was that the vagueness of these oaths would make it easy to punish non-conformity by perjury prosecution. The Supreme Court's 7-to-2 decision in the State of Washington cases (see box this page) recognizes the threat of such oaths to First Amendment rights. It is a pity our highest tribunal in the regrettable years of the witch hunt was not as clear-sighted as it is now, when the country is coming out from under this nonsense. Mr. Justice Clark dissenting (with Mr. Justice Harlan) indicates the magnitude of this recovery when he protests that in 1951 the Court unanimously affirmed a Maryland Act (the notorious Ober law) "written in language identical" with Washington's. Clark also protested that the language of the Washington statute was no more vague than that upheld by the Court that same year of 1951 when it validated the Smith Act intended to outlaw the Communists. "Where," Clark asks plaintively, "does this leave the constitutionality of the Smith Act?" A good question.

A Glimpse of Hell or How to Kill 25 Guerrillas and Recruit 1500 More

"Tay Ninh, South Vietnam, June 5 (AP)—Loudspeakers blared strident orders Monday night above Vietnamese villages in a 20-mile-long strip of Communist-infested territory adjoining the Cambodian frontier. 'We are going to clear out this area,' warned airborne spokesmen for a jungle-trained task force of Americans and South Vietnamese. 'There will be no life left here. Move out!'

"Today that strip of territory is wrecked and barren. A hazardous scorched-earth operation that may set a new pattern in the war against Viet Cong guerrillas ended last night. About 25 guerrillas were killed, but the prime targets of air and ground attacks were shelter, food and transport. Huts are in ashes. Sampans are sunk. Bullock carts are smashed. Rice stores, poultry and livestock are destroyed or carried off.

"About 700 civilians—women, children and old men—have been moved. That clears the region for later all-out strikes against the able-bodied villagers and Viet Cong troops based among them who chose to flee and fight on under the Red flag. Officers estimated these totalled 1500. . . . American advisers were divided in their opinion of the effect of breaking up Viet Cong families, some feeling it might spur the men to fight harder."

On Goldwater, Ike and The GOP's Gutless Wonders

It looks like Goldwater, and if that ruins the Republican party it's no more than its so-called liberal leaders deserve. We have yet to see a bigger collection of gutless wonders and inane mediocrities, from Eisenhower down. In particular, after watching Scranton (see adjoining box) on Face The Nation last Sunday, we found our sympathies with Goldwater. If we were a Republican, we might be for him, too. He may be a crazy mixed up kid from Phoenix, but like Popeye he is what he is. Nobody knows what the rest of them are. Rockefeller is more dangerous because sugar-coated by the necessities of New York state politics. He's just about as liberal as Allen Dulles and a little more belligerent in foreign policy. As for Eisenhower, it is time the truth were told about him. No man ever got further on less: he hasn't the foggiest notion what domestic politics are all about, he seems to think Lincoln fought that war to defend States Rights. He showed his spinelessness years ago when he refused to defend his friend George Marshall against McCarthy, and he's too lazy ever really to exert himself. His off-again, on-again performance about Goldwater was true to form.

Put The Birchites Where They Can Be Seen

The Goldwater campaign will probably put a half dozen Birchites into Congress but that doesn't make us nervous either. One of the things that killed McCarthy was making him visible on TV. The more the public gets a look at these crypto-Fascist screwballs, the worse for them. Rather than leave the Goldwater coalition of Birchites and Rip Van Winkle McKinleyites feel that they had been cheated of their chance by Eastern seaboard influences, we'd rather see them get it. We have no doubts about the outcome. The bad thing about a Goldwater campaign is that it will enable Johnson to move rightward, but maybe that will free the liberals from his clutches for action on their own. On Cuba and on Vietnam, it's hard to distinguish between the so-called "extremists" and the men in power; the only difference between them is in the degree to which they would wage war, and this difference is largely the difference between being in power and sobered by it, and being out of power and free to indulge in demagogy. We remember how Kennedy spoke against Eisenhower in 1960 on Cuba, Laos and that imaginary missile gap. The Financial Times of London said quite rightly last week that a campaign between Goldwater and Johnson would be like a contest in England between the extreme right wing of the Tory party—and its left wing, i.e. between a bit of a crackpot and a moderate conservative. In any case, should Goldwater be nominated, we don't advise readers to leave for New Zealand. It'll be much more interesting here.

Just A Man of Principle

Mr. OTTEN (Wall St. Journal): Are you saying that Sen. Goldwater does not fit that image of Lincoln and Eisenhower?

Gov. SCRANTON: No, I am not saying that. . . . I think the most important thing, first of all, is to find out precisely where the Party is moving in this, and to make sure that it does stand by the principles that it has always stood for. And if I am convinced that this will not occur, then you will see quite a little activity on my part to make sure that it does.

Mr. NIVEN (CBS News): Does that mean becoming a candidate, perhaps?

Gov. SCRANTON: I would doubt that, sir . . . I don't plan to go out and try and defeat Sen. Goldwater . . . But I do think it important . . . that the Party keep to a sound footing. . . .

Mr. NIVEN: Would you consider Mr. Goldwater an unsuitable nominee if he had just voted against the civil rights bill?

Gov. SCRANTON: No, not necessarily. I don't think one bill makes the difference. . . .

Mr. NIVEN: Would you accept a nomination to run with Sen. Goldwater?

Gov. SCRANTON: Well, maybe. . . .

Mr. OTTEN: Even though you would not be comfortable campaigning with him?

Gov. SCRANTON: I am usually pretty comfortable campaigning. . . .

West German Bundestag Ratifies Nuclear Test Treaty Only After U.S. Assurances on MLF

British Laborite Wilson Claims K Agreement to Mideast Peace Moves

We hope there was more to the Johnson-Eshkol meeting than appeared in public. Otherwise the meeting was little more than a bit of mutual electioneering. It helped Johnson with the Jewish vote, without committing the U.S. to anything which would antagonize the Arabs and their friends among the oil companies. It may help Eshkol in the fight he now faces with Ben Gurion over the Lavon affair. Most disappointing was the lack of any concrete progress on Johnson's unexpected offer last February of "cooperative research" in the desalinization of sea water by nuclear power. The final communique only promised joint studies.

One Way to Get Nazi Scientists Out of Egypt

In this respect Labor Party leader Harold Wilson's trip to Moscow seems more promising than Eshkol's visit to Washington. The U.S. press and wire services paid little attention to Wilson's Middle East initiatives there. He claimed at a press conference in Moscow after seeing Khrushchev that the Soviet Premier had responded favorably to proposals (1) for a treaty forbidding any nation to let its scientists help others build nuclear weapons and missiles and (2) for an arms shipment control commission to prevent an arms race in the Middle East.*

On general disarmament Wilson's talks were less fruitful. The stumbling block is the MLF, on which the U.S. is proceeding despite the fears of the Eastern bloc and the misgivings of all its Western allies except the Germans. Moscow cannot take our talk of wishing to stop the proliferation of nuclear weapons seriously while we propose to put a German finger on the nuclear trigger via the MLF. We would feel the same way if Moscow were setting up a joint satellite nuclear force for its Germans. The British Labor Party has made it clear that it will not support MLF if it wins the next election. Belgian, Dutch and West German trade union leaders pointedly abstained when Jean Monnet's unofficial Committee for a U.S. of Europe backed a joint U.S.-European nuclear force though without endorsing the MLF. Fears East and West will be increased by the fact that the West German Bundestag did not ratify the nuclear test ban treaty until U.S. negotiator Wm. C. Foster arrived in Bonn with assurances that U.S. disarmament proposals at Geneva "will do nothing to endanger the planned multilateral nuclear force." (Baltimore Sun, June 6).

The State Department and undercover agencies are still doing their best to keep full awareness of MLF's significance from the U.S. public. The visit to the Hague of a Women's Strike for Peace delegation representing women from all NATO countries was blacked out of the U.S. press though it provided picture and feature story material otherwise attractive and widely played in Dutch papers. The barring of Mrs. Linus Pauling at the Dutch border was the kind of disgraceful business in which FBI and CIA specialize. The women presented a petition to the NATO Council meeting signed by some of the world's greatest scientists and thinkers but it is hard to find any mention of this in the U.S. press. WISP is planning nationwide demonstrations July 15 when the Destroyer Biddle is launched at Norfolk as an MLF pilot project with 49 German sailors aboard. This will probably also get blackout treatment.

 Le Monde of June 5 which arrived at press time carries an AFP dispatch from Moscow quoting Wilson as saying, "I asked Khrushchev if he was against Egypt and other countries becoming nuclear powers. He was very categoric. He said he did not want countries like Egypt to become nuclear powers."

Why Korea's Students Revolt

"The dismal fact, which neither South Korea nor the U.S. will admit publicly, is that the costly American program to rebuild agrarian South Korea has failed while industrial North Korea under Communist methods has achieved relative stability and prosperity. Two months ago North Korea dramatically contrasted conditions in the divided halves of the country by offering unemployed South Korean students full-time jobs. . . . Of more than 30,000 students leaving university in South Korea this year only 600 have secured worthwhile employment. The Japanese believe that in these circumstances and with the bitterness of the Korean war receding many South Koreans would rather seek reunion than adopt the only alternative of closer ties with Japan—and the risk of reimposed Japanese financial dominance."

—Richard Hughes from Tokyo in The Guardian (London) May 17, quoting an un-named U.S. diplomat as saying, "We don't shout it aloud but with all its risks and dangers, a reunion of the two halves of Korea has never been nearer than now."

So The Pentagon's Real Purpose Is Not To Keep An Eye On Castro But To Humiliate Him

"U.S. reconnaissance satellites have been photographing the face of the earth, including Russia and her satellite nations for five years. But the Pentagon has said little about its satellite system since a few months after the first experimental vehicle was orbited in 1959. So no official Pentagon comment was stirred by the report yesterday that Khrushchev has expressed belief that this country should conduct its inspection of Cuba in this manner and avoid a new crisis arising out of overflights. . . .

"American officials, when asked about the feasibility of using satellite reconnaissance over Cuba, say that this would not meet the American purpose at all. The American surveillance must be conspicuous in order to demonstrate that the 'right' to fly over Cuba claimed since the missile crisis is still being exercised. Actually no one in a responsible position in the American government believes that there are offensive missiles in Cuba. Introduction of long-range missiles could be checked easily by satellite photography, radar-carrying aircraft flying off Cuba, or by conventional espionage.

"But these methods would be invisible to Premier Fidel Castro and the Cubans. Surveillance is maintained by U-2 aircraft flying over the island at an altitude that is high but not so high that the Cubans cannot try to shoot them down. Administration policy is that if one is shot down all of the Cuban surface-to-air missiles, supplied by Russia, will promptly be destroyed in retaliation.

"In other words, the over-flights are really a dare to Mr. Castro to start something."

Should U.S. Scientists in Drug Frauds Be Allowed to Plead "Superior Orders"?

Time to Hit A Sensitive Nerve By Calling It "Johnson's War"

Aiken's speech on Southeast Asia in the Senate June 2 was doubly significant: the first Republican to join the small peace force gathered around Morse and Gruening; and, unlike Morse, who has been tactfully calling this "McNamara's War," Aiken put the responsibility where it belongs—on the President. Johnson cannot be allowed the mantle of peacemaker and war-maker at the same time. True, he inherited the war from Kennedy. But the decisions now are his. His favorite line is, "Come, let us reason together." When will he apply it to Southeast Asia? In Eastern Europe his policy is to detach the Soviet's satellites by trade and cultural relations. When is he going to apply the same method to Vietnam? Aiken opposed extension of the war and favored an international conference. This is the way to avoid the stigma of "Johnson's War." The peace forces ought to step hard on this sensitive nerve.

The Case For A Cease-Fire Now

"It is becoming increasingly evident that the undeclared war in Vietnam can and will ultimately be settled only at the conference table. If that is the case then the sooner the U.S. takes the initiative in the UN to obtain a cease-fire the better. On June 1 the Washington Post editorialized that the U.S. should take a 'middle course.' Admitting that the issues of Vietnam will ultimately have to be settled at the conference table, the editorial would nevertheless advocate needless sacrifice of thousands of American lives to strengthen our hand at the conference table. The military might of the U.S. does not need to prove itself by the needless loss of thousands of its fighting men nor by the incineration of villages by napalm bombs. The New York Times adopts a similar position editorially, saying in its May 29 issue, 'The prelude to a peaceful settlement through negotiation may have to be a temporary increase. . . . To get our troops out of the area . . . it may be necessary first to put more in.' In other words we have got to kill a lot more American boys as well as Vietnamese and spend more millions of dollars before we do what we know we will have to do ultimately. What utter folly!"

—Gruening of Alaska in the Senate June 3 (abridged) a speech most of the press ignored.

The Moral Duty of Scientists

At the Nuremberg trial, the court insisted men could not escape punishment for inhuman acts by pleading they had only been carrying out orders from their superiors. Federal Judge McGuire here in the District of Columbia applied a more lenient rule in the Richardson-Merrell case. Three scientists who pleaded nolo contendere, the equivalent of guilty, to charges of supplying misleading reports to the Food and Drug Administration on a harmful anti-cholosterol patent medicine were allowed to go free on six months probation. Judge McGuire said he felt the blame rested "on the failure of proper executive, managerial and supervisory control." This is dangerous judicial doctrine. Scientists know what they are doing. Not to punish them is to encourage similar violation of moral duty in other laboratories. MER-29, marketed as an anti-cholosterol drug, caused cataracts and impotence. The company sold $12,000,000 worth—and now gets away with an $80,000 fine!

The wisdom of outlawing loyalty oaths is reinforced by a figure the Baltimore Sun disclosed June 4. The editorial welcomed the Supreme Court's decision against the oaths imposed by the State of Washington and suggested repeal of Maryland's Ober Act which has a similar loyalty oath. The Sun pointed out that "on a secret list Ober enforcers have 3,000 names, although they admit there are no more than 100 'diehard' Communists in the State." This means that the Ober Act in its 15 years of existence has given Maryland an excuse to keep Left and liberal organizations of all kinds under surveillance and to build a black (or "Red") list.

While Secretary Rusk hailed the Shah of Persia as "a symbol of stability" and the Washington Star as "a cause for democratic rejoicing," the State Department and the Iranian Embassy did their best to frustrate a press conference called in protest by the Iranian Student Association. The Shah is a symbol of police state rule and a fake land reform used to siphon U.S. aid dollars into Swiss banks. Hardest of all for the students to understand is why three American universities confer honorary degrees on a ruler who sent troops with "shoot to kill" orders into the University of Teheran two years ago killing one student and wounding 2,000 others. The only appropriate degree would be Doctor of Despotism.

Ignorance and Inhumanity Uncovered in the Defoliation-by-Atom-Bomb Controversy

The defoliation controversy is uncovering not only the irresponsibility of Senator Goldwater but the ignorance and inhumanity of the Air Force. The atomic physicist Ralph E. Lapp in a letter (New York Times June 5) takes issue with the General from whom Goldwater got the idea of using atomic bombs to deprive guerrillas in Vietnam of their leafy cover. The proposal for defoliation-by-atom-bomb (of Hiroshima power) was put forward in the Air University Quarterly Review (Spring, 1960) by Gen. Frederic H. Smith, Jr., now retired but then at U.S. Air Force HQ in Europe.

Dr. Lapp wrote that Gen. Smith's "thesis is in violent disharmony with the official data on nuclear weapons effects." He pointed out that on page 346 of "The Effects of Nuclear Weapons", the Bible on the subject, "there appears a photo of an area 1.25 miles from Ground Zero at Hiroshima." The trees in the photo are "intact, no limbs ar broken, and leaves are in place." Where trees were denuded in Hiroshima or Nagasaki it was by fire storm. The probability of a fire storm in the rain forests of Vietnam, Dr. Lapp went on, was very low "due to the high water content of the leaves."

Dr. Lapp's letter dealt only with the defoliation problem. A more serious question is raised by Gen. Smith's article. "We must achieve," the General wrote, "through education and through clear-cut, logical tactical doctrine, a general acceptance by the U.S. of the requirement for the use of nuclear weapons in limited war." He expressed the belief that "limited aggression" could be deterred if enemies were convinced "that we can and will employ nuclear firepower from the outset." Thus his article is to be read as part of a campaign to get the American public used to the idea. We don't think it will endear us to the peasants of Vietnam.

Five Unsolved Negro Murders in Five Months in Mississippi

Will the White House Wait for More Bloodshed This Summer Before Acting?

There will be murder this summer in Mississippi. More urgent than the Civil Rights Bill, which seemed sure of passage as we went to press, are steps to inhibit violence in Mississippi when 1,000 volunteers invade the State to help Negroes register. The Council of Federated Organizations, which is running this Mississippi Summer Project, held a hearing here last Monday before a panel of writers and educators on which we hope to report more fully in next week's issue. The testimony showed a campaign of terror by official and unofficial white agencies in the State to prevent the registration of Negro voters.

The Basic Law Is White Supremacy

Law enforcement there is enforcement of white supremacy. This is an old story but it still, as naive questions at the hearing indicated, seems to surprise good people in the North. Some of our best boys and girls are going to get the same treatment in Mississippi this summer unless strong preventive action is taken in advance.

The ideal move would be to send troops or Federal marshals to Mississippi before instead of after bloodshed. A politically more practical move would be to press for hearings in Mississippi this summer by the Civil Rights Commission. The Kennedy Administration vetoed hearings in that State. Johnson ought to be petitioned to order them. The crisis in civil rights will come in Mississippi this summer. The Commission ought to be on hand to observe it. Its presence would inhibit violence. The restraining influence would be strengthened if the President announced that an FBI man and a Justice Department man would be on hand at each hearing.

If the White House cannot be moved then we urge that a citizens' panel like that (under Dr. Harold Taylor) which presided at the hearing last week be formed to hold hearings during July and August in Mississippi.

Steps of this kind will save lives. The testimony at the hearing showed that there have been five unsolved murders of Negroes in Mississippi during the past five months. One was that of Louis Allen, who witnessed the unpunished 1961 slaying of Herbert Lee, a registration worker by E. H. Hurst, a member of the State legislature. Allen later signed an affidavit saying that Hurst had killed Lee "without provocation." Allen was warned to leave; had his jaw broken by a deputy sheriff; asked the Justice Department in vain for protection. His head was blown off by a shotgun just 12 hours before his scheduled departure. That is how they play it in Mississippi.

The gap between what Congress enacts and what Mississippi obeys is an abyss. One brave Negro testified that after he tried to register his house was fire-bombed—and then he was arrested for arson! James Travis, a SNCC field worker, was shot in the back of the head while returning from a voter registration rally. Suspects were arrested after pressure on the FBI but have never been brought to trial. These stories are a sample of what to expect this summer.

Another Nail in the SACB's Coffin

As we were about to go to press a major victory was won in the fight against the registration provisions of the Internal Security Act. The Supreme Court, by refusing to grant a review, left standing a unanimous decision by Chief Judge Bazelon in the Court of Appeals which held that officials of the Communist Party could not, under the 5th amendment, be required to register the Party. Just three years ago, the Supreme Court 5-to-4 upheld the registration provisions as not in violation of the 1st amendment but declined to pass on the 5th amendment question until someone had been convicted for failure to register. The dissenters, Warren, Black, Douglas and Brennan, held then that the 5th amendment applied. Of the original majority, Harlan, Clark and Stewart are still on the Court. White took no part, since he had been in the Justice Department when the case was being prosecuted. The government may, under the decision below, ask for a new trial and take on itself the almost impossible burden of proving that the Party may find a "willing volunteer" to register it without incriminating himself. In the absence of such a request, an acquittal will be ordered. This would not mean the end of the Subversive Activities Control Board with its power of blacklisting radical organizations, but it would be another judicial nail in its coffin.

"It'll Be A Hot Summer in Mississippi—And I Don't Mean The Weather"

"Well, I can say there will be a hot summer in Mississippi, and I don't mean the weather. Because the people are really getting prepared. They have been riding with guns. But Ruleville is a very small town. There are about 2,000 people in there. I see now they have a tank, and they are keeping the dog riding on the back of the truck so if the truck stops, the dog won't have anything to do but jump off. And the mayor, he would ride around and tell folk don't let the outside people come into their homes, because after they stay awhile, they would just beat them up. But they say, 'Don't say anything to Fannie Lou.'

"I'm not even going on that street. My husband was fired the day after I qualified to run as congresswoman in the Second Congressional District. Last week he had gotten a second job. The mayor went out on this job on which he was working, so he will probably be fired by the time I get back home."

A Noble Task for This Generation in America

At every turn the long fight over the Civil Rights Bill of 1964 has attested the power of minorities. A minority of Southern Senators was able to hold up action for months by filibuster until shut off by a two-thirds vote. A minority of the minority Republicans was able to water the bill down as the price of reaching the two-thirds required for cloture. Neither the Republicans nor the Democrats could afford to antagonize the Negro minorities in the urban and industrial centers of the North. The bill itself, the first comprehensive Federal civil rights legislation since the days of Reconstruction, marks the arrival of the Negro as a major force in American politics; what the Radicals sought to confer upon him as a gift after the Civil War he has now obtained on his own. Finally, it is no secret that the Negro upsurge has been the work of a minority of a minority. SNCC and CORE and SCLC and NAACP are made up of heroic but pitifully small numbers well padded out on every picket line with white sympathizers. As in almost every revolution, social, national or racial, the discerning will see the apathetic or cautious mass behind the glamorous scene. Here we see again what a few who care can do.

'I Could Hear People Screaming'

On August 31, in 1962, I traveled 26 miles to the county courthouse to try to register (to vote.) I was fired the 31st of August from a plantation where I had worked as a timekeeper and sharecropper for 18 years. My husband had worked there thirty years.

On the 10th of September, they fired into the home of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Tucker 16 times for me. That same night two girls were shot at Mr. Herman Sissel's. Also, they shot Mr. Joe Maglon's house. I haven't had a job since that day I was fired.

In 1963, I attended a voter registration workshop and was returning back to Mississippi. At Winona, Miss., I was arrested. After I was locked up in a cell, I began to hear the sounds of licks, and I could hear people screaming. I don't know how long it lasted before I saw Miss Ponder, the Southwide supervisor for SCLC (Southern Conference Leadership Conference) pass the cell with both her hands up. Her eyes looked like blood, and her mouth was swollen. Her clothes was torn. (Then) I was carried out of the cell into another cell where there were two Negro prisoners. The state highway patrolman gave the first Negro a long blackjack that was loaded with something, and I was beat until I was exhausted.

—Testimony of Fannie Lou Hamer, Ruleville Miss. (abr.) before the COFO panel.

Russell Deplores The Clergy

The bill is also a triumph of conscience. "I have observed with profound sorrow," Russell of Georgia told the Senate last Wednesday, "the role that many religious leaders have played. . . . We have seen cardinals, bishops, elders, stated clerks, common preachers, priests and rabbis come to Washington to press for the passage of this bill." He complained —could there have been a greater confession of obtuseness?— that they had sought to make its passage "a great moral issue"! The four little girls killed in that bombing of the Negro Church in Birmingham last September did not die in vain. Here again a minority played its part, a religious leadership minority and the minority of the imaginative and sympathetic whites. Right was on the Negro's side, and the white majority was ashamed.

There was a third major factor. "Lyndon Johnson," Russell said bitterly on the floor the day the filibuster was shut off, "had more to do with this than any one man." The remark was not meant as an accolade. Russell himself later struck it from the Record lest so burning an accusation come back to haunt him later as a party regular. But the fact is that the same Lyndon Johnson who made his debut in the Senate 15 years ago as an opponent of Federal civil rights legislation of any kind, even against lynching, has made his debut as President by successfully putting through Congress the most sweeping civil rights bill in a hundred years. He who once upheld the filibuster as a guarantee of minority rights has now presided over the first application of cloture to shut it off on a civil rights measure. The bill as passed under Johnson is better than the bill originally proposed by Kennedy. The latter found himself stalemated between the deep hatred of the South for this Catholic Yankee Negro lover and the glee of the Republican leadership which hoped to benefit by a party split. The appearance of a new President, the fact that he spoke with a Southern accent and was himself a conformist rather than maverick Southerner, the fact that he had to prove himself to the Northern liberal and the Negro, changed the political situation overnight. Johnson's enormous gifts as a persuader and wheeler-dealer made themselves felt in both House and Senate. He was the No. 1 lobbyist for civil rights.

The Value of Three-Judge Courts

Republicans in the Senate exacted compromises to supply the votes needed for cloture and passage, but even so the bill retains sections on fair employment practices and equal access to public accommodations. Neither was included in Kennedy's original proposals. Voting rights were still the main emphasis of his Civil Rights message. Then he suggested that the courts be authorized to appoint voting referees where the Attorney General certified that less than 15% of any racial group was registered. Now the Attorney General can act wherever he finds a "pattern or practice" of discrimination. Best of all he may detour around the white supremacist judges on most of the Federal District Courts in the South by asking for a three-judge court to be set up by the Chief Judge of the Circuit. Three-judge courts may also be asked where Negroes are refused access to public accommodations.

Except for the absence of stronger powers against police brutality and the deletion of authority to allow the Attorney General to initiate preventive action against the suppression of basic rights, the bill is almost as broad as one would have wished. Its weakness lies in its enforcement provisions. This is most striking in the case of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, which has been steadily watered down. The Clark and Roosevelt bills would both have established a Commission with power to issue cease and desist orders, like other regulatory commissions, enforcible in the Circuit Courts of Appeals. The House Republicans moved the enforcement power to the Federal District Courts and gave them the right to make their own findings de novo. The Dirksen substitute weakened this further. If the Commission is unable to obtain voluntary compliance, the complainant is free to bring a civil action in court! If the employer or labor union fails to obey the court's order "the Commission may commence proceedings to compel compliance." This is certainly going the long way round. On the other hand where the Attorney General finds a "pattern or practice" of discrimination, as in the South, he can bring a civil action on his own.

Without Anaesthesia

"February 28, 1963, I attended a voter registration meeting in Greenwood, Mississippi, along with Robert Moses and Randolph Blackwell. After the meeting was over, we left the SNCC office en route to Greenville. A white Buick began following us. There were three white men in it. When no other cars were in sight, it pulled up alongside and opened fire with a submachine gun. I was hit in the back of the head and shoulder.

"They took me to the hospital in Greenwood. The doctor took some X-rays and he wanted to remove the bullet. But I did not want him to because I was afraid he would not do his best. The following day I was transferred to a hospital in Jackson, a university hospital. The bullet was removed that afternoon without any anaesthesia.

"Two days after they took the bullet out, the doctor came in after breakfast and said, 'You are discharged.' I told him I didn't feel up to it. He came in (again) after supper and he said, 'You are discharged and you got to leave.' So I left.

"The people who did the shooting were arrested and released on bond. And in November the trial was to come up, but after the death of Pres. Kennedy they postponed it. They said people would have resentment because of the assassination. And nothing more has come of it."

—Testimony of James Travis, SNCC worker.

Going Easy on the North

The essence of the Dirksen-Humphrey compromise was to go easy on the North for the sake of better enforcement in the South. The North has been provided with a major loophole by requiring that fair employment and public accommodations cases first be brought before State civil rights agen-

The Sheriff Put One Hand On His Blackjack And The Other on His Pistol

Mr. FREEDMAN: I understand you have been involved in attempts to register to vote. Have you been successful?

Mr. TURNBOW: No, sir, I haven't. The second time I went to take it over again, the Circuit Clerk told me no, I didn't pass, I wouldn't never pass. And he tried to raise a big fuss with me, so I walked out. The first time we had lots of trouble. We had heard of a citizenship school being taught in Leflore County. Some of the citizens in our area asked them to come down and tell us about it. John Ball, he come, and he talked to us and told us that he was learning us how to register, since we were not familiar with registering in Mississippi. So in a two week period, fourteen of us thought we knowed it well enough to go register. We went to Lexington. We didn't drive our cars up in town. We stopped them outside and we walked uptown. We didn't walk in a big gang. We walked in two's about ten or twelve feet apart, so they couldn't say we was demonstrating.

So we was met by the sheriff, Mr. Andrew P. Smith. He met us at the south door of the courthouse. And he stopped us. So Samuel Block was leading us. And Samuel Block said "March forward." And Mr. Smith put one hand on his blackjack and the other one on his pistol and said, "None of that goddamned forward stuff here."

So I stepped out the line. I said, "Mr. Smith, we only come to register." He said, "Well, Turnbow, go around to the north side of the courthouse and stop under that tree and don't go in no big crowd, go in two's." So we did that, Mr. Smith, Mr. Andrew P. Smith, he came round there under the tree where we were standing and he looked at us, he put one hand on his blackjack and the other on his pistol and raised his voice. He said, "All right, now, who will be first?" And the fourteen of us got scared and looked at the other. So when the fourteen commenced looking one at the other, I just stepped out of the fourteen. I said, "I will be first, Mr. Smith." No sooner I said I will be first than Mr. Smith calmed his voice. He said, "All right, Turnbow, go down the side, and go in the courthouse and do what you go to do." [See the sequel next page.]

—Testimony of Hartman Turnbow, Tchula, Miss. (abr.).

. . . Courts Can Shut Down Non-Complying Businesses Until They Obey

cies; these exist only in the North. Most of them are pretty poor. There has been speculation that the South might set up agencies of its own to take advantage of this method for giving the Negro a run-around. But one hopes this would prove little more than a delaying action since time limits are placed on the state agencies and the law requires that they be "effective."

The South's Big Loophole

The big loophole for the South is the Morton amendment requirement for jury trials in all criminal contempt cases—except those arising out of voting rights where a Judge may still impose a prison sentence of up to 45 days and a fine of up to $300 without a jury. Southern juries are expected to acquit. In public accommodations and fair employment cases the courts nevertheless have a powerful civil remedy. They can close down a restaurant or a factory until it complies. The most important new punitive power in the bill—and the one the South most fears—is the cutting off of Federal aid where there has been discrimination in its use. Much will depend on the will to enforce, especially on the part of the Attorney General; on the militancy of the Negro; and on the extent to which opinion can be mobilized by the President for large-scale voluntary compliance, particularly in access to public accommodations. Here it will be easiest for the Negro to make his impact felt without prolonged and costly litigation.

Fresh Heart to Fight

No one can tell just what effect the law will have. Some Northern States like New York have long had much better civil rights laws and yet the Negro in them still lives a life apart and degraded. The testimony from Mississippi in the boxes on our first three pages from the hearing held in Washington June 8 by a citizens' panel shows the brutal reality which confronts the Negro when he tries to vote in many parts of the South. The law will not change that, except in encouraging the Negro to be more militant. That is perhaps its most important function. By recognizing his rights, it gives him fresh heart to fight for them. But his road to freedom is still a long, rocky and probably bloody one. His rights must remain theoretical so long as his education is inferior, and he is caught in the vicious circle of poverty and ignorance. But he is not the only one who needs to be educated. The fight which the Presidency, the clergy, the labor leadership and intellectuals of all kinds have waged to win this bill must now be applied to the harder task of changing white men's attitudes. The bill and the effort behind it does our country proud. There are few nations on earth which have so mobilized all their leadership circles in a concerted drive against racism, a disease that poisons human relations everywhere on this planet. India has done far less for the untouchable than we for the Negro; the new Negro republics tend to be as racist as the white. To set a better example here, to bring Negroes into the full orbit of American life, to make them feel this is their country, too—what a noble task for this generation of Americans.

It's Dangerous To Go Home Again

Mr. PERCY BREWER: (brother of Charles and Greene Brewer) Well, now, after he (Charles) came to three days later, after he got where he could talk, he said he [had gone] in the store and called for two pops, one for him and one for my brother over here (Greene) and said the store owner asked him if he wanted the pops opened, and he told him yes. The man said, "When a damn nigger goes north and comes back, he gets beside himself, and he gets where he can't respect white folks." (Charles) turned to walk out of the store. Mr. Rittle reached behind a heater and pulled out an axe handle and cut him off between there and the door. He turned around and Mr. Hunter, the store owner, swung at him with an axe handle. He throwed up his left arm, and grabbed the axe handle with his right hand and said a lick come from behind him, and that is all he remembered before the next four days in the hospital. So I asked the doctor what condition was he in, and the doctor told me he didn't have no broken bones but for about five days he would throw up blood by the pan full, bleed from his nose and mouth and ears. He stayed in the hospital for eight days. He came out of the hospital on the 12th and was drafted into the army on the 17th. And that is where he is now."

They Fire-Bombed His House—And Then Arrested Him for Arson

Mr. TURNBOW: So after dinner, I went back in [the courthouse] and [the clerk] was in. He said, "What do you want?" I said, "I want to register to vote." He just handed me the form and I filled it out and signed it and handed it back to him. So then after that I noticed the next day the Lexington Herald, a little local paper they write—they had a write-up that "Hartman Turnbow was an integration leader." About two weeks or little after that my house was fire-bombed and shot in all at the same time. My wife and daughter, she is sixteen, they jumped out of bed screaming and hollering that the house is on fire, it has been bombed. I had a little old 22 automatic Remington sitting over in the corner. I picked it up and pushed the safety off and run out. And no sooner I got out in the open with my rifle in my hand, I saw two white men, and one of them no sooner he saw me shot at me. I had my 22 already in position and I just commenced shooting at him right fast. But while me and this one on the back were shooting at each other, somebody on the front was shooting all in the front of the house.

After daylight broke, we got in the car and we went out to Mitchell's, and we asked them to call the Justice Department and ask them to send an FBI to investigate the shooting and burning. They were there investigating when the sheriff [Mr. Smith] got there. After the FBI left, he asked me "How did it start?" I told him how it started. He said, "You could have done it." Then when he said I could have done it, I said, "Mr. Smith, can I ask you a question?" He said, "Yes, you can ask me a question, one." I said, "Well, do you think I would set my house on fire and don't have no insurance on it?"

So late that evening, about dark, Mr. Smith come back to my house and called me. I walked out there where he was. He said, "I got an arson charge against you, get them up." I got them up, and they pat me down. I got on in the car. So they took me to Lexington and put me in jail.

Senator Bartlett Again Urges That We Try de Gaulle's Road to Peace in Asia

Johnson Practicing Brinkmanship in Escalating The War in Laos

It now seems the purpose of the Honolulu meeting was to prepare for the escalation of the war in Southeast Asia, to use bombing planes in Laos and to get ready for wider action if the Chinese meet the challenge. This is brinkmanship on a particularly deep brink—a war with China which would begin with successful bombardment of Chinese cities and then bog down into a prolonged conflict on the ground. The human suffering that could lie ahead is beyond conception. The split between Moscow and Peking is so fundamental that the Russians may not be at all averse to letting us weaken China for them, and at the same time tie our power down in Asia. It is appalling that we should let ourselves be sucked into this deadly quagmire without the American people being consulted or even made aware of what is happening. . . . As the war clouds gathered, Bartlett (D. Alaska) made a speech in the Senate (June 15)—largely unreported in the press, like most of the peace speeches—warning that we could not make peace in Southeast Asia without China and supporting de Gaulle's proposal to reconvene the Geneva conference and seek a settlement by neutralization. . . . After hearing Rusk in executive session, Morse told the Senate that same day, "I am more convinced than ever, after listening to the Secretary of State, that we are heading for a major war in Asia if we continue our unilateral military action. . . ."

At the Supreme Court

The essential conflict in the historic reapportionment decisions may be seen from a passage in a dissent by Justice Stewart complaining that the majority "forever freezes one theory of political thought within our Constitution," denying the States freedom by districting to avoid "absolute domination by a geographically concentrated or highly organized majority"—in plainer words, the philosophy of majority rule. The obstacle to its "absolute domination," in Justice Stewart's question-begging phrase, lies in constitutional guarantees of minority rights and free expression. It does not lie in district lines which give a rural minority the right to govern urban majorities. These new decisions should end the one-party system in the South and advance the Negro struggle. . . .

First Voice for Peace in The House

"One possibility [for negotiating peace] would be a minimal agreement that both North and South Viet-nam would not join any military alliances or attempt to overthrow each other, either by subversion or direct warfare. Each would be allowed to develop its own form of government and to live in peace. Under this proposal the South would agree to normalize trade relations with the North, but that would not necessarily mean diplomatic recognition. The relationship between East and West Germany could be used as an example. A variation of this proposal might include joint economic development projects between North and South, which could look toward eventual reunification and free elections for the entire country."

—Rep. Wm. Fitts Ryan (D. N.Y.) June 10, the first speech in the House for a negotiated peace. Burton (D. Cal.) rose to commend him and to associate himself with Ryan's remarks.

The Supreme Court last Monday agreed to hear the appeal by Dr. James A. Dombrowski and the Southern Conference Educational Fund from the 2-to-1 decision of a statutory 3-judge court in their suit to recover records seized from them by the Louisiana Un-American Activities Committee. Circuit Court Judge John Minor Wisdom, the dissenter in that ruling, said the real question was whether Louisiana "under the pretext of protecting itself against subversion, has harassed, and humiliated the plaintiffs and is about to prosecute them because their activities in promoting civil rights for Negroes conflict with the State's steel-hard policy of segregation." The Court also allowed the National Lawyers Guild and the American Civil Liberties Union to file briefs amicus in the appeal. Justice Black took no part. . . .

The Washington Star in an editorial June 8 called the MLF a "multilateral farce." . . . The State Department is encountering strong disagreement from leadership groups being briefed privately in favor of these floating naval Towers of Babel in which the Germans would be given a finger at last on the nuclear trigger. . . .

That Delusive Parallel Between Vietnam and Cuba, P. 4

Morse Tells Senate That Johnson Is More Belligerent In Asia Than Ike Was

"President Johnson's comments in San Francisco about our Asian policy grossly overstepped his moral and legal rights. His reference to an "offensive pursuit of peace based on overwhelming military power" is as artful a piece of double-talk as has been uttered in the Cold War. No President is alone entitled to threaten war or to commit the United States to war. . . .

"The President's lamentable excuse is said to be that the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization gives him all the power he needs. He should read the Treaty again. It makes no provision for war by the Organization as a whole, much less the United States acting alone. It calls for nothing more than consultation. . . .

"President Johnson is making the United States the world's leading threat to world peace, and he will discredit himself and his Administration in the eyes of history if he leaves our people the legacy of a unilateral war in Asia. Even President Eisenhower declined in 1954 to commit this country to a unilateral war in Indo-China, unsupported by allies or a specific mutual defense treaty. . . .

"The only possible result of such an American adventure would be that the United States would do Russia's "job" on China, leaving the Soviet Union free from confinement on both her borders. I cannot imagine a greater service the United States could do the Soviet Union than to whittle down her Chinese adversary at a huge and bloody cost to ourselves."

Judicial Sustenance for the Southern Racist

Justices Black, Harlan and White have done the country a double injury by their dissent in the sit-in cases. The majority decisions, by one device or another, found it possible to reverse or remand the convictions without passing upon the fundamental issue, which is whether the States may under the 14th Amendment in any way enforce racial discrimination in public accommodations. The case which Black, Harlan and White made their main battle ground was Bell v. Maryland, which involved 12 Negro students convicted of criminal trespass for a restaurant sit-in in Baltimore in 1960. Since that time both the City of Baltimore and the State of Maryland have passed public accommodations laws. Under these laws what the students did is no longer a crime. The majority, speaking through Mr. Justice Brennan, therefore vacated the judgments against them and remanded to the State courts for such action as may now seem justifiable under the State law as changed.

The Right to Travel Decision

Practically the Supreme Court's decision upholding the right to travel is a victory. Philosophically it's a disappointment. It leaves loopholes that may prove dangerous in the future. Practically, it is another blow at the Internal Security Act, a thought control measure fathered by Mundt and Nixon in the Fifties. It holds that Section 6 of that Act, in denying passports to members of Communist organizations or "fronts" is unconstitutional because it "too broadly and indiscriminately restricts the right to travel and thereby abridges the liberty guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment." But this implies that a more carefully drawn statute might command a majority on the Court. Only Mr. Justice Douglas firmly upholds the right to travel (see box bottom of p. 3); even Black, while condemning the Internal Security Act altogether says that Congress has "broad powers to regulate the issuance of

A Mischief-Making Dissent

At this moment in our national history, when Congress is in the final stage of passing the first public accommodations law since the Civil Rights Act of 1875, there was good grounds for restraint in the Court. If it could not muster a majority clearly to affirm the right to equality then it was wiser to postpone the issue, especially when there were sound legal grounds for doing so. The risk otherwise was to throw doubt in advance on the constitutionality of the new statute by a split within the high Court itself and thus to cast a baneful influence into the scales wherever public opinion is precariously poised between resistance and compliance. It was mischievous of Black, Harlan and White to open the question up and to open it in such a way as inevitably to give emotional support to mass resistance. "We fully recognize," Black wrote apologetically for the dissenters, "the salutary general judicial practice of not unnecessarily reaching out to decide constitutional questions. But this is neither," he quickly added, "a constitutional nor a statutory requirement." So off they went, in an opinion which sounded as if it were written by David Lawrence.

They protected themselves in the small print, of course. They said they were not passing on the constitutionality "of any existing or proposed state or federal legislation." In his oral, as in his written text, Mr. Justice Black was careful to say that he meant only that the 14th Amendment did not of itself and without Congressional legislation, prohibit denial of public accommodations to Negroes. These fine points will not protect the country from the bigots who will now say, "Why even Black. . . ." The whole emotional coloration of the Black dissent is on the side of the aggrieved white Southerner, not his Negro victim. He waded in with joyous abandon on the side of Harlan and White, with whom he otherwise rarely agrees. For Harlan property rights have always been a No. 1 consideration; he has always subordinated civil rights to them. But this was a new stance for Black.

The 13th, 14th and 15th Amendments were intended to free the Negro from slavery and give him first class citizenship. The Southern States sought to circumvent them first by the Black Codes and then by Jim Crowism. In this they were aided by Supreme Court decisions which read the 14th amendment so narrowly as to take the heart out of the first Civil Rights Act. Their spirit lives on in the Black-Harlan-White dissent. Here is a sample of its question-begging formulations. The 14th Amendment, it says, "does not forbid a State to prosecute for crimes committed against a person or his property, however prejudiced or narrow the victim's views may be." Of course not. But is it a crime for a Negro to try and buy a meal at a lunch counter which otherwise serves the public? "Nor," they go on, "can whatever prejudice and bigotry the victim of a crime may have be automatically attributed to the State that prosecutes." Not automatically, of course. But the records of these cases is full of testimony that restaurant and hotel owners refuse service to Negroes not because of their own prejudices but because they fear those "local customs" the Southern States foster.

Hardly "Past History"

The Solicitor General, in a brilliant supplemental brief amicus, argued that "a State which has drawn a color line may not suddenly assert that it is color blind." Black argues that if this were accepted "we would have one 14th Amendment for the South and quite a different and more lenient one for other parts of the country." It is not the 14th Amendment which is more "lenient" in the North. It is the North which is far less harsh and brazen than the South about defying the Amendment. Black complains that to infer State responsibility where there is racial bias in public accommodations would leave constitutional rights to be "governed by past history in the South—by present conduct in the North and West." Surely these Justices do not think racial discrimination in the South is merely a matter of "past history?"

It is the standard Southern answer, to say as the dissenters do, that "the 14th Amendment of itself does not compel either a black man or a white man running his own private business to trade with anyone against his will." This is a tissue of invidious misstatement. The 14th Amendment can and should be read as part of the public policy of this country, which is against racial discrimination. What a man does in his "private business" may be his own affair. But where he has a business which opens its doors to all comers then he cannot deny entrance or service to some solely because of their race. When he does so, he cannot under the 14th Amendment have State support in the shape of police and judicial action to enforce the discrimination via "criminal trespass." Nor can States which have done all they could to maintain the Negro in subjection then come into court and claim that they are merely enforcing property rights. This was the argument of the Solicitor General and of counsel for the sit-in demonstrators.

The Choice The 14th Amendment Made

"In granting Negroes citizenship and the equal protection of the laws, it was never thought that the States could permit the proprietors of inns and public places to restrict their general invitation to the public and to citizens in order to exclude the Negro public and Negro citizens. . . . A fundamental assumption of the 14th amendment was that the States would continue, as they had for ages, to enforce the right of citizens freely to enter public places. . . . The dissent would hold in effect that the restaurant proprietor's interest in choosing customers on the basis of race is to be preferred to the Negro's right to equal treatment by a business serving the public."

—Mr. Justice Goldberg, with Chief Justice Warren and Mr. Justice Douglas in Bell v. Md.

Of course it is not easy, in this as in other basic questions of constitutional law, to find clear answers to present problems in the debates and intentions of its framers. But Black in other cases has not hesitated to pour new wine into the old bottles. However obscure the details may be, the main lines are clear. The South has been engaged for a century in attempting to nullify the Negro's emancipation. It has done its best, in the vivid phrase of the first Mr. Justice Harlan, this one's grandfather, to turn the 13th, 14th and 15th amendments into "splendid baubles, thrown out to delude those who deserved fair and generous treatment at the hands of the nation." Those words are from a dissent in 1883 which at last is being made the law by the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Congress is thereby reversing the Supreme Court. Goldberg, Warren and Douglas would have had the Court, too, reverse that 1883 decision on public accommodations. Mr. Justice Douglas felt that the Court dodged its duty in not doing so. He asked scornfully, "how is a 'personal' right infringed when a corporate chain store, for example, is forced to open its lunch counters to people of all races?" He put the issue unanswerably when he wrote:

> Segregation of Negroes in the restaurants and lunch counters of parts of America is a relic of slavery. It is a badge of second class citizenship. It is a denial of a privilege and immunity of national citizenship and of the Equal Protection guaranteed by the 14th Amendment against abridgement by the States. When the state police, the state prosecutor and the state courts unite to convict Negroes for renouncing that relic of slavery, the 'state' violates the 14th amendment.

It is tragic at this moment, when the strongest kind of stand is necessary to avoid bloodshed, that the Supreme Court did not do its duty and take that unequivocal position.

The Bitter Protest From Douglas Against The Court's Dodging Of The Issue

"On this last day of the Term, we studiously avoid decision of the basic issue of the rights of public accommodation under the Fourteenth Amendment, remanding the case to the state court for reconsideration in light of an issue of state law. . . .

"The whole Nation has to face the issue; Congress is conscientiously considering it; some municipalities have had to make it their first order of concern; law enforcement officials are deeply implicated, north as well as south; the question is at the root of demonstrations, unrest, riots, and violence in various areas. The issue in other words consumes the public attention. Yet we stand mute, avoiding decision of the basic issue by an obvious pretense."

—Justice Douglas's Separate Opinion in Bell v. Md.

Court Implies State Dept. May Put Iron Curtain Around "Sensitive" Areas

passports under its specific power to regulate commerce with foreign nations." Congress also has power to regulate interstate commerce. Would that give it power to require passports between one State and another?

There were three passport decisions.* Two non-Communists, who refused to take a non-Communist oath on principle, had been denied passports. The denials had been upheld in the Courts of Appeals. Without opinion and with only Clark, Harlan and White dissenting, the Court ordered these lower court orders vacated in the cases of Milton S. Mayer and of Vincent Copeland, the former a well-known writer and lecturer of pacifist inclination; the latter, editor of Workers' World.

No Dodges Available

The Court's opinion was handed down in appeals refreshingly free from subterfuge. They were brought by Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, chairman of the Communist Party, U.S.A., and Herbert Aptheker, editor of its theoretical organ, Political Affairs. The Court could not dodge the issue by declaring party membership unproven. It had to decide the right of indubitable Communists to travel. This eliminated the familiar question-begging procedural and evidentiary detours. The advantage of a decision upholding the right of known party members to travel is that it lifts from other radicals and liberals the onus of proving themselves politically antiseptic to get a passport.

But the majority's reasoning was not as clear-cut as the cases. No doubt this was due to the difficulty of finding a common denominator for agreement, but this only shows how few members of the Court are willing to uphold the right to travel with no strings attached. Mr. Justice Goldberg for the majority objected to Section 6, the passport section, of the Internal Security Act on the ground that it applies to travel by a member of a registered organization "regardless of the security-sensitivity of the area in which he wishes to travel." Even were he to apply for a passport "to visit a relative in Ireland, or to read rare manuscripts in the Bodleian Library of Oxford University, the applicant would be guilty of a crime." (The Act makes it a crime merely to apply for a passport, if a member of a proscribed organization).

How "Security" is Best Safeguarded

"The Subversive Activities Control Act is supposed to be designed to protect this Nation"s "internal security." This case offers another appropriate occasion to point out that the Framers thought (and I agree) that the best way to promote the internal security of our people is to protect their First Amendment freedoms of speech, press, religion and assembly, and that we cannot take away the liberty of groups whose views most people detest without jeopardizing the liberty of all others whose views, though popular today, may themselves be detested tomorrow."

—Mr. Justice Black concurring in the passport case.

We don't like the implications. It implies that to travel one must explain one's purposes, to say one is only going to visit a maiden aunt in Killarney or to check Chaucer's spelling. The right to travel is not secure if one's motives and journeys have to be explained. Above all, we dislike the reference to "the security-sensitivity of the area" in which one wishes to travel. This plays directly into the State Department's hands. It can no longer deny passports to individuals. But it still shuts off travel to whole countries and areas in its own "Papa knows best" fashion.

Travel has become a weapon in its hands, of reprisal against the tourist trade of countries like Cuba and of an Iron Curtain against countries it does not wish to recognize. North Korea, China, North Vietnam and Albania—all accessible to visitors and journalists from every other Western country, are off-bounds to us. The dangerous ignorance this may develop is all too apparent in the current Far Eastern crisis. In two obscenity cases, one involving a movie, the other sexy books, Black joined Douglas in asserting that under the First Amendment there is no right to censor in this country. By doing so he cut through a lot of nonsense which is turning the Nine Old Men (as we used to call them in the 30's) into a general board of censorship over pictures and books unfit for their venerable eyes. Why can't Black be as forthright about the right to travel?

 The Court in another Internal Security Act case also granted an appeal by the Veterans of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade from a Subversive Activities Control Broad registration order.

Douglas Calls Freedom of Travel Essential to Free Society

"I would not suppose that a Communist, any more than an indigent, could be barred from traveling interstate. I think that a Communist, the same as anyone else, has this right. Being a Communist certainly is not a crime; and while traveling may increase the likelihood of illegal events happening, so does being alive. If, as I think, the right to move freely from State to State is a privilege and immunity of national citizenship (see Edwards v. California, 314 U.S. 160, 178), none can be barred from exercising it, though anyone who uses it as an occasion to commit a crime can of course be punished.

"Free movement by the citizen is of course as dangerous to a tyrant as free expression of ideas or the right of assembly and it is therefore controlled in most countries in the interests of security. That is why riding box cars carries extreme penalties in Communist lands. . . .

"Those with the right of free movement use it at times for mischievous purposes. But that is true of many liberties we enjoy. We nevertheless place our faith in them, and against restraint, knowing that the risk of abusing liberty so as to give rise to punishable conduct is part of the price we pay for this free society.

"War may be the occasion for serious curtailment of liberty. Absent war, I see no way to keep a citizen from traveling within or without the country, unless there is power to detain him. Ex parte Endo, 323 U.S. 283. And no authority to detain exists except under extreme conditions, e.g., unless he has been convicted of a crime or unless there is probable cause for issuing a warrant of arrest by standards of the Fourth Amendment. This freedom of movement is the very essence of our free society, setting us apart. Like the right of assembly and the right of association, it often makes all other rights meaningful—knowing, studying, arguing, exploring, conversing, observing, and even thinking."

—Mr. Justice Douglas concurring in the passport case.

How Does A Nation Take A Firm Stand, When It Has Nothing Firm to Stand On?

Those Parallels Between Vietnam and Cuba—or Berlin—Are Delusions

Some silly parallels are making headlines and creating new illusions in the Far Eastern crisis. The favorite is with Cuba. The two situations are quite different. In the Cuban crisis, the U.S. threatened war unless the Soviet Union removed its intermediate range nuclear missiles. Khrushchev backed down and took them out. But even if he wanted to, Mao Tse-tung couldn't take the guerrillas out of South Vietnam. He might shut off aid but that wouldn't end the war. The unnamed senior American military adviser who gave that pessimistic off-the-record briefing to the press the day Gen. Harkins left Saigon "said 90% of the guerrillas' weapons" came from the supplies we sent South Vietnam (Reuters in New York Times, June 18). It's not the Mao Tse-tung trail; it's the LBJ pipeline that keeps the war going.

Made to Order for Miscalculation

Kennedy's success in the missile crisis was due not only to a limited aim but to his close relations with Moscow. He had met and sized up Khrushchev personally. The two capitals were in touch through normal diplomatic relations. The two heads of State were engaged in a private correspondence which facilitated settlement. But in the Far East we have no listening posts in either Peking or Hanoi, no diplomatic relations, no personal contact between Johnson on the one hand and Mao or Ho on the other. On both sides decisions are being made in considerable ignorance of the other. This is a situation made to order for miscalculation.

The parallel with West Berlin is equally deceptive. When a nation takes a stand, it has to know where it's standing. In West Berlin we defend a geographical and political entity. Its people don't want to be swallowed up by the East. Their supply lines to the West were established by agreement of both sides and are clearly marked. The line the Communists cannot cross is unmistakable.

But where is the line in South Vietnam? A substantial part of its people support the rebellion, and see it simply as a continuation of their struggle against the French. Another large portion undoubtedly wish the Americans and the Communists, home-grown or otherwise, would go fight somewhere else. Those who support the Khanh government are few; a Saigon dispatch in the New York Herald-Tribune June 21 reports that the Vietcong even collects taxes inside Saigon from contractors working for the U.S. Of all the troubles we don't talk about in Vietnam, the foremost is our fear lest Khanh's government fall to a new neutralist coup from within and expose our political nakedness. We can threaten to bomb Peking and Hanoi all we want to but nothing they (or we) can do will turn Khanh into an Asian Willy Brandt.

As for Laos, that's not a war, it's a chess match, punctuated by occasional artillery blasts. Whichever side blows noisier, the other retreats. Our favorite General, Phoumi Nosavan, seems to be the world's No. 1 military pacifist. We keep his large army (the numbers range up to 70,000) on our payroll but in all the recent fighting on the Plain of Jars, they haven't fired a shot. They've left the fighting if any to Kong Le's split neutralists. The only outcome we can see in Laos is an ultimatum to Ho. Either he puts some fighting men on our side, too, or we bomb Hanoi.

Another Senator Questions the War

"One of the most important assumptions of all which still needs to be tested concerns the very nature of the war itself. Is it indeed a war supplied and directed from Hanoi as our government insists or is it a civil war as many critics have suggested? . . . If we are in fact confronted with a civil war fought under self-contained direction and only incidental outside encouragement, we must start again to ask new questions and test new assumptions. We will need to know if the Viet Cong has a coherent set of political objectives. We will need to know the probable limits of endurance to which the Viet Cong must be pushed before its political objectives can be modified. And we will need to know what possible accommodations can be reached, short of total annihilation of the Viet Cong forces, to resolve the internal conflict. The important thing is that there be no further delay in bringing the tools of diplomacy into full play."

—Sen. Claiborne Pell (D. R.I.), in a speech at a public meeting in Wash., D.C., June 17.

Morse Challenges Johnson to Act in Asia As He Does in Cyprus, P. 3

While LBJ Talks of "A Brutal and Bitter Struggle for the Freedom of A Friend"

"The army's heart is not in the fight with the Vietcong. It is ashamed of waging a civil war. . . . A westerner visiting the countryside not long ago was held up for half a day by a Vietcong detachment. While he was waiting, he was surprised to see several government soldiers walking casually and unarmed through the village and asked his guards why they did not arrest them. 'They come from [a local government outpost]. We have given them permission to do their shopping here,' came the answer. On another occasion, a French reporter was out in the field with an artillery battery that was 'advised' by an American captain. The two stopped to have a drink, and when they came out of the hut were surprised to see the column about to make off in an unexpected direction. 'We have just heard there is a strong Vietcong barrier on the road,' the Vietnamese commander explained, 'so we shall take another route.' 'But you can attack and break it up with your guns,' said the astonished reporter. 'If he'—designating the American officer with his head—'wants to go, he is free to do so. But this is not our war,' replied the Vietnamese officer leading the convey off in the opposite direction."

How to Avoid A Military Occupation of Mississippi

Two days after Attorney General Kennedy told the NAACP the Federal government had no power to take preventive police action in Mississippi, the FBI—under pressure from the White House and public opinion—showed that it could. The arrests at Itta Bena dispose of the idea that, short of a military occupation of Mississippi, the Justice Department has no power to protect the youngsters down there for the Summer Project. Two Northern young white men and a local Negro volunteer were threatened by three white men while passing out leaflets advertising a voter registration meeting. They managed to get away without harm, but were routed out of bed in the Negro section early next morning by FBI agents, and asked for descriptions of the men who threatened them. That day the three white men were arrested under the old Civil Rights statute which makes it a crime punishable by ten years in jail and a $5,000 fine to conspire to "injure, oppress, threaten or intimidate" any citizen in the exercise of rights conferred upon him by the Federal Constitution, in this case the right to vote. A few more instances of such quick preventive action may not only save lives in Mississippi but prevent the Kluxers from taking over.

Protect Negroes As We Would Banks?

"If you have, for example, a bank robber at the American Security & Trust Co., who is going into that national bank and you know it and you call up the FBI or Federal marshals, they are going to be there quick. That guy isn't going to have a chance. . . .

"Under the statutes there is absolutely nothing, for example, to prevent the Attorney General of the U.S. from stationing 20, 40, 200 marshals in various cities in Mississippi and having a marshal present whenever he is notified that a registration effort or a freedom school or any other situation which might result in retaliation from the local authorities is about to take place.

"There is no reason why he could not have Federal law enforcement officers there, precisely as would occur if he were notified that a bank robbery of a national bank were about to take place."

—Wm. L. Higgs, Washington civil rights consultant, before the citizens' panel June 8, transcript in Con. Rec. of June 16, p. 13523.

Before the Mob Gets Out of Hand

It begs the question to keep on saying that under our constitutional system primary responsibility for law and order rests with local and State authority. Federal law has always been the responsibility of Federal officers. This is particularly true where Federal law is in fact obstructed by State and local officials engaged in a conspiracy to "keep the Negro in his place" and preventing Negroes from registering to vote. The volunteers of the Summer Project are only doing what an adequately staffed and properly motivated force of Federal officers would do. These boys and girls are doing the government's work and deserve the government's protection. There is no reason why Federal marshals and FBI men cannot be on hand at voter registration rallies and attempts to register Negroes. Two hundred Federal marshals and FBI men working out of the dozen or so Federal courthouses in Mississippi would go far to prevent trouble. It would be better to send them in now than wait until some outbreak makes it difficult even for troops to reestablish order.

The notion that the Federal government cannot move in until there is virtual insurrection is dangerous nonsense. Those who would like to get some idea of the broad powers available to the Federal government may be referred to the testimony of three lawyers before the hearing held here by a citizens' panel on Mississippi June 8 and reprinted in the Congressional Record for June 16. Not only Federal marshals but FBI men now have the power to make arrests without warrant on the spot where they have reasonable grounds to believe that a Federal offense has been or is being committed. The law was changed in 1951 to give FBI men this power, as a result of the Coplon case.

The two main laws available in the Mississippi affair are the conspiracy statute under which the arrests were made in

Fulbright Pleads Unsuccessfully for More Attention to Human Needs on Earth

House Kills Medicare and Senate Approves $5 Billion "Moon Doggle"

The House killed medicare and the Senate approved $5.3 billion for space travel within one day of each other. The same Southern conservatives who have bottled up the health insurance bill in the Ways and Means Committee for three years will enjoy almost $1.5 billion in space contracts. This inversion of national priorities did not escape one Southerner. "Is it more important to make a more adequate attack on some of the grave deficiencies of our society or to put a man on the moon by 1970?", William Fulbright asked the Senate. His effort to cut 10% from the NASA authorization was narrowly defeated 42-38.

The Senate leadership threw its weight on the side of the space industry. The first time round the bill was rushed through an almost empty Senate in one-half hour and was passed by a voice vote. When the next day Wayne Morse demanded reconsideration and a roll-call vote, Majority Leader Mansfield waited until the liberals were absent and then arranged a one-hour time limit on debate. Even then Fulbright could muster only six Senators to listen to his plea.

A New Form of Pie-in-the-Sky

How is it that in four years a nation can spend $16 billion for space and not vote one penny for any new major social welfare projects? Fulbright turned for the answer to Amitai Etzioni's new book, The Moon-Doggle. It all began, says Etzioni, as an attempt to rebuild U.S. prestige after the Bay of Pigs and to end the 1960-61 recession with federal funds acceptable to conservatives in Congress.

Now that the funds have been distributed—"a goody for everybody here," Fulbright complained—the program is almost impossible to stop. "Not having any State interest involved, I can be objective about it," said Fulbright. So could most of the 37 other Senators voting with him. Their states' share in 1964 space funds was only $850 million compared with $4.8 billion for the states of the 42 Senators who voted against the Fulbright amendment.

The 10% cut would have removed only a small portion of the padding from NASA's request. Last year 77% of space contracts were cost-plus-fixed-fee. The Senate Space Committee is supposed to protect the taxpayer against this kind of inflated profit, but it has been designed to protect the contractor instead. On it sit S. L. Holland of Florida (location of Cape Kennedy), Stuart Symington of Missouri (home of McDonnell Aircraft, the company which produced the Mercury capsule and now is on contract for the $308 million project Gemini) and Warren Magnuson of Washington (home of Boeing Aircraft).

Too few realize that the enormous sums voted for NASA are being used by the Air Force for the militarization of space. The 1958 Space Act established NASA as a civilian agency. A 1963 United Nations resolution outlawed nuclear weapons in space. Contrary to both, the Air Force, whose own space funds have been limited to a "mere" $1.5 billion, is using NASA's project Gemini to train pilots for space bombers and interceptors. For the hardware itself, NASA pays the heavy cost of research and development that go into building first models; then the Air Force buys the next ones "at cost." "The space program of NASA is completely tied in with the space program of the military. They are identical," Senator Anderson, the Space Committee's chairman, told the Senate last year. This should answer those liberals who push the space race as the answer to the arms race.

The Old Stalinist Methods

The Soviet government claims that it has abolished the forced labor camps which were so dreadful a feature of the Stalin period and that it no longer uses "administrative measures" against unorthodox writers. Both claims seem to be untrue, according to the story told by Patricia Blake in the New York Times Book Review (June 21) of how the non-conformist poet Josif Brodsky has been sentenced to five years of forced labor in the far north. We know Miss Blake as a warm friend of Russia's best young intellectuals. By clandestine route she has received copies of protests sent to the court by Shostakovitch, Chukovsky and Marshak. Philistinism and anti-Semitism mark the attacks on this gifted young poet. We recommend a reading of Miss Blake's article to all concerned with the fight for justice and artistic freedom in the Soviet Union, and suggest a round robin protest to Moscow by U.S. intellectuals which we would be glad to join.

Bobby Baker Himself Couldn't Have Picked A Better Chairman for Inquiry Into His Affairs

> At the end of Everett Jordan's first day in the Senate at dusk of May 6, 1958, a reporter stopped him in the corridor and inquired what great things had transpired in those first auspicious hours. "Oh, I went over to the Senate chamber," the kindly old man replied, "and I stayed there until Bobby Baker told me I could come home."
> —Bobby Was The Boy To See, by Don Oberdorfer and Ben H. Bagdikian, Saturday Evening Post, Dec. 7, 1963.

Under the chairmanship of this same Senator Jordan of North Carolina, the Senate Rules Committee has just voted out about as weak a resolution as was politically possible in the Bobby Baker case. Never has a greater scandal been more skillfully and swiftly hushed up. Baker was the right-hand man of Lyndon Johnson as majority leader of the Senate and the fair-haired boy of the Southern conservatives who are the inner core of the Senate Establishment. He resigned last October rather than answer questions about his conduct as secretary to the Democratic majority. The charges he preferred not to discuss involved the sale of legislative favors and the political use of call girls.

But for the assassination of President Kennedy, the Baker scandal might have cost Johnson the Vice Presidential nomination this Fall. His elevation to the Presidency inhibited investigation of his own links to Baker. But the Senate Rules Committee has gone beyond a reluctance to embarrass a new President in an atmosphere of emergency.

It has limited its investigation to Senate employes, exempting Senators, and it has now reported a conflict-of-interest rule so weak that as Senator Case said, "it would not have brought into the open some of the most flagrant of his (Baker's) financial dealings." A stronger rule for Senators and Senate employes by Clark, supported by Pell and Cooper, was rejected in the committee. For the honor of the Senate and the sake of clean government in the future, we hope they will take their battle to the Senate floor, and at least make the whitewash visible.

"War Against China Safer Than War Against Russia? I Think Not"

Morse Asks Why LBJ Practices Peace-Making in Cyprus But Not in Asia

By Senator Wayne Morse *

The words of President Johnson yesterday in Minneapolis give rise to both hope and despair. They give hope because the President recognized the great contribution to world peace afforded by the United Nations and by our adherence to it. But they give rise to despair because President Johnson seems to have separated our responsibility to the rule of law from our activities in Southeast Asia.

How can the United States, through its President, proclaim the rule of law for the problems and issues of other nations, and practice the law of the claw where our own problems are concerned? The President quoted from the Sermon on the Mount when he said, "Blessed are the peacemakers. . . ." But a few lines later in the Sermon on the Mount we are given some clues of how to go about making peace, "Agree with thine adversary quickly, while thou art in the way with him; lest at any time the adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer and thou be cast into prison. Verily I say unto thee, Thou shalt by no means come out thence, till thou has paid the uttermost farthing."

Every War A Gamble

No government that is prepared to risk war can know where or how that war will end, and more often than not an entire nation and a generation of its people pay the "uttermost farthing." Before any Administration threatens to take the U.S. into war it should exhaust the last possibility to avoid it.

This Administration has not exhausted any possibilities in Asia. We are exhausting all the possibilities to keep Greece and Turkey from war. We are using personal mediation, summit diplomacy and the United Nations. But what of our own conflict in Asia? There we talk of nothing but war.

We look upon China as a weak adversary, lacking not only nuclear weapons but much of the ordnance and industrial capacity for even a modern conventional war. We are willing to practice a brinkmanship against China in her backyard that would be unthinkable against Russia in her backyard. But does that mean that war against China is safer for the U.S. than war against Russia? I think not. The nuclear bombs may not fall upon American cities. But the casualties and the cost would still vastly exceed the value to us of the territory we claim we are protecting.

I think we would find our interests in Southeast Asia severely weakened by such a war. Communism has fed on war. It has spread its dominion through war. Unless the U.S. is prepared to do with China what we did with Japan at the close of World War II—to occupy it, rebuild it, and reconstruct its society—there is every likelihood that Communism would spread in Asia if a full-scale war developed there.

I say to President Johnson and to his Secretary of State and to his Secretary of Defense, and to Admiral Felt, that not a single one of you has offered to the American people a goal, a purpose in Asia, that could be accomplished or advanced by war. You have not been able to establish those viable nations about which you like so much to talk even with an investment of billions of dollars. How do you expect to establish the viable nations with war? No, Mr. President let us get away from the policy of peace for Cyprus but war for Asia.

Scientists Oppose Anti-Ballistic Missile

"The cost of the presently proposed American Nike-X anti-ballistic missile system for deployment around 'twenty-odd metropolitan centers containing some 35% of the population' is about $14 billion. For a fraction of that cost an enemy could double or triple the number of missiles he could launch against the same targets. The answer to the creation of an ABM system by an adversary does not lie in the erection of one of our own but in shifting the nature of our offensive system.

"The U.S. [ABM] would be destabilizing. If either party in a deterrent situation should become appreciably more secure and invulnerable, or appear so, the deterrent balance will be upset. The side which feels its security reduced might be inclined to strike first in crisis situations.

"Optimistic evaluations of the ABM could lead to disastrous decisions. In any nuclear strike, an ABM system would tend to insure that greater numbers of warheads and higher levels of megatonnage would be employed with the probable consequence of greater, not lesser destruction."

—Statement prepared by the Committeee for a Sane Nuclear Policy and signed by twenty-three scientists and strategy experts (abridged).

Federation of American Scientists Protests Use of Defoliants in Vietnam

"Biological weapons are potentially very cheap, and their dissemination, particularly among the non-nuclear nations, would have the effect of providing these nations for the first time with a striking power comparable to that afforded by nuclear weapons. Thus, most nations, small and large, could easily and secretly acquire a significant biological and chemical warfare capability, which, furthermore, would be much less susceptible to inspection and control than are nuclear weapons.

"Civilian masses are peculiarly vulnerable, not only because of their relative lack of discipline and protective equipment, but because of the greater effectiveness of biological agents in areas of high population density. Though some mention has been made of the development of so-called "humane" weapons resulting in incapacitation rather than death, the published information suggests that considerable effort is being devoted to development of lethal agents such as those causing anthrax and pneumonic plague.

"Reports that defoliating agents have been used [in Vietnam] to destroy protective cover have been confirmed by representatives of the Defense Department. These charges give rise to the broader implication that the U.S. is using the Vietnamese battlefield as a proving ground for chemical and biological warfare. FAS is opposed to the "first-use" of chemical and biological weapons. We are further opposed to experimentation on foreign soil."

—Federation of American Scientists statement, released to but ignored by the press, June 19 (abr.).

The Main Enemies of Civil Rights in The South Are The Poilce Themselves

Itta Bena and the statute making it a misdemeanor punishable by a year in jail or $1,000 fine to deprive anyone of his rights "under color of law." This applies to local police officials who pick up voter-workers on faked traffic violations or arrest peaceful demonstrators. If FBI men were to take pictures of a few such incidents and then arrest State or local officers, it would have a salutary effect. In addition, as Professor Robert Harris of the University of Michigan Law School pointed out, the Supreme Court held in the Debs case that the Attorney General "without any specific statutory authority, may seek injunctions against those who obstruct the Government in carrying out its enumerated powers." Prof. Harris testified:

> If the courts today should hold that the Federal government's duty to keep open the franchise and the political process in Mississippi is as important as it was to keep open the railroad lines during the Pullman strike, police officers and conspirators may find themselves in contempt of court without jury trials if they persist in ignoring Federal civil rights laws.

Not The Same Enthusiasm

Mr. Lawrence SPEISER [Wash. office, American Civil Liberties Union]: We feel there is a serious misconception on the part of the Justice Dept. as to what their role could be in the State of Mississippi as well as in other States in utilizing more effectively the Civil Rights Act, section 242, to prosecute local law enforcement officers who violate constitutional rights of citizens.

Mr. Monroe FREEDMAN [counsel of the hearing panel]: Mr. Speiser, perhaps you can confirm my recollection that the Justice Dept. prosecuted James Hoffa five times unsuccessfully before they finally convicted him on the sixth try. Are you aware of any similar extended efforts on the part of the Justice Dept. in prosecution of any State official accused of brutality or violation of civil rights?

Mr. SPEISER: I have never heard of any.

—Citizens' Panel Hearing on Mississippi in Washington June 8, transcript in Con. Rec. June 16, p. 13521.

Reluctant to Prosecute

It's not the power but the will that has been lacking. If the Summer Project were threatened by Reds rather than racists, J. Edgar Hoover would never have left the headlines to his old rival, Allen Dulles, or waited for White House orders to infiltrate the Klan. The G-man would have gone South and had his picture taken with the men arrested at Itta Bena. The denial of rights to Negroes, and the murder of Negro militants, have too long been taken for granted. Even now it's only the tragic disappearance of two white volunteers, and the danger to others, which has roused the country. Mistreatment of Negroes by the police, a means of enforcing white supremacy, is regarded as a peccadillo; the FBI does not like to upset its fraternal relations with the local cops by making a fuss over such things. Letters submitted to the Mississippi hearing here showed that though there were 102 complaints of police brutality in Mississippi in the 14 months ended Feb. 28 of last year (and remember not many Negroes have the nerve or knowledge to make a complaint) only 18 were ever presented to grand juries. The ACLU protested in a letter to Burke Marshall of the Civil Rights division that he was applying a stricter standard to these than to ordinary cases. He replied that he did not think he should use his prosecutive authority more broadly "even where the ultimate purpose is to effect a desirable sociological change." We don't like that word "sociological." It unconsciously echoes the Southern notion that the race problem was something thought up by Gunnar Myrdal. It implies that Southern police brutality to Negroes is a kind of folkway, a matter for sociology rather than law.

It is against this attitude that the heat must be applied if the brave youngsters of the Summer Project and the even braver Negroes working with them in Mississippi are to be protected. For the enemy often is not the mob but the local police or Sheriff. Thus one question which cries out for FBI investigation in the disappearance of the three is the timing of their arrest and nocturnal release which so suited the convenience of their kidnappers. Another, as raised by Wm. Bradford Huie, in a dispatch to the New York Herald-Tribune June 29, is how many Mississippi police officers are themselves Klansmen.

Will the Murchisons Control the SEC? P. 2

Gruening Asks the Senate: If A Cease-Fire in Laos, Why Not in Vietnam?

"I congratulate President Johnson and Secretary Rusk on joining Britain, Canada, Thailand and South Vietnam in calling for a cease-fire in Laos. . . . But our action should be extended to a cease-fire in South Vietnam. . . .

"Suppose we win an apparent military decision. Suppose we succeed in identifying all the Vietcong and containing them behind barbed wire. . . . We would have to feed and clothe them well into the future. We would have to seal off the borders with U.S. soldiers. We would have a U.S. colony in Southeast Asia. This might have been considered an accomplishment in the 15th or 16th centuries but not in the 20th. . . . What about the South Vietnamese people not behind bars? Would we have instilled in them a love of the U.S. as the great peace-maker who killed or imprisoned their fathers, brothers and cousins? Is this the way to spread the light of democracy abroad? . . .

"The GOP would-be policy-makers are advocating war and the perpetual colonization of South Vietnam. The action to be taken with respect to South Vietnam is to call for a cease-fire and take the issue to the United Nations."

—Gruening (D. Alaska) in the Senate July 2, in another peace speech which the press blacked out.

"Let Us Close The Springs of Racial Poison"

The words are from President Johnson's statement on signing the Civil Rights Bill. Their noble plea matched the high occasion. The moment was one to make every American proud. In a world poisoned by racialism and tribalism of one kind or another, from Mississippi to the Congo, the U.S. is the one country which has made the eradication of racial discrimination a major national goal. Side by side with this political accomplishment, on behalf of the Negro in a country 90 percent white, is an even more extraordinary spectacle. A small band of college youngsters has headed South ready to risk beatings and death in the cause of racial equality. Most of them have never themselves suffered from the evil they propose to eradicate. Most are white, from well-to-do families, children of the privileged, well-educated, with sure futures. Three have already disappeared, victims of the racial savagery which makes the Deep South as dangerous for them as the jungle. Their disappearance has not stopped the others. History can show few examples of such pure idealism. These youngsters honor our country and our generation; they stand among the foremost in the family of man.

No Time for Euphoria

But we dare not pause more than a moment in the mood of euphoria brought about by passage of the Act and its first few successful tests in such deep South cities as Jackson, Miss. The President, in nominating former Governor Leroy Collins of Florida, to be director of the Community Relations Service the Act sets up, has made a first-rate choice. Governor Collins set an example of courage on the civil rights issue in Florida which seemed at one time to have cost him his political future. The country is fortunate to have, in Collins and in Secretary Hodges, two liberal Southerners who may help to smooth the path toward compliance. It may also be grateful to Ellender of Louisiana for being the first Senator from the South to speak up against disobedience to the civil rights law. To rally the better elements in the South swiftly, to give them support against the lawless, to show by determined enforcement that the Federal government means business is urgent and essential if serious trouble is to be avoided.

Just A Racially Impartial Fellow

"Sheriff Rainey [of Neshoba County where the three "disappeared"] killed two Negroes in the past four years, but said both killings were in self-defense. The six-foot one inch, 250-lb. Sheriff said it also had been necessary to 'knock the fire out of' persons resisting arrest several times, but that he used such force 'more often against whites than niggers'."

—Wash. Daily News from Phila., Miss., July 1.

One step would be an immediate expansion of the ludicrously small Civil Rights Division in the Department of Justice. Another is for Attorney General Robert Kennedy to admit that he was wrong in saying that the Federal government has no power to protect civil rights workers in the South. A third is pressure on the FBI to find those responsible for the kidnapping and probable murder of the Missing Three. They seem to have been the victims of a conspiracy in which local law enforcement officials played a key part. The FBI has been most reluctant to do anything in the past about the racist police officers of the South.

The students working in the South are doing the Federal government's work in making the right to vote a reality. There is no reason why a specially deputized Federal marshal cannot be assigned to each group. A letter in the New York Times July 7 from a student voter rights' worker in Fayette County, Tennessee, reports that "in the past two weeks these students have been subjected to beatings, shootings, threats and intimidation" with no protection from the local police. Charles A. Haynie writes with force and justice:

> Our nation must appear foolish if, although it sends millions of American soldiers to all corners of the globe to defend the liberties of free men, it cannot preserve the right to travel, to vote, to walk, to talk, to assemble and to think in one of our own States of this Union.

Proxmire Reveals Struggle for Control of Giant Investment Empire

How Budge Appointment May Give Murchisons Control of SEC

The day the Senate approved Hamer Budge by a voice vote as Securities and Exchange Commissioner, Senator Proxmire delivered a speech in opposition. It brought to light a struggle by financial titans for control of $4.1 billion in other people's money. This is the sum managed for five affiliated and four subsidiary firms by Investors Diversified Services, Inc., the country's largest investment trust complex, which in turn is controlled by Alleghany Corp., a $6.7 billion holding company that can siphon IDS funds into its other properties, New York Central, Missouri Pacific and Webb & Knapp.

When Murchison Bros. of Dallas controlled IDS from 1953 to 59, they used it as a market for securities offered by their own financial interests. (see box below). In 1959, after five years' litigation, a court order divested the Murchisons of controlling interest in IDS because of "improper activities" in acquiring it. Alleghany had allowed them to "buy in" after they helped it wrest New York Central from the Vanderbilts. One month after the divestiture order, the Murchisons began a proxy contest for indirect control of IDS through Alleghany. In 1961 they won the entire empire for a mere $28 million investment.

The Abuse of Proxies

Small investors enjoy little protection against investment advisors who have secret interests in the securities they promote. A limited form of protection may result from a court suit brought against IDS, Alleghany, and Murchison Bros. by Randolph Phillips. As amicus curiae, the SEC can influence the outcome. Victory would mean the refund by IDS of $10 million in underwriter and advisor fees to the shareholders of its largest affiliate, Investors Mutual, Inc. At issue in the case is whether investors are to be protected under the 1940 Investment Act against an unauthorized change in control of their investment advisor when that change results from a proxy contest in the holding company. U.S. District Judge Archie Dawson has denied a trial to determine whether brokerage house proxies were committed to the Murchisons in return for IDS business. Instead he ruled that the Investment Act does not apply to proxy contests because they are "democratic elections." Phillips will appeal.

Proxmire's speech disclosed that Budge's vote may determine the position the SEC takes in court. It first voted 4-1 for the broad (pro-investor) construction of the Act urged by Alan Conwill, Director of Corporate Regulation. It then reversed itself 3-2 in favor of the Murchisons and will soon reconsider again. Proxmire was warning Budge that he could not serve on the SEC with the same immunity he enjoyed as spokesman for private power, mining and banking interests while congressman from Idaho. (He once voted against a public power project unanimously approved by his state legislature.) But to keep an eye on Budge, Proxmire must stop the SEC from voting in secret, a practice it began in 1960.

The Murchisons soon may regulate the SEC rather than the other way round. Johnson's personal adviser, Abe Fortas, is their lawyer before the SEC. A Murchison-appointed president of IDS, Tom Moses, was being considered for the position finally given to Budge. It was decided instead that Moses should replace resigning SEC Chairman William Cary. When Moses turned out to be a Republican (Cary is a Democrat), the plan had to be dropped. Alan Conwill's resignation was also a Murchison gain. He resigned when Johnson did not carry out Kennedy's intention of appointing him as replacement for Commissioner Allen Frear. Frear resigned the day after the Bobby Baker scandal broke. Johnson could dispel suspicion by replacing Chairman Cary with a liberal. Even better, he might initiate reforms in the 1940 Investment Act to prevent practices by which Texas oil millionaires can control—and manipulate—a $4 billion pool of investment capital with a $28 million investment.

As Goldwater Is To Carry Harlem

"Regulatory bodies have great power and discretion. They are constantly subject to great pressure by the people whom they regulate. It takes a man of remarkable character and objectivity to resist that kind of pressure. . . . In the course of hearings before the Committee on Banking and Currency, I asked Mr. Budge to give his views concerning the function of the SEC and what he believed his job should be. He said, 'If a person were a crook, whether he is in the securities industry or any other industry, I would deal with him as such. This position is not a bit different from the position I now hold on the trial bench.' . . . There is all the difference in the world between being a Securities and Exchange Commissioner and being a judge or one who will carry out the law as written.

"This nominee is about as likely to help make the SEC the vigorous watchdog of the marketplace that it should be as Senator Goldwater is to carry Harlem for the Presidency next November."

—Proxmire (D. Wis.) in the Senate, June 26.

How the Murchisons Used Their Control of Alleghany's Investment Trusts

"From December 1953, when Murchison Brothers acquired their first block of Investors Diversified Services, Inc. common stock until April 1960, when control of IDS was returned by Murchison Bros. to Alleghany Corporation, no less than a total of $113,587,000 of IDS and its affiliated companies funds had been lent to or invested in banks, oil and gas and miscellaneous companies identified as having transactions with the Murchison interests.

"In 1955 a company called Grilling Oil privately obtained $5,000,000 in capital funds from IDS or a subsidiary company. The IDS Finance and Law Committee subsequently discovered that Grilling's controlling persons were Holman Jenkins, principal Dallas attorney of the Murchisons, and other associated persons. In April 1956, IDS and Mutual bought no less than $22,500,000 of 5-year notes of T. J. Bettes Co., a Dallas Mortgage broker. It was discovered that Bettes had acted as a broker in finding mortgage money for the customers of Murchison companies in the house-building business."

—From the Phillips' petition to enjoin the Murchisons from use of Investors Mutual funds after they had gained control of Alleghany Corp. and IDS in 1961.

Despite The Furore Over Bobby Baker, The Senate Is Hostile to Its Own Reform

Loopholes Clark Would Close to End Influence On Capitol Hill

This issue went to press before the release of the long awaited Senate report on the Bobby Baker case. But two votes in the Senate July 2 showed how little disposed that body is to end any suspicion of influence-peddling. It voted 66 to 25 against a Morse amendment to a Federal pay raise bill which would have required all members of Congress, all Federal employes earning over $10,000 a year, all officers of the Armed Services with the rank of Colonel or above and all members of both national political party committees to disclose all income and gifts and all dealings in commodities and securities. A "little Morse amendment" covering only members of Congress and its employes was then offered by Keating. This more limited version was also rejected 61 to 25. The leadership of both parties in the Senate opposed these amendments, and the Southerners (except for Thurmond of South Carolina) were a solid bloc against disclosure. These votes do not augur well even for the weak disclosure rule reported out by the Senate Rules Committee last week which will come to a vote later this summer. So our readers can see the issues involved we reprint the heart of the separate report made by Clark of Pennsylvania, who has played a leading part in seeking reform of the Senate rules.

By Senator Joseph S. Clark

While I have joined with the Committee in voting to report this [disclosure] Resolution to the floor, I view it as merely a small and timid first step. My proposal would broaden the committee's resolution in . . .

1. Asset disclosure. The Committee's proposal would require disclosure of the identity of business entities in which an interest is held, but not the value. My amendment would also require disclosure of the fair market value of the asset.

A Senator Should Disclose His Creditors

2. Liability disclosure. In my view, the holding of an obligation of a person in high public office is as much a lever for evil influence as the sharing of a business undertaking. Consequently, my amendment would require the disclosure of each liability in excess of $5,000, together with the name of the holder thereof, owned by a member, officer, or employee of the Senate, or by his spouse.

3. Capital gain disclosure. A familiar means of passing a reward to one to whom a gift cannot be given is the "hot issue." By means of this device, one in possession of information concerning a future dramatic rise in the value of a particular security can pass that information on to others, thus permitting them to take advantage of the surge in value. . . .

There is nothing in the Committee's recommendation which would force disclosure of transactions of this sort if the securities had been sold prior to "reporting day": January 1 of the preceding year. My amendment on the other hand requires disclosure of both the source and amount of all capital gains realized during the year in any amount exceeding $5,000, by (1) the person required to report (2) by his spouse, or by him and his spouse jointly; or (3) by any straw man. My amendment would require the disclosure of the source and amount of every item of income in excess of $100 received.

5. Disclosure of association with professional firm. The Committee resolution goes part way toward meeting the problem of the Senator or Senate aide who maintains an association with a professional firm which engages in practice before an agency of the Federal government, by requiring disclosure of the name and address of the firm. My amendment carries the rule to the logical next step by requiring disclosure also of the name, address and principal business of any client of the firm for whom any services involving representation before a government agency are performed, together with a statement of the total fees which were charged for such services.

6. Disclosure of financial condition and activity of spouse. The splendid cartoonist Lichty, in his "Grin and Bear It" depicted an address being delivered by "Mrs. The Hon. Senator Snort"—"The pressure of public service is indeed terrific and a wife must do all she can to help . . . such as letting the Senator put all his investments in my name." By failing to make any provision for this time-honored technique, the Committee left a gaping loophole which renders all but worthless the other provisions of this Resolution.

7. Prohibition of joint ventures with lobbyists. These activities would be prohibited by my amendment.

8. Accepting gifts from lobbyists. It would seem to me to be wholly salutary to set a limit on the value of a gift which a Senator or Senate aide might properly receive from a lobbyist. My amendment sets this at a most generous $100. . . .

9. Testimony of Members of the Senate. My amendment would authorize any duly authorized Committee of the Senate to request any Senator to come before it and give any pertinent testimony which it has reason to believe he can give on the subject matter under investigation.

10. Moonlighting by Senate officers and full-time employes. The facts of the Baker case are such as to cast grave doubt on the practice of permitting officers and full-time employees of the Senate to serve as managers or proprietors of business enterprises, to engage in a regular professional or consulting practice, or to maintain an association with a professional or consulting firm. My amendment would prohibit moonlighting of this sort. Even if there had been no Baker case, this rule would stand well recommended by the Biblical dictum that no man shall serve two masters.

An Appeal by SCEF to the Senate

A petition was filed in the U.S. Senate July 7 by the bi-racial Southern Conference Educational Fund asking the Senate to order the Internal Security Committee to return records illegally seized from its offices in New Orleans last year. The petition was signed among others by the Rev. Fred L. Shuttlesworth, president of the SCEF, and Aubrey W. Williams, its president emeritus. This is believed to be the first time that the Senate has been petitioned to police action taken by one of its own committees. The petition cited a deposition taken last December 30 from J. G. Sourwine, chief counsel of the subcommittee, that the records were seized on the basis of a phone call to the Chairman, Eastland, without authorization from the committee. Sourwine admitted that the records disclosed no evidence of any illegal or subversive activity. "Now that the Senate has passed the historic Civil Rights Act of 1964," the petition said, "it is imperative that organizations seeking to bring about peaceful compliance with that law should not be impeded or harassed."

Irrevocable Steps Toward German Atomic Rearmament May Be In The Making

The Best Time to Sneak A New Nuclear Arms Agreement Past Congress

While public attention is focused on Mississippi and Vietnam, irrevocable steps may be taken on the path toward German nuclear rearmament. On June 30 the President sent Congress a message on a new agreement with NATO and the NATO countries for the exchange of nuclear weapons information. The message, and the appended letters from Secretary Rusk and (jointly) from Secretary McNamara and Chairman Seaborg of the Atomic Energy Commission can only be described as opaque. If, as explained privately, this has nothing to do with the creation of a multilateral nuclear force, why isn't this said plainly and publicly?

Tricky Timing

The timing of the message is tricky. Under the 1958 revision of the Atomic Energy Act, agreements of this kind become law 60 days after their submission to Congress unless overruled in the meantime by a joint resolution. This negative veto is difficult to wield under the best circumstances. The 60 days ahead will find Congress mostly out of session, its members attending the two political conventions, the scanty sessions in between taken up with urgent domestic legislation. Even if the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy should hold hearings, little attention will be paid them during the excitement of the campaign. Its chairman, Senator Pastore (D. R.I.) is up for reelection this Fall. This is an ideal time to sneak something through.

The New York Times (July 1) reported that the Atomic Energy Commission had just announced that the gas centrifuge process has been put on the secret list again. It may some day provide a cheaper way of producing the enriched uranium necessary for speedy accumulation of a nuclear stockpile. Some short-cut of this kind would change the whole picture, and speed up the proliferation of nuclear arms. Will information on this process be made available to the Germans under the new agreement?

The Russians at Geneva on July 2 declared that if the Western powers wanted an agreement to stop proliferation of nuclear weapons, they would have to abandon the MLF. To the U.S. argument that the MLF was a device for keeping nuclear arms from the Germans, M. Zorin replied that he didn't think men as shrewd as the leaders of West Germany—which will foot 40% of the cost—would put up billions of dollars "for a fiction" (Le Monde, July 4)!

The British seem to be fighting a rear-guard action against MLF. On July 2 they presented to a NATO working group in Paris plans for mixed manning of existing aircraft and missile forces. The Defense Correspondent of the London Times (July 3) reported that despite official assurances to the contrary these are intended as alternatives to MLF. He wrote that one reason for British reservations about MLF "is that a newly constituted force is more likely to be provocative for the Soviets than a new command system for an existing force."

To permit a German finger on the nuclear trigger so soon after the second world war, and with so many of the same Germans responsible for it in charge of the West German industry and military, is criminal negligence, inviting a third and final holocaust. Those who would like to stop it may find useful information in a remarkable pamphlet put together here by a group in Women Strike for Peace (Box 4005, Washington, D.C. $1) on "The German Problem."

5,000 Appeal on Vietnam

"We, five thousand American college and university educators, urge a neutralized Vietnam. It would end the terror and suffering in this war-ravaged land. It would end the continuing loss of American and Vietnamese lives. It would be preferable to deeper involvement or irresponsible pull-out. We therefore appeal to you, Mr. President, not to enlarge the scope of the war, but instead to work for a neutralized North and South Vietnam, as separate, federated or reunified states protected by international guarantees and peacekeeping forces against all outside interference."

—Circulated by the National Committee for a Sane Nuclear Policy and presented July 10 by Hans Morgenthau, David Brooks Arnold and Robert S. Browne, the latter two recently returned from government service in Vietnam.

Special Issue on The Indochinese War

The International Law We Violated in Our Reprisal Raids on North Vietnam

I. F. Stone's Weekly

VOL. XII, NO. 28 AUGUST 24, 1964 WASHINGTON, D. C. 15 CENTS

What Few Know About the Tonkin Bay Incidents

The American government and the American press have kept the full truth about the Tonkin Bay incidents from the American public. Let us begin with the retaliatory bombing raids on North Vietnam. When I went to New York to cover the UN Security Council debate on the affair, UN correspondents at lunch recalled cynically that four months earlier Adlai Stevenson told the Security Council the U.S. had "repeatedly expressed" its emphatic disapproval "of retaliatory raids, wherever they occur and by whomever they are committed." But none mentioned this in their dispatches.

When Britain Staged Reprisals

On that occasion, last April, the complaint was brought by Yemen against Britain. The British, in retaliation for attacks from Yemen into the British protectorate of Aden, decided to strike at the "privileged sanctuary" from which the raids were coming. The debate then might have been a preview of the Vietnamese affair. The British argued that their reprisal raid was justified because the Fort they attacked at Harib was "a centre for subversive and aggressive activities across the border." The Yemeni Republicans in turn accused the British of supporting raids into Yemen by the Yemeni Royalists. "Obviously," Stevenson said, "it is most difficult to determine precisely what has been happening on the remote frontiers of Southern Arabia." But he thought all UN members could "join in expressing our disapproval of the use of force by either side as a means of solving disputes, a principle that is enshrined in the Charter," especially when such "attacks across borders" could "quickly escalate into full-scale wars." The outcome was a resolution condemning "reprisals as incompatible with the purposes and principles of the United Nations." That resolution and Stevenson's words are as applicable to Southeast Asia as to Southern Arabia. Though the Czech delegate cited them in his speech to the Council on August 7 about the Vietnamese affair, no word of this appeared in the papers next day.

In the August 7 debate, only Nationalist China and Britain supported the U.S. reprisal raids. The French privately recalled the international uproar over the raid they had made under similar circumstances in February, 1958, into the "privileged sanctuary" afforded the Algerian rebels by Tunisia. They struck at the Sakiet-Sidi-Youssef camp just across the border. Senators Kennedy, Humphrey, Morse and Knowland denounced the raid and Eisenhower warned the French the U.S. would not be able to defend their action in the Security Council.

Whose Freedom? What Freedom?

"He (Stevenson) ventured to repeat that the peoples of Laos, Vietnam and Cambodia wished to be left alone. To whom was he addressing himself? Would he not do better in telling this to his Government, to the Pentagon, to the CIA? He alleged that the U.S. is in Southeast Asia for the purpose of helping friends to preserve their opportunity to be free. What kind of friends are these? Yesterday it was the Ngo family, with their torture chambers; then it was a military junta; and now it is Khanh who, in order to save himself from impending fall, has just now proclaimed martial law and suppressed the last vestiges of freedom in the remnant of the territory he holds with U.S. support, and is trying to create new provocation of war and following the example set by the aggression on the coast of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam, by unleashing aggressive actions against his neighbors. Tomorrow it may be perhaps another puppet, equally as corrupt or possibly even more so, and perhaps more brutal."

—Czech delegate to the Security Council Aug. 7.

Reprisals in peacetime were supposed to have been outlawed by the League of Nations Covenant, the Kellogg Pact and the United Nations Charter. All of them pledged peaceful settlement of disputes. Between nations, as between men, reprisals are lynch law. Some White House ghost writer deserves a literary booby prize for the mindless jingle he turned out to defend ours in Vietnam. "The world remembers, the world must never forget," were the words he supplied for Johnson's speech at Syracuse, "that aggression unchallenged is aggression unleashed." This gem of prose is a pretty babble. What the world (and particularly the White House) needs to remember is that aggression is unleashed and escalated when one party to a dispute decides for itself who is guilty and how he is to be punished. This is what is happening in Cyprus, where we have been begging Greeks and Turks to desist from the murderous escalation of reprisal and counter-reprisal. Johnson practices in Southeast Asia what he deplores in the Mediterranean.

More Reprisal Raids Coming?

Public awareness of this is essential because the tide is running strongly toward more reprisal raids in the Far East. The first was the raid by U.S. Navy planes in June on Pathet Lao headquarters in Laos in retaliation for shooting down two reconnaissance planes. We would not hesitate to shoot down reconnaissance planes over our own territory; such overflights are a clear violation of international law. But the U.S., now seems to operate on the principle that invasion of other people's skies is our right, and efforts to interfere with it (at least by weaker powers) punishable by reprisal. This is pure "might is right" doctrine.

The very day we took the Vietnamese affair to the Security Council, Cambodia illustrated a sardonic point to be found in Schwarzenberger's Manual of International Law—"military reprisals are open only to the strong against the weak." The UN distributed to Security Council members the latest in a series of complaints from Cambodia that U.S. and South Vietnamese forces had been violating its borders. It alleged that at dawn on July 31 "elements of the armed forces of the Republic of Vietnam, among them Americans in uniform," opened fire "with automatic weapons and mortars," seriously wounding a peasant and killing a bull. If Cambodia could only afford a fleet large enough, we suppose it would be justified by Johnsonian standards in lobbing a few shells into the U.S.A.

The Law We Applied at Nuremberg

Even in wartime, reprisals are supposed to be kept within narrow limits. Hackworth's Digest, the State Department's huge Talmud of international law, quotes an old War Department manual, Rules of Land Warfare, as authoritative on the subject. This says reprisals are never to be taken "merely for revenge" but "only as an unavoidable last resort" to "enforce the recognized rules of civilized warfare." Even then reprisals "should not be excessive or exceed the degree of violence committed by the enemy." These were the principles we applied at the Nuremberg trials. Our reprisal raids on North Vietnam hardly conformed to these standards. By our own account, in self-defense, we had already sunk three or four attacking torpedo boats in two incidents. In neither were our ships damaged nor any of our men hurt; indeed, one bullet imbedded in one destroyer hull is the only proof we have been able to muster that the second of the attacks even took place. To fly 64 bombing sorties in reprisal over four North Vietnamese bases and an oil depot, destroying or damaging 25 North Vietnamese PT boats, a major part of that tiny navy, was hardly punishment to fit the crime. What was our hurry? Why did we have to shoot from the hip and then go to the Security Council? Who was Johnson trying to impress? Ho Chi-minh? Or Barry Goldwater?

This is how it looks on the basis of our own public accounts. It looks worse if one probes behind them. Here we come to the questions raised by Morse of Oregon on the Senate floor Aug. 5 and 6 during debate on the resolution giving Johnson a pre-dated declaration of war in Southeast Asia. Morse was speaking on the basis of information given in executive session by Secretaries Rusk and McNamara to a joint session of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations and Armed Services. Morse said he was not justifying the attacks on U.S. ships in the Bay of Tonkin but "as in domestic criminal law," he added, "crimes are sometimes committed under provocation" and this "is taken into account by a wise judge in imposing sentence."

Morse revealed that U.S. warships were on patrol in Tonkin Bay nearby during the shelling of two islands off the North Vietnamese coast on Friday, July 31, by South Vietnamese vessels. Morse said our warships were within 3 to 11 miles of North Vietnamese territory, at the time, although North Vietnam claims a 12-mile limit. Morse declared that the U.S. "knew that the bombing was going to take place." He noted that General Khanh had been demanding escalation of the war to the North and said that with this shelling of the islands it was escalated. Morse declared the attack was made "by South Vietnamese naval vessels—not by junks but by armed vessels of the PT boat type" given to South Vietnam as part of U.S. military aid. Morse said it was not just another attempt to infiltrate agents but "a well thought-out military operation." Morse charged that the presence of our warships in the proximity "where they could have given protection, if it became necessary" was "bound to be looked upon by our enemies as an act of provocation." The press, which dropped an Iron Curtain weeks ago on the anti-war speeches of Morse and Gruening, ignored this one, too.

Neither Party for Peace

"The last episode—the attack by North Vietnam vessels on U.S. naval vessels—I consider an inevitable development of the U.S. steady escalation of our own military activities. . . . I regret, and consider it a pity, that both our political parties appear now to be committed to a policy of war. Yet American public opinion, judged by my mail, is overwhelmingly committed to a different policy—a policy of peace. My mail pours in with virtual unanimity on this subject. It comes from a truly representative cross section of the American people. It includes bishops, deans of colleges, university professors, business executives, teachers, retired Army officers."

—Sen. Gruening (D. Alaska), in the Senate, Aug. 6 who with Morse cast the only two votes in Congress against the war resolution.

Yet a reading of the debate will show that Fulbright and Russell, the chairmen of the two committees Rusk and McNamara had briefed in secret session, did not deny Morse's facts in their defense of the Administration and did not meet the issue he raised. Fulbright's replies to questions were hardly a model of frankness. When Ellender of Louisiana asked him at whose request we were patrolling in the Bay of Tonkin, Fulbright replied:

> These are international waters. Our assistance to South Vietnam is at the request of the South Vietnamese government. The particular measures we may take in connection with that request is our own responsibility.

Senator Nelson of Wisconsin wanted to know how close to the shore our ships had been patrolling:

> Mr. Fulbright: It was testified that they went in at least 11 miles in order to show that we do not recognize a 12-mile limit, which I believe North Vietnam has asserted.
>
> Mr. Nelson: The patrolling was for the purpose of demonstrating to the North Vietnamese that we did not recognize a 12-mile limit?
> Mr. Fulbright: That was one reason given. . . .
> Mr. Nelson: It would be mighty risky if Cuban PT boats were firing on Florida, for Russian armed ships or destroyers to be patrolling between us and Cuba, 11 miles out.

When Ellender asked whether our warships were there to protect the South Vietnamese vessels shelling the islands, Fulbright replied:

> The ships were not assigned to protect anyone. They were conducting patrol duty. The question was asked specifically of the highest authority, the Secretary of Defense and the Secretary of State. They stated without equivocation that these ships, the Maddox and the C. Turner Joy, were not on convoy duty. They had no connection whatever with any Vietnamese ships that might have been operating in the same general area.

Fulbright did not deny that both destroyers were in the area at the time of the July 31 shelling and inside the territorial limits claimed by North Vietnam. He did not deny Morse's charge that the U.S. knew about the shelling of the islands before it took place. He merely denied that the warships were there to cover the operation in any way. Our warships, according to the official account, just happened to be hanging around. Morse's point—which neither Fulbright nor Russell challenged—was that they had no business to be in an area where an attack was about to take place, that this was bound to appear provocative. Indeed the only rational explanation for their presence at the time was that the Navy was looking for trouble, daring the North Vietnamese to do something about it.

Why Our Ships Moved Out to Sea

Morse made another disclosure. "I think I violate no privilege or secrecy," he declared, "if I say that subsequent to the bombing, and apparently because there was some concern about the intelligence that we were getting, our ships took out to sea." Was this intelligence that the ships were about to be attacked within the territorial waters claimed by North Vietnam? Morse said our warships went out to sea and "finally, on Sunday, the PT boats were close enough for the first engagement to take place." This dovetails with a curious answer given by Senator Russell at another point in the debate to Senator Scott of Pennsylvania when the latter asked whether Communist China had not published a series of warnings (as required by international law) against violations of the 12-mile limit. Russell confirmed this but said, "I might add that our vessels had turned away from the North Vietnamese shore and were making for the middle of the gulf, where there could be no question, at the time they were attacked."

The italics are ours and call attention to an evident uneasiness about our legal position. The uneasiness is justified. A great many questions of international law are raised by the presence of our warships within an area claimed by another country as its territorial waters while its shores were being shelled by ships we supplied to a satellite power. There is, first of all, some doubt as to whether warships have a right of "innocent passage" through territorial waters even under peaceful circumstances. There is, secondly, the whole question of territorial limits. The 3-mile limit was set some centuries ago by the range of a cannon shot. It has long been obsolete but is favored by nations with large navies. We make the 3-mile limit the norm when it suits our purposes but widen it when we need to. We claim another 9 miles as "contiguous waters" in which we can enforce our laws on foreign ships. While our planes on reconnaissance operate three miles off other people's shores, we enforce an Air Defense Identification Zone on our own coasts, requiring all planes to identify themselves when two hours out. In any case, defense actions may be taken beyond territorial limits. The law as cited in the U.S. Naval Academy's handbook, International Law for Sea-Going Officers is that "the right of a nation to protect itself from injury" is "not restrained to territorial limits . . . It may watch its coast and seize ships that are approaching it with an intention to violate its laws. It is not obliged to wait until the offense is consummated before it can act."

Prize Explanation

Mr. Robert PIERPONT (CBS News): Do you have any thoughts yourself on why the North Vietnamese Navy would have decided to take on the U.S. Navy?

Senator Eugene McCARTHY (D. Minn.): I don't know. It may be that they were bored."

—On CBS Face The Nation, Aug. 9.

If the Cubans Shelled Key West

More important in this case is the doctrine of "hot pursuit." The North Vietnamese radio claims that in the first attack it chased the U.S. warships away from its shores. "The right of hot pursuit," says Schwarzenberger's Manual of International Law, "is the right to continue the pursuit of a ship from the territorial sea into the high sea." The logic of this, our Naval Academy handbook explains, is that "the offender should not go free simply because of the proximity of the high seas." It is easy to imagine how fully these questions would be aired if we spotted Russian ships hanging around in our waters while Cuban PT boats shelled Key West. Our actions hardly fit Johnson's description of himself to the American Bar Association as a champion of world law.

There are reasons to believe that the raids at the end of July marked a new stepup in the scale of South Vietnamese operations against the North. These have been going on for

U.S. Secret Operations Against North Vietnam Began 3 Years Before Rebellion in South

"However sensational the latest events in the Gulf of Tonkin and whatever their exact circumstances, they should not make one forget that the American 'Special Services' for several years have encouraged and supported guerrilla operations against North Vietnamese territory.

"Thus as early as 1957 there was created at Saigon a 'service of liaison in the presidency', headed by several American specialists and charged with the organization, training and command of parachutist commandoes specializing in intelligence and counter-espionage. Within this service 'Section 45,' assisted by four American advisers, was trained for operations in the North. . . . These recruits finished one stage of training in a camp at Nha-Trang. Then the best were sent on to Formosa or Guam for more advanced training. It was only then that these agents, grouped in commandoes, tried their luck in Tonkin. . . .

"Until 1960, however, the pace of these operations was very slow. The United States had not yet intervened directly in the second Indochinese war and the southern commandoes lacked zeal. Things changed from 1961 on when Washington decided to step up its efforts in Vietnam. The objectives also were to be changed. The purpose henceforth would be to disorganize the economic and military potential of the North in order to prevent its aid to the rebels in the South, an aid one feared without yet having formal proof of it. The overturning of the Communist regime was consigned to second place. The famous Staley-Taylor plan, which forecast the pacification of the south in 18 months, assigned an important role to commando operations against the North. At the same time, the government of Hanoi, from 1961 on, more and more often announced the capture of 'American-Diemist saboteurs, caught in the act.' . . . Most of the agents intercepted had been recruited among Catholic refugees from Tonkin or former soldiers in the French army."

—Georges Chaffard in Le Monde, Aug. 7.

Was the Reprisal Raid A Long Planned Strategic Bombardment?

some time. In fact, a detailed account in Le Monde (Aug. 7) says they began (See Box p. 3) three years before the rebellion broke out in South Vietnam. Ever since January of this year the U.S. press has been full of reports that we were planning to move from infiltration and commando operations to overt attacks against the North. Newsweek (March 9) discussed a "Rostow Plan No. 6" for a naval blockade of Haiphong, North Vietnam's main port, to be followed by PT boat raids on North Vietnamese coastal installations and then by strategic bombing raids. In the middle of July the North Vietnamese radio reported that the U.S. had given South Vietnam 500 "river landing ships" and four small warships from our mine sweeping fleet. A dispatch from Hong Kong in the New York Times (Aug. 14) quoted an "informed source" as saying that the North Vietnamese had concealed the fact "that the shelling of the islands" on July 31 "had been directed at a sensitive radar installation." The shelling of radar installations would look from the other side like a prelude to a landing attempt.

How The Public Is Brain-Washed

These circumstances cast a very different light on the Maddox affair, but very few Americans are aware of them. The process of brain-washing the public starts with off-the-record briefings for newspapermen in which all sorts of far-fetched theories are suggested to explain why the tiny North Vietnamese navy would be mad enough to venture an attack on the Seventh fleet, one of the world's most powerful. Everything is discussed except the possibility that the attack might have been provoked. In this case the "information agencies," i.e. the propaganda apparatus of the government handed out two versions, one for domestic, the other for foreign consumption. The image created at home was that the U.S. had manfully hit back at an unprovoked attack—no paper tiger we. On the other hand, friendly foreign diplomats were told that the South Vietnamese had pulled a raid on the coast and we had been forced to back them up. As some of the truth began to trickle out, the information agencies fell back on the theory that maybe the North Vietnamese had "miscalculated." That our warships may have been providing cover for an escalation in raiding activities never got through to public consciousness at all.

The Day After The Battle Was Over

"I find the speech of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. McGovern] very interesting but very belated. For approximately 6 months the Senator from Alaska [Mr. Gruening] and the Senator from Oregon have been urging support for the very suggestions which the Senator from South Dakota made this morning. If Senators who have held the views of the Senator from South Dakota—and many of them have held them privately for these many months—had joined the Senator from Alaska and the Senator from Oregon 5 or 6 months ago in urging a diplomatic settlement of the Asiatic strife under the rules of international law, we might have been able to change the warmaking course of our government in Asia. But one of the saddest things is that during all those months the talk of many Senators in the cloakroom has been noticeably different from their silence on the floor of the Senate."

—Morse Aug. 8, day after the war resolution passed.

The two attacks themselves are still shrouded in mystery. The Maddox claims to have fired three warning shots across the bow of her pursuers; three warning shots are used to make a merchantman heave-to for inspection. A warship would take this as the opening of fire, not as a warning signal. The North Vietnamese radio admitted the first encounter but claimed its patrol boats chased the Maddox out of territorial waters. The second alleged attack North Vietnam calls a fabrication. It is strange that though we claim three boats sunk, we picked up no flotsam and jetsam as proof from the wreckage. Nor have any pictures been provided. Whatever the true story, the second incident seems to have triggered off a long planned attack of our own. There are some reasons to doubt that it was merely that "measured response" against PT bases it was advertised to be. Bernard Fall, author of "The Two Vietnams," who knows the area well, pointed out in the Washington Post Aug. 9 that "none of the targets attacked" in the reprisal raids "was previously known as a regular port or base area. Hon-Gay, for example, was one of the largest open-pit coal mining operations in Asia, if not the world." Was this one of the strategic industrial targets in Rostow's "Plan No. 6?"

State Dept. Admits Risk of Spreading Nuclear Arms, P. 2

The GOP Turned Into A Peace Party on Korea—It Might Again on Vietnam

Johnson and Humphrey, at a loss for a way out of the Vietnamese mess, ought to go back and take a hard look at what the Republicans did about Korea in the 1952 campaign. Then, as now, they began by talking tough. In the platform they adopted in July, 1952, they accused the Democrats of having "produced stalemate and ignominious bartering. . . . They offer no hope of victory." Then in the final hours of the campaign, the GOP did an about-face. On Oct. 24 Eisenhower cinched the election with his pledge to go to Korea and end the war. After accusing the Democrats of appeasement, the Republicans made peace.

Something similar may be brewing. On his yacht Aug. 27 Goldwater suddenly suggested peace talks with Red China. "Any President should always be interested in negotiations," he said. "That's the way to end wars. I've thought for some time that a talk like that with the Red Chinese might be profitable." Maybe this was just another eccentric remark from an eccentric candidate. But it resembled the equally sensational proposal by Clare Boothe Luce, one of Goldwater's principal advisers, in her speech June 14 at St. John's University. "While the key to peace in Europe still lies in Moscow," Mrs. Luce said, "today the key to peace in Asia lies in Peking. Let us be no less ready, and no more afraid, than our allies to discuss ways of relaxing tension with Mao Tse-tung." From so ferociously right wing a lady, this was indeed a surprise.

It's time for a new tack. That "show of strength" in Tonkin Bay was followed by the collapse of our pet Khanh regime, demonstrating again that bombings in the North cannot solve the hard political problems in the South. Behind the anti-Catholic riots was resentment against a fanatical minority which wants continuation of the war. Soon we must assume power openly in Saigon, taking up the hopeless task of pursuing gnats with sledge-hammers which the French gave up ten years ago, or negotiate peace. Viable and face-saving terms are possible: an independent South Vietnam linked in a neutral belt with Cambodia and Laos is the National Liberation Front program. North Vietnam would be glad to underwrite it in return for resumption of trade with the South. If Johnson plunges instead into a new Korea, the Republicans will make the most of it.

Why We Support Johnson and Humphrey

Like Atlantic City's Steel Pier, with fun for young or old, the Democratic convention under the new LBJ brand had something for almost everybody, except the Daughters of the Confederacy, and it would not surprise me if the indefatigable Ladybird paid them a visit soon as a consolation prize. Everybody complained but everybody secretly had a good time, including the youngsters who sat on the boardwalk for hours in support of the Mississippi Freedom Party delegation. Sympathetic bystanders brought them box lunches; a white woman from Virginia distributed salt water taffies among them with assurances of sympathy; and one lady from Mississippi, who seemed totally unaware of the civil rights struggle, came around to inquire if any were delegates from her part of the State, with whom she could have a cozy gossip about folks back home.

Mississippi's Isolation and Defeat

Humanity obtruded itself into this otherwise mechanical and controlled proceeding only on the Saturday afternoon before the convention opened when the Freedom Democratic Party's delegation pleaded its case before the credentials committee. There, under the able and devoted generalship of Joseph L. Rauh, the brave handful from Mississippi had a chance to give the convention and the television audience a glimpse into the realities of white supremacy in Mississippi. Even then the President soon shut them off from view when he preempted the networks in the middle of their presentation to make his talk to the Governors in Washington. To the managers of the convention the Freedom Party delegates were an unwelcome guest, though among the rank-and-file they commanded the widest sympathy. A floor fight would have expressed their moral revulsion against the murderous folkways of the deep South but it would also have torn the party apart. The efficacious mechanics of the Johnson-Humphrey team were demonstrated even before the Vice Presidential choice was announced. While Johnson sold the compromise package to the Southern delegates, Humphrey, with aid from Walter Reuther, kept the Freedom Democratic Party delegates from expressing their dissatisfaction too wildly.

Planning Is Not A Dirty Word In Japan

"Paris, Aug. 30—The Western industrial powers declared today [in a report by the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development] that the growth and performance of Japan's economy since World War II has been 'remarkable' . . . Japan has grown faster in the postwar years than any other non-Communist country, and approximately as fast as the Soviet Union in its best years. In its postwar recovery period, through 1953, Japan's total output grew by almost 11 percent a year. Since then it has averaged close to 9½ percent. . . . The principal lesson that the report drew from other countries was government planning. It said that the readiness of business to invest and expand itelf 'is thought in Japan to have been stimulated by the process of central economic planning,' because planning has strengthened business men's confidence in continued economic growth."

—New York Times financial page Aug. 31.

From the standpoint of conventional politics, the compromise was an extraordinary victory for what began as little more than a publicity gimmick. From the standpoint of the cost the Freedom Party delegates may pay on their return,

Five Congressmen Try to Stop New Atomic Exchange of Information Pact

State Department Admits It Risks The Spread of Nuclear Weapons

A new agreement for transferring nuclear information to NATO has provoked a minor rebellion in Congress. Just before recess for the Democratic convention, five congressmen (Kastenmeier, Rosenthal, Burton, Ryan of New York and Brown of California) submitted resolutions disapproving the agreement. It has yet to be shown, they argue, that the agreement "is essential to the military mission of NATO," "would not aid and abet the development" of national nuclear forces, and "would not contribute to the negotiation and execution" of an MLF.

The Joint Committee on Atomic Energy discouraged inquiry into these matters at its public hearing. Witnesses against the agreement (Women Strike for Peace, WILPF, and Rep. Rosenthal) were made to play the part of humble petitioners come before royalty. Rosenthal even received a gently chiding lecture on the select quality of the Joint Committee when he complained that Congress was being asked to approve an agreement whose contents it was not permitted to know.

Who's Pounding On Our Nuclear Door?

They can hardly be blamed for failing to ask some important questions. Rep. Holifield denied that "Germany was pounding on our door for more weapons." Rep. Hosmer claimed that past agreements "have stood in the way of extraordinary efforts on the part of some nations to obtain nuclear weapons." No one explored the possible contradiction. Senator Aiken said he "understood this agreement would permit us to give blueprints to NATO nations." Did his understanding come from the secret hearings? Were the blueprints for missiles? No one asked.

The Committee was more cooperative with Administration witnesses. Evasive answers went unchallenged. When Holifield asked Robert Shaetzel, Asst. Secretary of State for the Atlantic Community, whether the agreement would "be used as a means of transferring information to an MLF when and if it is established." Shaetzel answered, "No, there is nothing in this agreement designed to facilitate the negotiations now going on in Paris in connection with the MLF." One hopes the Committee listened more closely in its executive session.

An Ignored Soviet Offer

Too little attention has been paid revelations made by Matthew Meselson, a Harvard professor of Biology and a close student of disarmament, in his August 17 letter to The New York Times. Newspaper stories out of Geneva have left the impression that the Soviet Union will not agree to a treaty against dissemination of nuclear weapons until the United States abandons its plans to create a nuclear mixed-manned fleet (MLF). Meselson's study of the official verbatim record of the July 2nd conference reveals a different impression. The Soviet delegate, V. A. Zorin, told the conference, "If the Western Powers are really anxious for a positive solution to the problem of non-dissemination, we are prepared to negotiate . . . without putting forth any preliminary conditions." This would be good news were it not for the fact that some Administration officials have implied a willingness to relinquish our veto power over the firing of MLF missiles. This obviously would mean dissemination and therefore would be unacceptable to the Russians. "Would we guarantee to retain our veto," asks Meselson, "in order to obtain a nuclear non-dissemination agreement?"

The agreement, even if unrelated to MLF, is based on the same dangerous assumption that NATO can be held together with nuclear bait. Shaetzel, in an unusual lapse into candor, admitted this when asked the purpose of the agreement:

> I think the foremost point I would like to stress is the continued commitment of the Administration to NATO and to having a more cohesive and effective alliance. We certainly have been persuaded as the years go by of the need to balance out the role of sharing on the part of members of the alliance, and the staff of NATO itself, with nuclear information, with retaining security of information and therefore not creating a situation which would see a further proliferation of national nuclear forces.

This short-sighted policy of risking nuclear proliferation for the sake of political unity is far too important to remain under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Joint Committee. Congress should seek a public debate and, in particular, should ask the Secretaries of State and Defense for a full report on just how close Germany and other NATO nations are to having independent nuclear capability. A Resolution of Inquiry, passed by either house, would compel them to answer.

"As Dangerous As Quenching Thirst With Salt Water"

"I appear here this morning in support of my resolution and three other similar resolutions expressing congressional disapproval of the proposed [NATO] agreement [on atomic information]. The pressures for the dissemination of nuclear information are still competitive pressures, not cooperative ones, and buying cohesion among nations with the currency of nuclear information is still as dangerous as quenching thirst with salt water because the short-run formula for survival may become in fact the ultimate cause of death.

"One fundamental question about this agreement is why is it needed, unless it is to usher in a major change in our NATO nuclear policy. Under this proposed agreement, for the first time we shall provide NATO with information for the development of delivery systems compatible with the atomic weapons which they carry. It would appear from the testimony of the other witness this morning [Asst. Secretary of State Shaetzel] that the United States is already providing this information under bilateral agreements and therefore that we should not object to the new agreement because on the face of it it is superfluous.

"However, it seems to me that under the proposed agreement, we are opening a backdoor approach to establishing MLF. We may find ourselves having established MLF without ever really intending to do so.

"If there is no legitimate reason for the agreement, if it is superfluous, if we have the bilaterals with the nine countries and we can give them all we want to give them under those agreements, why enact the agreement? If the administration's answer to that is that there are valid reasons for the agreement, let them show the necessity and that there are no undisclosed reasons for the agreement."

—Rep. Benjamin Rosenthal (D. N.Y.), before the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, Aug. 18 (abridged).

Morse Splits With Humphrey In Fight Over Foreign Aid

Liberals Join Southerners In Attacking Arms for Military Dictators

For three days a handful of Senators tried to eliminate the boondoggle that sits just beneath the surface of foreign aid. It was like attacking an iceberg with a rowboat. "The Senator from Minnesota [Humphrey] talks about the malaria program, the health program, and the farmers' cooperative. I'm all for it," said Senator Morse, "but these are only minor features of foreign aid. The Senator has not addressed himself to the bulk of the program."

The bulk, over $1 billion, is mostly military aid. Rep. Otto Passman recently called it "a dumping ground for excess military equipment" and suggested it was a way "to keep a certain industry alive in America." Morse sought to reduce it indirectly. His amendment would have given priority in economic aid to "those countries whose military budgets do not exceed their legitimate and reasonable needs." Among the few (17) Senators voting for it was Richard Russell, chairman of the Armed Services Committee. Only one other reform amendment received fewer votes. This would have outlawed aid to governments seizing power via military coups. Six Latin American Foreign Ministers told Morse that no single action could be more helpful to the Alliance for Progress. It was defeated 59-12.

A Guarantee for Gunrunning

The reformers, this time led by Ellender (D. La.), did succeeding in eliminating a new military aid provision that had the U.S. government underwriting credit sales of military equipment. "Why," asked Ellender, "should Fairchild, Douglas, General Motors or other large suppliers to our arsenal be allowed to encourage the sales of hardware to foreign nations with a full guarantee of the U.S. government" Senator Aiken (R. Vt.) was even more blunt. "If we guarantee gunrunning, we will likely find some people encouraging conflicts between countries."

A surprise amendment by Senator Proxmire has also put the oil lobby to work. It eliminates a $20-to-$35 million a year handout that AID and its predecessors have been giving for the past decade to seven major international oil companies. "AID virtually insists upon purchases of oil at posted prices," Proxmire told the Senate. A posted price is the artifically high price that integrated oil companies pay their affiliates in producing countries so that profits can be retained there where taxes are low. Proxmire's amendment requires AID to purchase oil at competitive prices, usually 20-40% below posted prices. Unexpected approval from Senator Fulbright, a sometime friend of the oil lobby, permitted the amendment to pass by a voice vote.

A Pyrrhic Victory?

House passage of the anti-reapportionment Tuck bill may have been a pyrrhic victory for rural conservatives. In order to report the bill to the floor for a vote, the Rules Committee had to rely on an obscure precedent which permits it to consider a bill even though it has not been reported out or even considered by one of the legislative committees, in this case, Judiciary. By his point of order challenging this action, Rep. O'Hara (D. Mich.) forced Speaker McCormack to establish the precedent anew. Now it can be used to pry liberal legislation like medicare from the clutches of conservative committee chairmen. The one stumbling block is the conservative Rules Committee. Originally the Committee worked in harmony with the House leadership because both were elected by party caucus. Now that committee's posts are filled by seniority. When the 89th Congress convenes, the liberals will seek a return to elections.

Few taxpayers realize that a large part of economic aid, called program loans, finances an artificial export market for American business. The exact nature of these loans is often undisclosed even to Senators. "If the Senator could get the details," Aiken explained to Morse, he would find this money goes "to pay off American creditors of foreign governments." Last year about two-thirds of development loan fund money, intended for specific projects like dams and roads, went instead for general program loans. Even the veteran Senator Douglas said he was "shaken" by this "unrefuted" information. Morse's amendment to curtail these loans was narrowly beaten 42-40. "The Senator from Alaska must not despair," he told Gruening. "We are making a little progress."

Congress Establishes Automation Commission That Could Be Planning Board

The President recently signed into law a National Commission on Technology, Automation and Economic Progress. The legislation is careful not to say so explicitly, but it in fact creates a national economic planning board, the first civilian one of its kind in our history. The Commission has authority to assess (although none to enforce) "the most effective means for channeling new technologies into promising directions, including civilian industries . . . and [to] assess the proper relationship between governmental and private investment in the application of new technologies to large-scale human and community needs." One indication of the President's commitment to the war on poverty will be the man he appoints to head the Commission. Another will be his efforts to extend its life. Its final report is scheduled for January, 1966.

Other legislation lost in the flood of convention news is the Freedom of Information Bill which has passed the Senate but faces pigeonholing in the House Judiciary Committee. The present disclosure statute for administrative agencies contains loopholes so broad that, according to the Senate Judiciary's report, "it is cited as authority for withholding virtually any piece of information that an official or an agency does not wish disclosed." The new bill, sponsored by Senator Long (D. Mo.), would replace the vague withholding standard of "public interest" with the more specific one of "national security." It would also require regulatory agencies to disclose the votes of individual commissioners. Voting in secret, as is regularly done by the SEC, invites obvious abuse.

The new Housing Bill is less admirable. It contains no provision that would prohibit the building of luxury housing on slum-cleared land. Rep. Farbstein's attempt to include one was defeated by a voice vote after the influential Albert Rains, chief architect of the federal housing program, said it was "totally incompatible to build extremely low-cost housing on extremely high-cost land." Incompatible with what? The profits of the nation's landlords and slumlords or an end to Harlem and "The Jungle."

LBJ's Choice of Humphrey Indicates His Ultimate Direction

and the hypocrisy about a "legality" that is only legalized fraud and race oppression, the compromise looked too much like another offer of tokenism, and of separate but unequal representation. There was talk of mass civil disobedience, and of several hundred going to jail. This might have sparked the kind of outburst in Atlantic City that happened a few days later in Philadelphia, with irremediable harm to the Negro and the nation. As it was, the affair ended with Mississippi isolated from the rest of the South, Alabama split, and Bull Connor led off from the floor in humiliation. Georgia with four Negroes in its delegation became the symbol of a new moderate South, and leverage has been provided for open Democratic parties in 1968.

The Savage Within Us

There are three main objectives to be sought in this election and it's not going to be easy to keep our minds firmly on them amid the pulling and hauling on specific issues. One is to defeat Goldwaterism so overwhelmingly as to demonstrate for a long time to come that the American people, of all classes and origins, are opposed to the irruption of Fascistic elements into our political system. The second is to make progress on the racial front with a minimum of trouble. Everywhere we look in the world we see how murderously men hate each other across the divisions of color, race, religion or tribe; the bloody riots in Vietnam are only the latest evidence of the savage within us.

Our country is doing more about racism than any other country in the world. To the extent that the South can be cajoled, coaxed, and persuaded peacefully, we are all the gainers. This is what Johnson is doing, and it is important that this Southerner emerge from the election not rejected by his own section but with considerable Southern support. This means to unite, rather than divide, the country. In this respect Johnson is not just a superb political tactician but serving the highest national and human purposes. If the platform is tepid on civil rights, if it gives some semantic comfort to the South, that's worth the acquiescence it purchases.

The CIA Just Can't Resist A Bargain

That CIA Board of National Estimates paper by Willard Matthias, which leaked to the Chicago Tribune, and made headlines about a possible neutral solution in Vietnam is open for inspection by newsmen at the State Department. One remarkably sensible passage has not been reported in the press. "Despite any disinclination to get involved in crises or any interest in a detente which may exist," Matthias wrote, "the situation in most of the underdeveloped world is so disorderly that many situations are likely to develop from which the great powers will have difficulty remaining aloof or which they will have difficulty controlling if they get involved. Individuals or groups calling themselves Castroites or Communists might stage revolutionary attempts or initiate guerrilla movements not on the orders of Moscow, Peiping or Havana but in the hope of gaining their support. Similarly individuals or groups may organize or execute plots simply to gain U.S. support. Once outside powers do become involved, whether by accident or design, crises can develop which will engage their prestige to a degree incommensurate with the intrinsic or strategic value of the area itself." The paper concludes, "One consequence of this disorder and of inhibitions upon open involvement is likely to be an increase in clandestine activities designed to influence the course of events." Then it recommends such activities because of their low cost among other things!

In any case the Negro has the new Civil Rights Act and a vice-presidential candidate who has been his firmest champion in the Senate.

No man deserved the nomination more; none has worked harder for liberal causes; Humphrey's choice by Johnson for the succession creates confidence in LBJ's ultimate direction, especially in the third great objective. That is slowly to bring this country back to a sense of reality, to face up to its limited power and to adjust in Vietnam and Cuba to change. Peace is the third great objective. I believe Johnson will move toward it, and that when he picked the chief architect of the nuclear test ban treaty as his running mate, he gave evidence of where he really stands on this issue, too.

Togliatti's Posthumous Blow for Freedom, P. 4

The Next Crisis Just Around the Bend in U. S. Relations With Chile

"In addition to providing previously ignored social outcasts with opportunities for genuine participation in the national life, Chile faces difficult tasks of capital formation if genuine economic advances are to be made. Given the past failures of private capitalism to respond to the challenge of capital formation, Chilean reform advocates of every political affiliation insist that it will be necessary, at least at the outset to rely on certain socialistic and even Marxian methods. Should a reform administration come to power in Chile the U. S., would be faced with certain psychological difficulties, for the majority of its citizens subscribe to the notion that in the name of the revered Monroe Doctrine all 'un-American' practices must be excluded from the entire hemisphere . . . in Chile there may be no other means by which new social elements can acquire purchasing power and education, gain bargaining power in the sociopolitical complex, and help ultimately thereby to usher in a system of effective democracy."

What Chile Needs Is An Opening to the Left

While the center of gravity in U.S. politics is moving toward the right, the center of gravity elsewhere in the hemisphere is moving left. Here a broad national front has been formed behind a Texas conservative to defeat the danger of Fascistic influence in the White House. In Chile a broad national front was formed behind a Catholic Leftist to defeat a Popular Front candidate with Communist Party support. This divergence in development forecasts trouble unless the time the U.S. gained by the Chilean victory is put to good use. The first essential is to understand better what happened in Chile and what might have happened in the U.S. The election of a Communist-supported Socialist in Chile, pledged to nationalize U.S. copper and nitrate properties, would have pushed U.S. politics further rightward. The prospect of another Castro in the hemisphere, this time in one of South America's Big Three, would have let loose a burst of hysteria worse than that we have seen over Cuba. It would have given the Goldwaterites a boost in this election, impelled Johnson to new demonstrations of toughness this time in Latin America, set back the fragile beginnings of peaceful understanding with Moscow and the hope after the election of negotiating an end to the Indochinese war with Peking. When a power as big as the U.S. has fits, the whole world shakes, and fits we would have had if the Left had won in Chile.

Another Goldwaterite for Talks With China

"Sen. Goldwater in a spirit of desperation understandable in the light of the speed with which his enemies pounce on any realistic suggestion, has now said that maybe the time has come to negotiate with the Red Chinese Government. There is a sense in which, considering the politically available realities, he is absolutely and unchallengeably correct . . . the American people are not prepared to make the sacrifices that are apparently necessary to keep South Vietnam free. . . . So that President Johnson, like Barry Goldwater, has only the alternatives: We will surrender, or we will negotiate. . . . If you cannot beat the enemy, either because you lack the strength to do so, or the will, the thing to do is to negotiate. . . . Rather negotiate now with the Red Chinese, than a few months from now when Saigon falls into the hands of the neutralists."

—Wm. F. Buckley, Jr., editor of the rightist National Review in his newspaper column, Sept. 6-7.

No Victory for Free Enterprise

If we are to use the reprieve wisely, it is important to realize that Frei Montalva's victory in Chile was not a victory for democracy or free enterprise as they are defined in the simple-minded U.S. lexicon. Chile is barely beginning to be a democracy in our sense of the word; it is a nation in which a landed aristocracy has played the game of parliamentary musical chairs much as it was played in England before the Nineteenth Century Reform Bills gave lower class Englishmen the right to vote. It is only in recent decades that pressure from below has forced Chile's oligarchy to utilize one makeshift after another to protect its privileges. The latest was to support a Catholic Leftist as a lesser evil. This oligarchy is anti-democratic and anti-capitalistic. The paradox in Chile, as elsewhere in Latin America, is that U.S. capitalist interests allied themselves with the big landowners in policies designed to prevent industrial and capitalist development. U.S. copper and nitrate companies have been interested in getting raw materials out of Chile as cheaply as possible, not in developing native industry. For landowners and copper magnates alike this would mean higher labor costs. The biggest push toward industrialism and capitalism in Chile came from its first Popular Front government, which was elected in 1938 and launched the Chilean Development Corporation, the first of its kind in Latin America. It initiated a wide variety of public, semi-public and private enterprises, giving Chile its first steel plant, its first oil industry and its first public power company. The most important measure required for peaceful relations with Latin America and peaceful reform there is to educate the U.S. to the need for such governmental planning and direction if development is to get off the ground in time to match the population explosion and popular aspiration.

Frei For Peace With Cuba and Trade With the Communist Bloc

U.S. public opinion will also have to accept the fact that this new regime will not "stand firmly with the West" if that means isolating Cuba and embargoing trade with the Communist countries. Even Frei's conservative predecessor had begun making copper deals with Moscow, Prague and Peking. Frei deplored the break with Cuba and in a press conference after his election expressed the hope that Cuba could be brought back within the hemispheric fold on the basis of the principles of self-determination after the U.S. elections. U.S. public opinion must also be prepared for domestic measures in Chile more drastic than those proposed by Bosch in the Dominican Republic, Villeda Morales in Honduras and Goulart in Brazil before U.S. interests encouraged their overthrow by the military.

Reforms Urgently Needed

The first necessity of the new Chilean regime is to stop Latin America's second worst inflation (after Bolivia), a bonanza for landowners and primary producers but a savage capital levy on its working class. This means effective taxes on large incomes and properties. The second necessity is swift land reform. Only about one-fourth its best arable land is under cultivation, forcing Chile to import food. With 600,000 landless peasants and most of the land in the hands of a few great families indifferent to its wise use, the big estates must be broken up. On top of this, Frei Montalva's Christian Democrats, while on record for the ultimate nationalization of the big copper mines, want immediate control of the industry to expand refining at home and marketing abroad. Here there will be a frontal conflict with U.S. interests.

The inner weakness of the Christian Democratic majority will make itself felt as soon as these conflicts begin. For in Chile, as in Western Europe after the war, all kinds of reactionary interests jumped on the Christian Democratic bandwagon because they had nowhere else to go. Only anti-Communism put together the big majority in Chile. As soon as Frei moves to implement his program in the Chilean Congress, to which elections are scheduled in March, his coalition will begin to fall apart. He will be reduced to a minority regime unless he can, like the Christian Democrats in Italy, achieve an "opening to the left" and form an alliance with those elements of the Popular Front which favor peaceful reform rather than revolution. Here Frei's friendship with Allende and the latter's own Socialist background should prove fruitful. It should also be facilitated by the shift in the position of the Chilean Catholic hierarchy in recent years from support of feudalism to support of social reform. Only a new alliance of this kind can give Chile the social reform it needs if major convulsion and perhaps war are to be avoided. But can U.S. public opinion be educated to understand this? Or will we back a military coup if the Chilean oligarchy and the U.S. copper companies cannot corrupt a Frei regime? Last January the Engineering and Mining Journal, welcoming the appointment of Thomas Mann as Johnson's policy "czar" for Latin America expressed satisfaction with his "tough, no nonsense approach" and said Chile would be his first test. In Chile the U.S. can easily destroy the last bulwark to what it fears.

Capitalism in Chile

"In its dealings with Chile, the U.S. appeared to align itself unquestioningly with the traditional groups of privilege, seeming to feel that if only they were allowed to preside over a free-enterprise system, the social deformities of the country would somehow be ameliorated. The Chile of the dispossessed has not until very recently, directly concerned the U.S. To a certain extent, this is because there has been a tendency to assume that private capitalism will function in Chile as it now operates in the U.S. Actually, Chilean capitalists have not been forced to heed the lessons brought home to U.S. business leaders after 1929. Their basic policies are still founded upon belief in suppressing rather than cooperating with lower classes, upon small-scale production and excessive per-unit profit, upon government protection—but never government regulation— and upon special privileges which make possible the perpetuation of superannuated means of production. . . . So far as Chile's lower classes are concerned, capitalism has been synonymous with social injustice."

—Frederick B. Pike: Chile and the U.S.

The House Un-Americans Give Students from Cuba Their Annual Go Over

There were some new tactics this year as the Un-American Activities Committee faced the young people who went to Cuba. Chairman Willis did not preside and was absent throughout most of the two-day hearing. Last year his temper got the best of him whenever the students charged that he was not entitled to sit in Congress because Negroes in his Louisiana district were being deprived of the right to vote. In his place as chairman sat Rep. Ichord, a shrewd former District Attorney from Missouri who professed a desire "to protect the Constitutional rights of the witnesses." Behind him, was the Committee's concession to the Civil Rights Act, a Negro employee who periodically fetched pitchers of water.

The announced purpose of the hearing was to uncover loopholes in the Foreign Agents Registration Act. The implication was clear. All who say a kind word about Castro or Cuba must be dupes of international communism. The students selected by the Committee, although they shaved their beards and dressed neatly this year, did not present a convincing case. They spoke in the language of super-revolutionary fantasy. To them Castro Cuba is a paradise, America a tyranny, and the American wage-slave about to burst his chains. In this they echo some old-timers from the '30s, like Truman Nelson, who was present to address an anti-HUAC rally after the first day's hearing. "We in America are being separated from revolutionary renewal," he said as if in the carnage of revolution there was nourishment for the soul.

The most painful voice came from a young Negro just back from Cuba. His name was Charlie "Mao" Johnson, and he earned his nickname. For him the Negro was no mystic revolutionary symbol but a "super-exploited beast of burden." He thought Cuba had only "begun to do away with racism" and he dismissed the American white worker as no friend of the black man. Not once did he mention HUAC, as if it were no worse than the rest of our society. This was really a voice from the depths of black racial despair.

Appalachia Act Tailored to Suit Coal, Rail and Power Interests

Feeble Development Plan A Challenge to Liberals in Congress

After four years' incubation, the Appalachian Regional Development Act comes before Congress next week. "Our problem," we were told by one of its drafters, "has been to show that the Appalachia program is not another TVA." About this there can be no mistake. This inadequate plan is a challenge to liberals in Congress, and calls for a complete overhaul if it is not to disappoint the hopes it has aroused.

The Act creates no federal planning authority. A regional commission composed of one federal representative and the governors of the 11 Appalachian states must pass on all development plans. This at best is cumbersome; at its worst it gives a near veto to the vindictive Governor Wallace and his sympathizers in the other southern Appalachian states. The victory won over states' rights in the Civil Rights Act has been surrendered here without a stir. Likewise, the central authority imposed upon federal agencies at work in the Tennessee Valley has no counterpart in the Appalachian Act. The regional commission must deal separately with each federal agency. The prerogatives of bureaucrats have become as impregnable as the "rights" of States.

A Public Power Program

Nowhere is the Act more timorous than before the power of the public utilities. Appalachia's primary resource is coal; mining it is the only skill of the region's unemployed. A low-cost federal power program, using coal to generate electricity at the mine mouth, would put the unemployed to work, attract industry to the region, and produce enough profits to finance schools, roads and other public works. (See box below). The Act does not mention this plan although it was submitted to the President's Appalachian Commission and to Congress by the region's own residents. There is instead a specific prohibition against the use of funds "to finance the generation, transmission or distribution of electric energy." Only the Senate Public Works Committee has encouraged the public power plan. In its report on the bill it recommends another study. "The public utility lobby has been conspicuous by its absence," one Committee staff man told us. Little wonder when the government does the lobby's own work.

The utilities are not alone in their opposition to a public power program for Appalachia. They are joined by a coalition of coal mine owners, the UMW, and the railroads. The coal interests oppose any step that might offend the utilities, which have become the primary purchasers of bituminous coal. The railroads are in opposition because the generation of electricity at the mine-mouth would eliminate a major part of their freight revenues derived from the shipping of coal to distant generating plants.

A Mellon Fief

This coalition is welded together by monopoly control. In fact, it is only a minor exaggeration to see Appalachia as personal fief of the Mellon family of Pittsburgh. Through Mellon National Bank and Trust the family controls the Appalachian-based Consolidation Coal Co., the nation's largest producer of bituminous coal. Through Consolidation Coal the Mellons used to control the Virginian Railway. Its recent merger with the Norfolk & Western may have diluted Mellon ownership, but Mellon intimates still sit on the Norfolk board to influence if not control it. The merged company is now the largest domestic originator of bituminous coal, carrying 76% of the total tonnage handled in 1962. With their influence firmly established in coal and rails, the Mellons in recent years have turned to utilities. In 1961, when Consolidation Coal acquired what many consider to be controlling interest in Chrysler Corp. and U. S. Steel, the company also purchased over 100,000 shares of American Electric Power, a holding company for six utilities operating throughout Appalachia. American Electric's president is Donald Cook, a close friend of President Johnson.

TVA never had to battle a monopoly like this one. At the American Public Power Association we were told, "If Johnson would back it, and some Senator with a heart—a Gaylord Nelson or a Maurine Neuberger would fight for it, Appalachia could have its own TVA." Perhaps, but it seems more likely that those who have exploited Appalachia in the past will continue to do so with all the impunity of monopolists in a foreign land.

The Case for A TVA-Style Approach to Appalachia's Problems

"In June and again in September, 1963, representatives of the Eastern Kentucky Redevelopment Administration sent resolutions to the President's Appalachian Commission calling for a Federal agency patterned after TVA to develop the electric power potential of the area and to undertake its general social and economic rehabilitation.

"The Edison Electric Institute has estimated that the colossal sum of $175 billion will have to be invested in new electric-power generating facilities in the next 20 years. Steps must be taken to insure that the huge coal resources of Appalachia are utilized in meeting this goal. Dams at strategic locations in the Kentucky highlands could provide storage for cooling water to be used by huge mine-mouth generating plants. Extra-high-voltage transmission lines and the expanding grid system would make it possible to send low-cost power into New England, a region of high power costs. The [proposal] of Consolidated Edison of New York to go some 1,100 miles to Labrador for hydropower points up the possibilities of using Appalachian coal for electric power in the Northeast.

"The hydro- and thermal-power potential of eastern Kentucky could be developed for a billion dollars. And this could be made entirely self-liquidating [within 35 years]. However, such a self-financing corporation should be given a stern mandate to plow back into the impoverished counties in which it would operate a substantial portion of the money from power sales. At least 1 mill per kwh should be added to the price and invested in schools, roads, airports, flood-control, reforestation and reclamation and perhaps the building of entirely new towns. Sustained capital investment over a generation would bring this deprived corner of the American hinterland abreast of the rest of the nation."

The Dead Italian Leader Attacked Khrushchevite Reluctance to Push On With Reform

Togliatti's Testament Will Inspire New Hope for Freedom in the Soviet Bloc

The memorandum written by Palmiro Togliatti on the eve of his death and now published by Luigi Longo, his successor as head of the Italian Communist Party, is a political event of first importance. It performs a service for the best elements in the Soviet bloc by protesting the "slowness and resistance" of the stodgy Soviet leadership in "overcoming the regime of restrictions and suppression of democratic and personal freedom introduced by Stalin." Khrushchev and his circle are still Stalinist in spirit, though much less harsh in conduct. This posthumous nudge from the foremost intellectual of world Communism, and from the Italian party, the most powerful and sophisticated in the West, will give fresh hope to the youth (and to the old idealists) everywhere in Eastern Europe from Warsaw to Moscow.

Lenin, Too, Allowed Little Freedom

Eight years ago, in his comments on the 20th Congress, the Italian Left Socialist leader Nenni, astringently noted how inadequate was the concept of "personality cult" to explain the horrors of the Stalin period. Now his old ally, Togliatti, also criticizes the effort "to explain this solely through Stalin's serious personal defects." To put the blame wholly on Stalin is to evade the need for basic reform. Even Togliatti fails to see how far these reforms must go. He speaks of the need to restore "the Leninist [our italics] norms that insured within the party and outside it, a wide liberty of expression and debate on culture, art and also on politics." The loss of liberty began with Lenin, as Rosa Luxembourg, Martov, Kautsky and Emma Goldman saw quite early. Leninist democracy is a Trotzkyist myth.

In opposing a world conference of Communist parties to deal with the obstreperous Chinese, Togliatti recognized that their expulsion and a split would inevitably mean a witch hunt for those suspected of Chinese sympathies and the reimposition of Stalin-style discipline directed from Moscow. The heavy-handed Russians do not have the brains to direct a world movement, and the situations confronted by the individual Communist parties are much too diverse for centralized control. When one recalls the fatal errors Moscow and the Communists made in dealing with the menace of Nazism, one shudders to think of a new Third International, embroiled with a new Fourth directed from Peking, "in internal polemics of a purely ideological nature (as Togliatti wrote) far removed from reality." In Italy Togliatti showed his wisdom in his friendlier attitude toward the Church and the non-Communist Left. There as in many other countries the Communists are a major political factor. More sensible policies on their part are essential to a saner world. Togliatti made a great contribution toward this by his testament.

Elizabeth Gurley Flynn

In one sense Elizabeth Gurley Flynn died a failure but in another she died a success. The Communist Party of which she was chairman had lost almost all influence and respect; younger, more independent-minded members drifted away when it failed to recognize the implications of the 20th Congress and remained an uninspiring echo of Moscow. Its leadership became a kind of leftwing Old Folks Home, clinging to the conspiratorial and bureaucratic habits of the past. It was a strange position for her latter years, as the stuffy atmosphere of Moscow's hierarchy was a strange place for her to die. The fiery young Irish labor agitator, most passionate and eloquent of America's now vanished IWW's, the long time mate in free love of her fellow anarchist, the wonderful Carlo Tresca, deserved a better end. The pity of it is that so few will realize how much Elizabeth did in her long and devoted lifetime for the betterment of the American working class. The great strikes she led on the eve of World War I were part of the epic struggle of U.S. labor to win its rights. The American Civil Liberties Union she helped organize is our oldest sentinel of basic liberties. A jail term under the Smith Act and isolation were the rewards of her old age, but some day, in a quieter atmosphere, her services to her country will be remembered. Because of her and other radicals like her, American workers are no longer the helpless victims of exploitation to be found elsewhere in this hemisphere. This was her success.

How USIA Secretly Subsidizes Books and Writers, P. 3

But When Will These Humane and Pragmatic Views Be Applied to Cuba and Vietnam?

"The Senator's [Goldwater's] assumption that the Russians can be counted on to accept humiliation rather than war is a dangerous delusion. It is based on the fantastic premise that the American people will prefer the destruction of their cities and perhaps a hundred million deaths to an adjustment with the Communists, but that at the same time the Russians will surrender to an ultimatum rather than accept the risk of nuclear war. . . . Permeating Senator Goldwater's view of the cold war is an unshakeable belief that Communist and free societies cannot survive together in the same world. . . . It is, I believe, an understanding of human diversity, and of the inability of one man or nation to determine what is best for all others, that forms the core of the democratic idea. When 'freedom' is worshipped as a sublime and mystical state rather than simply a necessary condition for human fulfilment, the faith in freedom itself ceases to express the democratic spirit . . . it ceases to express the conscience of a conservative and becomes instead the faith of a fanatic. . . . Goldwater Republicanism is the closest thing in American politics to an equivalent of Russian Stalinism. Each makes a religion of its ideology. . . . The Republicans build their policy on the ideologies that divide the world; the Democrats look beyond ideology to the common hopes, the common interests and the common dangers that unite the human race."

What A Little Lanolin D Can Do for That War in Vietnam

We sat in at our TV the evening of Sept. 10 on the beginning of a new ABC series called Letters from Vietnam about "The Daring American." The program, if not the war, seemed to be self-sustaining. It was sponsored by Purex, the cleanser with the woman's touch; Instant Fels, with that built-in fabric softener; Trend, with the tiny suds, so much better than the big bubbles; and Sweetheart Soap, which makes elegance affordable today. Part of the hour long program permitted us to listen in as a U.S. Army Lieut. talked into a dictaphone for his absent wife those "Letters from Vietnam" which gave the program its name. Part of the program permitted us to sit in on battle scenes which lived up to the advance billing, "Specially mounted cameras on combat helicopters take you into battle, show you what it's like to come within a hair of being shot down on a rescue mission." It's a new sensation in warfare to know that you're going into battle with TV cameras trained on you for the folks back home, and that if you're wounded the whole country will see it, unless you have the misfortune of being hit during the commercial.

No Callus on Hand or Heart

It was nice to be assured that our soldiers don't take the war as personal. The lieutenant explained to his wife on the dictaphone that to our fighting men the Viet Cong are "vermin, they're not human, so you don't worry about it as you shoot them up." The finer feelings, like the finer hands in washing with Purex, are not calloused. In another memorable scene we could watch a village being shot up from the air. The announcer explained, "the VC got his back a thousand fold—a return designed to make VC even more unpopular in the countryside." Without this explanation, shooting up a whole village because we suspected a few guerrillas were hidden in it might be regarded as making us a little unpopular in the countryside, too. "We may sometimes kill women and children inadvertently," the Lieutenant wrote his wife that night, "but never on purpose." Then he added what seemed to us a dangerous thought, that he supposed the VC have a family, too. A later sequence, to demonstrate his kindly feelings, showed the Lieutenant visiting an orphanage in Saigon. As the orphans waved goodbye, the painful scene merged into a happy commercial, with American children playing about their mother, her hands protected against dryness by Gentle Fels soap, which contains Lanolin D, "nature's own skin conditioner to make your work easier." We hope the Vietnamese war can be kept going until this series is completed. It shows how smoothly a war can be fought, with a little Lanolin D.

Is Peace Breaking Out Despite Us?

"Both American and Vietnamese officials vehemently deny that any cease-fire measures are under consideration, or even possible under present circumstances. Such measures are very much in the minds, however, of Vietnamese not now in positions of responsibility. Buddhist leaders, for instance, have called on both the Government army commanders and Vietcong leadership to 'slow down' the war, if not actually cease fighting. Furthermore, independent military observers detect signs—there is no clear proof—of increasing numbers of de facto cease-fire understandings growing up in recent weeks among individual units in widespread parts of the country. These take the form of local stated or tacit agreements by Government and Vietcong commanders."

—Peter Grose from Saigon in the early editions of the New York Times (p. 20) Sun., Sept. 13. This passage was omitted in the Late City Edition.

The war may not be going as well as we would like it from a military point of view, but with this series we have hit our stride when it comes to merchandising it. The war is at last being packaged properly, and it's the package which makes the sale. The U.S. Army has achieved a break-through.

First Congressional Investigation in Quarter Century Into Economic Concentration

Senate Antitrust Examines A New Kind of Corporate Super Monster

For the first time in a quarter-century Congress is taking a look at economic concentration in American industry. Its last study was in 1939 when the Temporary National Economic Committee began work on 40 volumes of hearings and monographs. Now the Senate Antitrust Committee under Senator Hart is in the midst of a new set of hearings. Although virtually unmentioned in the press, the revelations have been as striking as any uncovered by Senator Kefauver when he led the Committee into price-fixing in the steel and drug industries.

The hearings have established the first broad consensus behind the opinion that concentration has been increasing and increasing rapidly since the end of World War II. Findings of the Federal Trade Commission, the Census Bureau and the Committee's own chief economist (Dr. John Blair) all indicate that the 100 largest U.S. manufacturing corporations control about 25% more of the nation's net capital manufacturing assets than they did 15 years ago. This means they now hold 57% or just short of three-fifths of all property used in U.S. manufacturing.

The Conglomerate Giant

Even more startling (and one does not startle easily after so many years of bigness) is the way these corporate giants have grown. At the time of the TNEC investigation, the giants confined themselves to activity within a single industry. They expanded horizontally to acquire competitors and vertically to acquire firms within their stream of production and distribution. John Blair's testimony reveals the growth of a new kind of super-giant, the conglomerate. It expands by diversifying into industries totally unrelated to its major field of production (see box below). Textron, for example, is now engaged in practically every U.S. industry except textiles, the one in which it began. At least one of the 100 largest manufacturing corporations is now among the 4 largest producers in more than half the product classes of U.S. industry. Since product class (rather than products) is the category that most closely approximates the market, these figures show the giants in direct "competition" with the majority of U.S. manufacturing firms.

How Much Bigger The Big Have Grown

"In 1962, the population of American manufacturing enterprises consisted of about 180,000 corporations and 240,000 partnerships and proprietorships. These 420,000 business units had combined assets of about $296 billion. The 20 largest manufacturing corporations had $73.8 billion in assets, or an estimated 25% of the total. The 419,000 smallest companies accounted for only 25.2% of total assets. Thus the total assets of the 20 largest corporations were approximately the same as those of the 419,000 smallest. Concentration, when measured in terms of net profits or net capital assets, is greater. For example, the 20 largest manufacturing corporations, with 25.4% of total assets, accounted for 38% of profits after taxes. The net profits of the 5 largest corporations were nearly twice as large as those of the about 178,000 smallest corporations."

—W. F. Mueller, head of Bureau of Economics at FTC, before Senate Antitrust Comm., July 2 (abr.)

These figures really underestimate the extent of concentration and conglomeration. They are based upon the assumption that a company must own more than 50% of the stock of another in order to control it. This standard has long been obsolete. Even the conservative SEC presumes control with the ownership of 25% or more of the stock. In large corporations, where ownership is widely diffused, control often comes with as little as 10% of the stock. "One is the recipient of so many slings and arrows in this work," one Committee staff member explained, "that we lean over backwards to use the most conservative statistics."

The corporate giants, unwilling to risk smaller profits by lowering costs and expanding production, have turned instead to investments in conglomerate mergers. The Justice Department and the FTC have been reluctant to fight these. (The FTC's recent decision against Proctor & Gamble's acquisition of Chlorox is the one exception and may indicate a new policy.) If Senate Antitrust decides on legislation to break up the conglomerates, it will be attacking a major barrier to full employment of machines and manpower.

Economist Asks For New Antitrust Law To Break Up Giant Conglomerates

"A firm possesses conglomerate power when its operations are so widely diversified that its survival no longer depends on success in any given product market. Its absolute size, its sheer bigness, is so impressive that it can discipline or destroy its more specialized competitors. It occupies a position much like the millionaire poker player who, in a game of unlimited stakes, can easily bankrupt his less opulent opponents.

"General Dynamics, for example, turns out a diversified product line ranging from Atlas missiles to sand and gravel. Martin-Marietta produces aero-space equipment, cement and concrete, printing inks, dyestuffs, adhesives and resins, and household cleaning products. Textron, perhaps the greatest conglomerate in U.S. industry, is an amalgam of 27 separate divisions and 113 separate plants—making such widely dissimilar products as helicopters, chicken feed, mailboxes, paints and optical machinery.

"Since the conglomerate firm is composed of functionally unrelated enterprises, it loses the advantages of specialization and economies of scale. It cannot claim to be society's benefactor through greater efficiency.

"Since conglomerate bigness is relatively new in American manufacturing, neither economic theory nor public policy has yet devised effective means of coping with it. Certainly, it is doubtful whether the Sherman and Clayton Acts are adequate to the task. Nevertheless, we do have a precedent of a specialized antitrust law—the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935—which addressed itself to the phenomenon of conglomerate bigness in a single industry. Section 11, the heart of the statute, required holding companies to divest themselves of widely scattered utility properties which had no operating relationship with respect to each other.

I suggest that this Committee explore the feasibility of adapting the Public Utility Holding Company Act provisions to conglomerate bigness in manufacturing.

—Dr. Walter Adams, Prof. of Econ., Mich State U., before the Sen. Antitrust Subcom., Sept. 10 (abr.).

How "Cultural Exchange" Became A Propaganda Operation At Home As Well As Abroad

USIA Secretly Subsidizes Books and Writers to Spread Its "Line"

In 1948 Congress passed a U.S. Information and Educational Exchange Act. It authorized the Secretary of State to provide for the exchange of books, periodicals "and other educational materials" with foreign countries and for the dissemination abroad of "information about the United States." In 1953 these powers were transferred to the newly created U.S. Information Agency. It now appears, from testimony taken in executive sessions (see box below) by the House Appropriations Committee, that this authorization has been stretched by the USIA secretly to subsidize the writing and publication of books at home as well as abroad.

Comic Strips, Too

Mr. Lipscomb (R. Cal): I was interested in an article that appeared in the Washington Star Sunday magazine of Jan. 12, 1964, which refers to a 'Comic Strip Mill' and states that 'USIA [US Information Agency] artists in Washington turn out material for thousands of publications abroad.' . . . It says, 'Five seemingly innocent comic strips are slipped into some 5,000 publications around the world every week. Although their readers and sometimes even their editors don't know it, the comic strips carry a hidden message; they are American propaganda.'

—House Appropriations Committee, March 3

Buying Stature to Get Credibility

Thanks to Glenard P. Lipscomb (R. Cal.), a member of the Appropriations Committee, more information has been elicited about this "book development program." Lipscomb questioned USIA's authority to engage in such activities, and has released the Comptroller General's reply. This letter discloses that the book contracts with USIA "provide publication shall be without attribution to the Agency [USIA] and that there shall be no publicity of the Government's connection with the book." The names of books thus bought were censored out of the committee hearing record at the USIA's request. One of them, as the reader will see below, was described by Reed Harris, the USIA official in charge as covering "the whole Communist strategy of deception." Mr. Harris seemed unaware that he was describing our own government's strategy of deception. The USIA does not employ writers on its staff but seeks out "commercial writers who have stature in the literary world" because this "results in greater credibility." Despite this prized stature, "we control the thing," [our italics] Mr. Harris explained, "from the very idea down to the final edited manuscript."

The Comptroller General's letter upholding this stretches the law and misses the point. Congressman Lipscomb has promised to sponsor legislation either to stop the practice or require that books subsidized by the USIA be so labelled. Otherwise the reader has no way of distinguishing between objective scholarship and paid propagation of the government's line. Milton described a book as "the life-blood of a master spirit." Nowadays it may also be a custom-made masterpiece, cut to the government's cloth.

The Testimony Which Disclosed Our Own Government's Strategy of Deception

Mr. (John) ROONEY (D. N.Y.): At page 18-7 entitled "Book Development" you would seek an increase from $90,000 in the current year to $195,000 in the coming year. What is the alleged necessity for that?

Mr. (Reed) HARRIS (Information Center Service, USIA): That is the program under which we can have books written to our own specifications, books that would not otherwise be put out, especially those books that have strong anti-Communist content and follow other themes that are particularly useful for our purposes. Under the book development program, we control the thing from the very idea down to the final edited manuscript.

Mr. ROONEY: What are the details?

Mr. HARRIS: Mr. Chairman, we would be able to go into the titles if we might be allowed to do it off the record because our interests in certain of these books should not become a matter of general public information.

* * *

Mr. ROONEY: Tell us about this book.

Mr. HARRIS: This book, sir, covers the whole Communist strategy of deception.

Mr. ROONEY: How many books have been written on this subject?

Mr. HARRIS: I could not tell you all of them but this is a very down-to-earth book and is the kind of thing that warns people —

Mr. ROONEY: There is nothing new about this subject is there? I can remember reading about it over 30 years ago. What did it cost?

Mr. HARRIS: In this case, it cost $14,952.

Mr. ROONEY: How many writers do you have in the USIA?

Mr. Louis FANGET (Chief, Publications Division): We do not employ any writers, sir, on the staff. We try to reach outside commercial writers who have stature in the literary world, we try to get them to do books. This results in greater credibility, sir.

Mr. (Glenard) LIPSCOMB (R. Cal.): How many books do you have of the nature of * which were financed by USIA but are now being put out by American publishers for sale in the United States?

Mr. FANGET: Sir, it is our intent to have all the books published by the American publisher for sale commercially not only in the United States but we hope overseas so that the book has the credibility we want it to have.

Mr. LIPSCOMB: I am having a hard time understanding why USIA must finance a book and then have it go on the market for sale. If a publisher thinks a book is good —

Mr. FANGET: The kinds of books we support are those that would not be published ordinarily.

Mr. LIPSCOMB: Why not?

Mr. FANGET: Because they would be difficult to sell. An American publisher would not ordinarily publish an anti-Communist book because they do not sell commercially. And even those published commercially sometimes have some Federal support behind them. An American publisher will only publish those books on which he believes he can make a profit. These books habitually do not make a profit. For example,*—. If we had not invested money in it, it would not have come to light. It is considered by authorities to be one of the best books on the expose of the Communist system.

—Before the House Appropriations Comm., March 5 (abr.)

Indicates book title was censored.

The Price Party and Nation Pay for the United Front Against Goldwater

Liberal Democrats Help Johnson Try to Bury the Baker Case

In the Senate last week the liberal Democrats declined the chance to set up a genuine Bobby Baker investigation. The voting was so close on almost every question that the change of a few liberal votes would have been decisive. A change of four would have sent the re-opened inquiry to the new Select Committee on Ethics rather than back to Rules, where it got nowhere the first time round. Another four liberal votes would have permitted the minority members in Rules to call witnesses whom the majority refused to call. Six liberal votes would have given the investigating committee explicit authority to examine all government building contracts, not just the one for the District of Columbia Stadium.

Only Douglas Refused to Compromise

Senator Douglas was the only liberal to vote consistently for these proposals and others like them. Clark, the proponent of Senate reform, took a live pair against almost every one. Morse, McGovern and Neuberger voted with the party leadership all the way. Gruening and Nelson scattered their votes both for and against. Church, McCarthy and Proxmire played the game of voting for an amendment only to switch their votes at the last moment if it seemed the amendment might pass.

Under other circumstances a vote for a tough Baker investigation would have been a vote to expose the Senate Establishment and its tie-in with Big Business. Unfortunately a thorough investigation would lead straight into the White House. The leader of the Establishment is now the white hope of American liberalism against Goldwater. This illustrates what Dean Sayre of Washington Cathedral meant when in an unusually outspoken sermon Sept. 13 he deplored the character of the men between whom the American people must choose in November: "one a man of dangerous ignorance and devastating uncertainty, the other a man whose public house is splendid in its every appearance but whose private lack of ethic must inevitably introduce termites at the very foundation."

The Rules Committee is almost certain to stifle this new inquiry as it did the last. The key figure is Matthew McCloskey, contractor for the D.C. Stadium, who, according to Senator Williams (R. Del.), conspired with Bobby Baker to add 25,000 to the cost and divert this to the 1960 Democratic campaign fund. Sen. Jordan, Chairman of Rules, refused to promise that he would ask McCloskey to testify. His colloquy with Senator Williams is typical:

Sen. WILLIAMS: I should like to ask the Senator if in his next inquiry he intends to call Mr. McCloskey?

Sen. JORDAN: I shall answer the question this way: If the resolution is turned over to the Committee on Rules, we will do the investigating.

Sen. WILLIAMS: Will the Senator from North Carolina call Mr. McCloskey as a witness?

Sen. JORDAN: That will be for the Committee to decide.

Mr. WILLIAMS: Will the Senator tell us how he personally will stand?

Mr. JORDAN: If the Senator will wait until we have the opportunity to act, we will determine how to proceed.

The Democratic maneuver may not work. As Senator Scott (R. Pa.) said, "The danger in burying a live issue is that the ghost returns to haunt the happy morticians."

The FBI and the Baker Case

"The Senator from Montana [Mansfield] raised the question about whether the [Baker-McCloskey] question had been referred to the Department of Justice. At the time I made my speech last week it had not been. It has since been referred to the Department. The Department sent its representatives around to see me. This happened since the President authorized the FBI to go into the question. They did come around to my office, and I must say that I was much disappointed in that interview. They seemed to think that there were two questions of prime importance: First, "Where did you get the check and who gave it to you? Who is your informant?" Second, "When did you get the check?" Neither point is material so far as they are concerned. . . . They spent three-quarters of their time in my office trying to find out where I got the information."

—Sen. J. Williams (R. Del), in the Senate, Sept. 9

Jurists Condemn Brazil Coup U.S. Backed, P. 3

"Violence in the Streets" But What of (Anti-Negro) Violence in the Rural South?

Republicans and Democrats outdo each other in condemning "violence in the streets," a euphemism for Negro crimes against whites in the North. Both are silent about violence in the South against Negroes and white civil rights workers. This is unmentioned in the campaign speeches, as it was in the platforms. Crimes against whites have been exaggerated; the crime rate in Goldwater's almost lily-white Phoenix turns out to be higher than in New York or Washington. Violence against Negroes is played down. The body of a Negro CORE worker was fished out of the Big Black River near Pickens, Miss., Sept. 9 without a ripple of indignation. Church burnings have become routine. When a Negro church was bombed and an Indian church burned down near Philadelphia, Miss., Sept. 19, the few newspapers which carried the item buried it in their back pages. Two days later, when bombs were thrown at a church in McComb, Miss., and into a house where two children miraculously escaped death, these did make headlines in the New York evening papers but only after angry Negroes drove police out of the neighborhood with bricks and bottles. Failure to punish Southern white bombers and killers is taken for granted. No one has yet been arrested for the murder of three civil rights workers last summer near Philadelphia, Miss. The Klansmen tried for shooting Lemuel Penn in Georgia have been acquitted. The murder of Medger Evers is still unpunished. Nobody has been arrested for cutting the heads off two young Negroes in Mississippi last spring and throwing their bodies in the Yazoo river. There are parts of the South in which shooting Negroes is known as "funning." It's time Johnson and Humphrey, Goldwater and Miller, were forced to say where they stand on this Southern form of amusement.

VOL. XII, NO. 32 SEPTEMBER 28, 1964 WASHINGTON, D. C. 15 CENTS

Like A Bar-Room Brawl With The Lights Out

It is not surprising that Secretary McNamara abruptly shut off his press conference on the latest Tonkin Bay incident so he would not have to answer questions. The U.S. has never engaged in a more obscure bit of brinkmanship. The Washington Post (Sept. 20) in reporting the White House reactions said President Johnson "believes that history might have turned out differently if Kaiser Wilhelm and Chancellor Adolf Hitler had not made miscalculations about the U.S." The parallel is doubly unfortunate. Germany twice precipitated world wars by a "right is might" policy ours has begun to resemble. The Germans did indeed miscalculate U.S. reaction, but that miscalculation was a simple affair. Then Berlin did not know what Washington would do. Here we have a situation in which Washington itself does not know what it's doing. Neither Washington nor Moscow nor Peking nor Hanoi can calculate clearly because none of them seem sure of what happened. We say we shot at some blips on a radar screen; Peking and Hanoi say, in substance, that nothing at all happened; and Moscow says we sank three ships. Now Washington says it thinks maybe we did. This is beginning to resemble a bar-room brawl with the lights out.

Peking on That First Tonkin Bay Battle

"According to the 'chronology', at 7:40 p.m. local time, U.S. warships encountered these 'surface vessels' and at 9:52 an 'engagement' took place. Fierce fighting continued for more than three hours and lasted till 1:30 on August 5. The whole process lasted for nearly six hours. This was truly a sea battle of considerable scale. But anybody with a little knowledge of military science knows that torpedo boats have high speed and short range and are fit for short distance surprise attack and hit-and-run tactics. How could they be engaged in fierce fighting with powerful U.S. destroyers for three hours on high seas more than 60 nautical miles off the coast? Secondly, if these vessels were, as alleged by Johnson, 'hostile vessels of the Government of North Vietnam', which made 'deliberate, wilful and systematic attack on U.S. vessels', why didn't they start the attack immediately after spotting the U.S. vessels, instead of paralleling the tracks of U.S. vessels, until 9:52, that is, more than two hours after U.S. vessels spotted them, got everything ready, and even had time to call in an escort of aircraft?"

—Peking Review, Aug. 14. We are indebted for this quotation to (of all places) the Goldwaterite National Review (Sept. 22) whose editor, Buckley, advocates negotiating with China to end the Viet war.

There's Many A Blip . . .

Last time our Navy at least claimed to have heard and seen gun flashes. This time the whole encounter took place on the radar screens. We don't seem to know what the hostile blips were, or what happened to them. According to Mr. Johnson's press conference of Sept. 21, when the early reports came in some persons had urged rapid retaliation again, as after the alleged attack on August 5, which Peking and Hanoi also say never happened. Fortunately Mr. Johnson said he preferred to wait until daylight when the situation could be better understood and evaluated. One more swift reprisal raid like the last one, and it would have been hard to tell from the blips on the political radar screen whether that was Johnson or Goldwater shooting from the hip again. McNamara may have fled that press conference because answers, or unwillingness to answer, certain questions might have been embarrassing. He might also have fled lest the press discover that he, too, didn't know the answers. It's not news that the American people long ago lost touch with what is really happening in Vietnam. It's painful to discover that their leaders aren't sure either.

In the last Tonkin Bay incidents the alibi was that while the CIA knew, it failed to let the Navy know, that attacks were being made on the North Vietnamese coast while our destroyers cruised nearby. After that incident, it was announced that our patrols were being removed from the Bay of Tonkin but that we reserved the right to resume them later. Now again the AP from Washington (Baltimore Sun, Sept. 22) carries the news, "The two-destroyer patrol involved in last Friday's shooting incident has been withdrawn from the Gulf of Tonkin, informed sources said tonight. The patrol was finished on schedule, they said, and it is indefinite when another will go into the gulf. . . ." Was this the first patrol since the August 5 affair?* Were any covert operations scheduled at the same time by the South Vietnamese, using the naval vessels we have given them? How does North Vietnamese radar distinguish U.S. naval vessels when under U.S. command from the same vessels when under South Vietnamese control? Do U.S. patrols engage in reconnaissance which pinpoints radar and coastal defense installations along the North Vietnamese coast and is this information then turned over to the South Vietnamese to help them in raiding activities? If Russian or Chinese destroyers prowled the Florida coast while ships they supplied Castro engaged in coastal raids, what would we do? Send hampers of Florida grapefruit to their skippers?

What the Desperadoes Want

We may have double electronic locks on our nuclear weapons but we seem to have less and less control over our own and our puppet forces in Vietnam though these could spark off a wider war. The situation in South Vietnam is falling apart so quickly that one suspects it is too fast for the Vietcong as well as ourselves. Divisional capitals are left unguarded—and yet are not taken over—as commanding generals move their troops on Saigon to see if they can emerge as the new "strong men" or at least get themselves another star on their shoulder straps as consolation prizes. The indifference of the populace in Saigon was the most striking feature of the abortive coup. The country is sick of war and sick of us, especially of our habit of napalming and machine-gunning whole villages to get at a few suspected guerrillas. Behind the Catholic-Buddhist feud is a division between Catholic extremists anxious to carry on the war at any cost and Buddhists who want restoration of civilian government and a cease-fire. The most dangerous element in the situation are those military men who see a widening of the war as the only way to prevent a negotiated peace. One of these is the young Air Force Commander and playboy, Nguyen Cao Ky, to whom Khanh owes his survival. In an interview with Le Monde (Sept. 17) Ky advocated extension of the war to the North and when asked whether the Americans would permit this declared angrily, "M. I can order and carry out these operations at any time," and cut off the interview. This is the new power behind the collapsing throne in Saigon.

Congress And The Court

"The Constitution says, 'The Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.' . . . But these constitutional provisions no more authorize Congress to prevent the judicial power of the United States from enforcing the right to equal protection of the laws than the same provisions authorize Congress to prevent the judicial power from enforcing the right to freedom of speech, or trial by jury, or any other constitutional right. Congress cannot nullify constitutional rights by the simple device of forbidding U.S. courts to decide cases in which these rights are involved."

—Henry W. Edgerton, retired judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, in a letter to the Washington Post Sept. 16, on the reapportionment controversy in Congress.

Our puppets have a way of making us dance to their strings. It would be well to be on guard against provocations or phony news stories designed to provoke or excuse what these light-headed desperadoes want. In this category is the story from Saigon in the New York Times (Sept. 22) as we go to press quoting "reliable military sources" as saying that South Vietnamese forces had inflicted heavy casualties on two companies of North Vietnamese who had crossed over the demilitarized zone that separates the two parts of Vietnam. The AP (Baltimore Sun, Sept. 22) treated this more circumspectly as a "possibility" that U.S. authorities were investigating. Why should North Vietnam risk an invasion and a U.S. attack when the collapse of the South Vietnamese government and a negotiated peace may be in sight?

 "Navy chiefs," said the Washington Wire of the Wall Street Journal Sept. 4, "plan to send another sea patrol into the Gulf of Tonkin soon. It will resemble the force that encountered North Vietnamese attacks in early August. Officers talk of the plan as just another reconnaissance mission. But it could test Red belligerency afresh." Was this advance leak part of a war of nerves?

Why Morse Opposes Javits or Any Other "Compromise" Court Resolution

"I shall vote for no proposal that in any way casts disrespect upon the Federal court system. The back-seat driving that the Javits substitute represents is always an unsound disruption of our constitutional system, no matter how innocuously it may be framed. The courts will ignore it but the public will not. For those who want to stir up resistance to court decisions and resentment against the courts in general, any critical advisory opinion from the Congress is a victory.

"For at least 10 years, 'court-busting' bills have been on this calendar in every session. We have had bills to overturn the Nelson decision on State subversive laws; bills to overturn the passport decisions; bills to overturn the protection of persons charged as security risks; bills to overturn the Mallory rule. If we who fought those measures had started dickering with their advocates to find something we could all agree on, most of them would have been adopted in one form or another.

"It was not Earl Warren who laid down the theorem that the Supreme Court is the final arbiter of the Constitution; it was a great Virginian, John Marshall. If the American people are adamant in their opposition to the Court rulings on reapportionment a constitutional amendment can always undo what the Supreme Court has already done. It is those who know that once popular representation is a fact the people will welcome it, who are trying to suspend the administration of justice."

—Morse in the Senate Sept. 15 (abridged).

Commission's Report Says Military Feared Congress Would Approve Goulart's Reforms

World Jurists Condemn Brazil's Military For U.S. Supported Coup

When the conservative International Commission of Jurists condemns Castro or criticizes the Soviet bloc, it makes headlines in the U.S. press. But its recent criticism of the military coup in Brazil the U.S. supported was almost entirely blacked out of the U.S. press. We cabled the Commission in Geneva for a copy and here present the heart of that report from its September bulletin:

President Goulart was effectively overthrown by April 2, 1964, in a military coup which was fortunately bloodless. The accusations made against him by the military leaders of the coup were of trying to introduce a dictatorship of the extreme Left, of violating the Constitution, and of increasing his personal power at the expense of that of Congress. . . .

It is difficult to find any justification for the overthrow of President Goulart by the military without waiting for Congress to express its views on his proposals. . . . Whether or not President Goulart was a good or bad executive, Left-wing or Right-wing, efficient or inefficient, he was the constitutional President of Brazil and constitutional methods existed to restrain him from accomplishing any of the three things of which he was specifically accused by the military. The obvious conclusion to be drawn from the fact that the military did not wait for Congress to pronounce upon President Goulart's proposals is that they feared that Congress might accept them. Any pretext of acting in the higher interests of the Constitution or to protect the Constitution against the activities of President Goulart is self-evidently hollow. . . .

The Real Reason for the Coup

President Goulart's programme was to "transform an archaic society into a modern society authentically free and democratic." A small agrarian reform had been effected by a decree of March, 1964. In order to proceed to a more sweeping reform President Goulart had asked Congress in his annual report of March 15, 1964, to approve amendments to the Constitution. . . . The reform already effected by decree concerned 3% of the land surface and covered non-cultivated land less than ten kilometers on either side of part of the federal communications system. Such land had been the object of fearful speculation. More fundamentally, the project of agrarian reform aimed to abolish the abuses of latifundia. . . . In Brazil 62% of cultivable land belongs to 3% of the population; 0.5% is divided up into 400,000 parcels of less than 5 hectares; there are 9 million landless peasants of whom 4 million are not paid wages in money.

How LBJ Welcomed The Coup

"The American people have watched with anxiety the political and economic difficulties through which your great nation has been passing. . . . The relations of friendship and cooperation between our two governments and peoples are . . . a precious asset in the interests of peace and prosperity and liberty in this hemisphere and in the whole world. I look forward to the continued strengthening of those relations and to our intensified cooperation in the interests of economic progress and social justice for all. . . ."

—Johnson's message welcoming Goulart's overthrow, Apr. 2.

As political reforms, President Goulart wished to give the right to vote to illiterates and to those on military service, and asked for universal suffrage. He also proposed that his programme of reform should be submitted to a popular referendum in which all Brazilian citizens aged 18 and over would be entitled to vote. . . . These reforms, unless there be some hidden sinister significance, are entirely in accordance with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. . . . Moreover, the late President Kennedy expressed his approval of this social programme as entirely in conformity with the spirit of the Alliance for Progress. It would seem more than a little incongruous to label as Communist a programme which met with the approval of President Kennedy, or which in principle is self-evidently necessary for the proper advancement of human dignity in a country where the disparity between rich and poor is still of frightening proportions.

Something of the measure of the respect for fundamental rights which is held by the new military regime in Brazil can be gauged from its actions since assuming power. The land reform [decree] was abrogated. Approximately forty members of Parliament have been divested of their seats, censorship of the press has been established, approximately 8,000 persons have been arrested, and all likely opponents of standing at the forthcoming presidential election have been deprived of their civil rights.

How Brazil's New Military Chiefs Faked Evidence of a Communist Plot

"Five months after the 'glorious Christian revolution,' both ordinary and military prisons are overcrowded with political prisoners, numbering now several thousands and including a number of MPs, a few deposed State governors and mayors, priests, university teachers, and so on. The net for this frantic witchhunt has been cast far and wide to gather in every man and woman even remotely suspect of progressive or Left-wing opinions. In some places, like the State of Minas Gerais, this went to the extent of pouncing rather on the progressives or reformist Catholic groups, while leaving the few Communists at liberty. . . .

"Immediately after the military coup, peasants (including many women) were rounded up in hundreds by army and police units and thrown into local jails and beaten up. Many of the leaders were killed or emasculated by gangs of thugs organized by the landowners, who were known to have been buying and storing arms for some time. It is true that the regime has not dared so far to break up the "Labour Courts" legally set up in country towns to deal with peasants' complaints, but the judges have been subject to much pressure and at least one of them was arrested.

"In order to give some semblance of truth to the hackneyed and already discredited story of a 'Communist plot', the military chiefs have organized a number of 'exhibitions of subversive material' which they claim to have seized from Left-wing organizations (the press cliche 'copious subversive material was seized' is always good for raising a laugh nowadays). One of these ludicrous affairs was found to consist mostly of books (Djilas's The New Class, textbooks on economic development, etc.), but pride of place was given to an Egyptian flag!" . . .

Cozy Relations Between Doctors and Insurance Companies Drive Up Cost of Health Care

As An Alternative To Medicare Why Not Regulate Private Health Plans?

For almost a third of a century an alliance of doctors, hospital trustees and health insurance companies has blocked passage of a federal health insurance program. F.D.R. endorsed compulsory national health insurance for every American when he first sent the Social Security Bill to Congress in 1935. President Truman throughout his administration fought for a comprehensive medicare program that included doctor, dental and laboratory insurance as well as hospital care. Today, as we go to press, Congress is still debating the whittled down remains of this plan—a program of hospital and nursing home care for those 65 and over—and it seems almost certain that even this will be defeated.

Why Doctors Oppose Medicare

The opponents of medicare have more at stake than their Puritan ethics and capitalistic ideology. Private health insurange for them has been a lucrative venture. In 1959, for example, it supplied one in eight general practitioners and one in four specialists with 50% or more of their average earnings. Some hospitals, especially in industrial areas, derive as much as 70% of their income from Blue Cross alone. If this income were solely the result of an "arm's length" relationship between the vendors of medical care and the insurance carriers, one might expect it to continue under any form of insurance, public or private. Unfortunately, their relationship at best has been one of reciprocal backscratching.

In the case of Blue Cross and Blue Shield, doctors and hospitals enjoy direct control through the boards of directors of the local plans. According to Herman and Anne Somers in their classic (and conservative) study, Doctors, Patients and Health Insurance, they outnumber representatives of the general public on these boards by a 2-to-1 margin. In the case of commercial companies their influence is more subtle but just as powerful. The doctor, as the Somerses explain, is the commercial carrier's umbilical cord. His good will can bring subscribers and his assistance, as in promptly discharging patients from hospitals, can reduce benefit payments.

One consequence of this is that insurance plans are more often tailored to the interests of the vendors than the consumers of medical care. Most plans encourage hospitalization and surgery even when these may not be medically necessary. Others like Major Medical tempt doctors and hospitals to charge higher prices than they would ordinarily charge the uninsured. As a result medical prices have been spiraling upward about three times as fast as the general price index. The insurance carriers have been either unwilling or unable to regulate this price spiral. When several Blue Cross groups attempted to do so in the late 1950's, they received a sharp warning from the president of the American Hospital Association against any tendency to act as "defender of [their] subscribers against the hospital rather than as an agency for the prepayment of hospital care as it is determined to be by the hospitals and doctors." The carriers have turned instead to higher premiums, restricted enrollment and inadequate benefits.

In the absence of a federal health insurance program, federal regulation of private insurance plans is necessary. It would tend to counteract the influence of doctors and hospitals and strengthen the hand of those in the insurance companies who desire to control medical costs rather than raise premiums. Health has become too big a business to remain both unnationalized and unregulated.

New Atomic Pact Becomes Official

The Joint Committee on Atomic Energy has unanimously endorsed the new atomic information agreement with NATO and its member nations. The old dissenters like Sen. Anderson and Representatives Holifield and Price may consider the battle against nuclear dissemination already lost. Senator Aiken told us of his personal misgivings but he too chose to remain silent in the committee's report. The agreement becomes official on September 24 in the absence of a veto from both houses of Congress. The five congressmen who submitted resolutions of protest in July have decided not to carry the fight further. They say they will conserve their limited resources for an effort to defeat an MLF agreement in late winter. We hope they show greater determination then than they have now.

The Terror in McComb, P. 4

Where the FBI and the Secret Service Were Culpable in Kennedy's Assassination

"There was insufficient liaison . . . between the Secret Service and other Federal agencies. . . . Although the FBI . . . had secured considerable information about Lee Harvey Oswald, it had no official responsibility, under the Secret Service criteria existing at the time of the President's trip to Dallas, to refer to the Secret Service the information it had. The Commission concluded, however, that the FBI took an unduly restrictive view of its role. . . .

"At the time of the trip to Dallas, the Secret Service as a matter of practice did not investigate, or cause to be checked, any building along the motorcade route. . . .

"On Nov. 4 [FBI man] Hosty telephoned the Texas School Book Depository and learned that Oswald was working there. . . . Agents of the FBI in Dallas did not consider Oswald's presence in the Texas School Book Depository Building overlooking the motorcade route as a source of danger to the President and did not inform the Secret Service. . . ." —The Warren Report (at pps. 24, 438 and 443).

I. F. Stone's Weekly

VOL. XII, NO. 33 OCTOBER 5, 1964 WASHINGTON, D. C. 15 CENTS

The Left and the Warren Commission Report

All my adult life as a newspaperman I have been fighting, in defense of the Left and of a sane politics, against conspiracy theories of history, character assassination, guilt by association and demonology. Now I see elements of the Left using these same tactics in the controversy over the Kennedy assassination and the Warren Commission Report. I believe the Commission has done a first-rate job, on a level that does our country proud and is worthy of so tragic an event. I regard the case against Lee Harvey Oswald as the lone killer of the President as conclusive. By the nature of the case, absolute certainty will never be attained, and those still convinced of Oswald's innocence have a right to pursue the search for evidence which might exculpate him. But I want to suggest that this search be carried on in a sober manner and with full awareness of what is involved.

They Finally Listed Rightists

"When the special file [in the Protective Research Section of the Secret Service] was reviewed on Nov. 8 [for the President's trip], it contained the names of no persons from the entire Dallas-Ft. Worth area, notwithstanding the fact that Ambassador Stevenson had been abused by pickets in Dallas less than a month before . . . (pps. 432-3).

"Since the assassination, both the Secret Service and the FBI have recognized that the PRS files can no longer be limited largely to persons communicating actual threats to the President. On Dec. 25, 1963, the FBI circulated additional instructions to all its agents, specifying criteria for information to be furnished the Secret Service. . . . The new instructions require FBI agents to report immediately information concerning:

" 'Subversives, ultrarightists, racists and fascists (a) possessing emotional instability or irrational behavior, (b) who have made threats of bodily harm against officials . . . (c) who express or have expressed strong or violent anti-US sentiments and who have been involved in bombing. . . .' " (p. 461).

—The Warren Commission Report.

Slander, Not Controversy

It is one thing to analyze discrepancies. It is quite another to write and speak in just that hysterical and defamatory way from which the Left has suffered in the last quarter century or more of political controversy. I want to start with my dear and revered friend, Bertrand Russell. He owes it to all of us who have looked to him as a world spokesman of the peace movement, as a great philosopher and humanitarian, to speak more responsibly on this subject. It was not responsible, on the basis of a transatlantic phone call from Mark Lane, to attack the report as "a sorrily incompetent document" which "covers its authors in shame" without having first read it. This is on a par, in its febrile prejudgment, with Lord Russell's earlier statement comparing Lane's defense of Oswald with Zola's defense of Dreyfus, and declaring, "There has never been a more subversive, conspiratorial, unpatriotic or endangering course for the security of the United States and the world than the attempt by the U.S. Government to hide the murderers of its recent President." This assumes instead of proving. It is slander, not controversy.

Statements of this kind imply not just one but three conspiracies. One was a conspiracy to kill the President. The second was a conspiracy to kill Oswald lest he talk. The third is a conspiracy by the Warren Commission to hush up the facts. These are monstrous charges, and cannot honorably be made on the basis of surmise. Russell's American advisers have fed him not evidence but misstatement and poppycock. The Warren Commission was chosen to provide a bipartisan body which would command the widest public respect. Russell calls it "utterly unrepresentative of the American people." This is nonsense. The two Democrats chosen from either House of Congress, Senator Russell of Georgia and Congressman Boggs of Louisiana, are highly respected even by those who disagree with them. Lord Russell dismisses them as men "whose racist views have brought shame on the United States." What do their typical Southern prejudices have to do with their probity? Russell dismisses the two Republicans as "Senator Cooper of Kentucky and Congressman Gerald L. Ford of Michigan, the latter of whom is a leader of his local Goldwater movement and an associate of the FBI." Ford is chairman of the House Republican Conference. He is supporting his party's ticket in this election but far from being "a leader of his local Goldwater movement" he nominated Romney for President at the Republican convention in the hope of stopping Goldwater. He denies any association with the FBI and there is no evidence of any such link. John Sherman Cooper in the Senate in 1954, when every Democratic liberal Senator except Kefauver lost his nerve, made the one uncompromisingly principled speech against the Anti-Communist Act passed in that year. There never was a more dangerous year in which to stand up against hysteria. I knew John J. McCloy during the war as a public servant of unusual competence. I have criticized Allen W. Dulles constantly over the years. But I would not impute to him or any other member of the Commission conduct so evil as to conspire with the secret services to protect the killers of a President. This is also to assume that Chief Justice Warren, whom the right hates for his decisions protecting Negroes and radicals, would be a party to a conspiracy to protect a cabal of rightist assassins.

This Is Demonology

This is what I call demonology, and this is what has so often been used against the Left. Demonology is the notion that because a man disagrees with you politically, he must be impervious to honor, duty, patriotism, and mercy—in short a demon, i.e. all of one piece, black evil, and not a human being, i.e. full of contradictions. Demonology also implies that such a person is fair game for any libel or slander, since ipso facto beyond the pale of decency. This is the standard applied by the House Un-American Activities Committee and the Eastland Committee and McCarthy before them to Left-wingers. It is no less evil when applied to the right. Here is a sample from Joachim Joesten's book, "Oswald: Assassin or Fall-Guy". To provide a motive for the conspiracy he alleges, Joesten writes,

> "Cuba sticks in the craw of the CIA. The fiasco of the Bay of Pigs cost Allen Dulles his job. Moreover, once Kennedy began a policy of easing the Cold War, some of the CIA, like much of the Pentagon, would be dismantled and the agency brought under presidential control. I am sure there are men in the CIA, just as there are General Walkers in the army, who simply couldn't accept this situation and who thought of Kennedy as a traitor. And traitors are executed."

The Metal Files That Never Were

"Oswald's apartment, too, was filled with fascinating things. Besides the batches of leaflets with the legend 'Hands Off Cuba' and bearing the unauthorized imprint of the Fair Play for Cuba Committee, police found seven metal file boxes filled with names of Castro sympathizers. How did he manage, in so short a time, to compile so extensive a list?"

—Oswald and the FBI (The Nation, Jan. 27).

"Commission finding—The Dallas police inventories of Oswald's property taken from his room at 1026 North Beckley avenue do not include any file boxes. A number of small file boxes listed in the inventory as having been taken from the Paine residence in Irving contained letters, pictures, books and literature, most of which belonged to Ruth Paine, not to Oswald. No lists of names of Castro sympathizers were found among these effects."

—The Warren Commission Report, p. 666.

This is libellous in the extreme. It implies that Allen Dulles would be a party to killing Kennedy and hushing up the truth because he lost his job after the Bay of Pigs. Such charges, as sloppy as they are wild, are dishonorable and dissolve the fabric of society. They seek to destroy a man's reputation on the basis of evil surmise and guilt by association. People on the Left ought to recall the all too recent past before allowing themselves to be drawn into folly by such tactics.

The Joesten book is rubbish, and Carl Marzani—whom I defended against loose charges in the worst days of the witch hunt—ought to have had more sense of public responsibility than to publish it. Thomas G. Buchanan, another victim of witch hunt days, has gone in for similar rubbish in his book, "Who Killed Kennedy?" You couldn't convict a chicken thief on the flimsy slap-together of surmise, half-fact and whole untruth in either book. Here again elementary fairness is involved. The Joesten book implies that the rightist Texas oil millionaire H. L. Hunt was involved in the plot to kill Kennedy. Buchanan names an oilman he calls Mr. X. This imputes murder to a man whose views we dislike, and does so without evidence of any kind. Buchanan writes as if he were penning a whodunit. "I believe the murder of the

The Kind of False Rumors That Might Have Provoked Armed Action Against Cuba

"Literally dozens of allegations of a conspiratorial contact between Oswald and agents of the Cuban government have been investigated by the Commission. . . . 'D', a young Latin American secret agent approached the U.S. authorities in Mexico shortly after the assassination and declared that he saw Lee Harvey Oswald receiving $6500 to kill the President . . . 'D' and his allegations were immediately subjected to intensive investigation. His former employment as an agent for a Latin American country was confirmed, although his superiors had no knowledge of his presence in Mexico or the assignment described by 'D'. Four days after 'D' first appeared the U.S. Government was informed by the Mexican authorities that 'D' had admitted in writing that his whole narrative about Oswald was false. . . .

"The investigation of the Commission has thus produced no evidence that Oswald's trip to Mexico was in any way connected with the assassination of President Kennedy, nor has it uncovered evidence that the Cuban government had any involvement in the assassination. To the contrary, the Commission has been advised by the CIA and FBI that secret and reliable sources corroborate the statements of Senora Duran [a Mexican national employed in the visa section of the Cuban consulate in Mexico City] in all material respects and that the Cuban government had no relationship with Lee Harvey Oswald other than that described by Senora Duran. . . .

"Speculation—On Nov. 27, 1963, in a speech at the University of Havana, Fidel Castro, under the influence of liquor, said 'The first time that Oswald was in Cuba. . . .' Castro therefore had knowledge that Oswald had made surreptitious visits to Cuba.

"Commission finding—Castro's speeches are monitored directly by the U.S. Information Agency as he delivers them. A tape of this speech reveals that it did not contain the alleged slip of the tongue. Castro did refer to Oswald's visit to the 'Cuban Embassy' in Mexico. . . .

—The Warren Report, at pps. 307-9 and 659.

President," says Buchanan, "was provoked, primarily, by fear of the domestic and international consequences of the Moscow Pact: The danger of disarmament which would disrupt the industries on which the plotters depended and of an international detente which would, in their view, have threatened the eventual nationalization of their oil investments overseas." And the whole commission, from Chief Justice Warren down, and its whole staff, and the vast network of the police, the FBI, the CIA and the Secret Service all conspired to keep this secret? Not one man felt impelled by conscience to break out and tell the truth? People who believe such things belong in the booby-hatch.

Gen. Walker Also Cries Whitewash

If the FBI and the CIA were so powerful, why didn't they take advantage of the murder by a supposed Communist and Castroite to set off a wave of anti-Red hysteria, to poison our relations with Cuba and the Soviet Union? Why did they clear the Communists at home and abroad of complicity? Why did they disprove the wild stories about Oswald's links with Castro? The box at the bottom of page two gives a sample of the wild whoppers an unscrupulous secret service could have set loose. If they had so much power in the Warren Commission why didn't they hush up its damning criticism of the FBI and the Secret Service (see box on page one)? If Oswald was innocent, why did they have to kill him to shut him up? If he was killed as part of a conspiracy, why was he killed in full view of the TV cameras when he might have been bumped off in a fake ambush while being moved at night to another prison? This is an insane morass of paranoid conjecture, and those who remain in it even after the Warren report are either unscrupulous or sick. Look at the ultimate lunacy: General Walker, who regarded Kennedy as a tool of the Communists, is sure he was killed by the Reds. He attacks the Warren report as a whitewash. "There's bound to have been a plot," Gen. Walker says. On the other hand Leftists who lean to the Chinese viewpoint and regarded Kennedy in his lifetime as a warmonger and tool of the right, are now sure he must have been killed by a rightist conspiracy. How wacky can you get?

A Whopper of Neo-Nazi Origin

"The Enquirer story goes on to say that the Dallas police suspected Oswald and Ruby of being involved in an attack on General Walker, and was going to arrest the two when the FBI intervened and asked the police not to do so for 'reasons of state.' The police agreed only upon receipt of an official communication from the FBI. While the National Enquirer is not the most reliable newspaper in the world, the story bears inner marks of authenticity because the recipient of that FBI letter was, of course, Chief of Police Curry, who leaked it to reporter Henshaw."

—Joachim Joesten: Oswald: Assassin or Fall Guy? (Marzani & Munsell) 1964. Page 124.

"Commission finding—This allegation appeared in the November 29 issue of (actually printed on Nov. 25 or 26) of a German weekly newspaper, Deutsche National Zeitung and Soldaten Zeitung published in Munich [Germany's leading neo-Nazi organ—IFS]. The allegation later appeared in the National Enquirer of May 17, 1964. The Commission has been reliably informed that the statement was fabricated by an editor of the newspaper. No evidence in support of this statement has ever been advanced or uncovered. In their investigation of the attack on General Walker, the Dallas police uncovered no suspects and planned no arrests. The FBI had no knowledge that Oswald was responsible for the attack until Marina Oswald revealed the information on Dec. 3, 1963."

—The Warren Commission Report, Appendix XII: Speculations and Rumors, p. 662.

How The Warren Commission Decided Oswald Was Neither A Soviet Nor U.S. Agent

"If the Soviet agents had communicated with Oswald while he was in the Marine Corps, one of the least probable instructions they would have given him would have been to defect. If Oswald had remained a Marine radar specialist, he might at some point have reached a position of value as a secret agent. However, his defection and the disloyal statements he made publicly in connection with it eliminated the possibility that he would ever gain access to confidential information or programs of the U.S. The very fact that he defected, therefore, is itself persuasive evidence that he was not recruited as an agent prior to his defection. (p. 257). . . . Moreover persuasive evidence that Oswald's conduct was not carefully coached by Soviet agents is provided by some of his actions at the Embassy. The single statement which probably caused Oswald the most future trouble was his declaration that he had already volunteered to a Soviet official that he would, if asked, tell the Soviet Government all that he knew about his job in radar as a Marine. Certainly a statement of this type would prejudice any possibility of his being an effective pro-Communist agent. (p. 265). . . .

"Speculation—Oswald was an informant of either the FBI or the CIA. He was recruited by an agency of the U.S. Government and sent to Russia in 1959.

"Commission's finding—Mrs. Marguerite Oswald frequently expressed the opinion that her son was such an agent, but she stated before the Commission, 'I cannot prove Lee is an agent.' The directors of the CIA and of the FBI testified before the Commission that Oswald was never employed by either agency or used by either agency in any capacity. Investigation by the Commission has revealed no evidence that Oswald was ever employed by either the FBI or the CIA in any capacity.

"Speculation—Oswald told Pauline Bates, a public stenographer in Fort Worth, Tex., in June 1962 that he had become a 'secret agent' of the U.S. Government and that he was soon going back to Russia 'for Washington.'

"Commission finding—Miss Bates denied a newspaper story reporting that Oswald had told her that he was working for the U.S. Dept. of State. She stated that she had assumed incorrectly that he was working with the Dept. of State when he told her that the State Dept. had told him in 1959 that he would be on his own while in the Soviet Union.

"Speculation—The FBI tried to recruit Oswald. An FBI agent's name, telephone number and automobile license number were found among Oswald's papers.

"Commission's findings—FBI officials have testified that they had never tried to recruit Oswald to act on behalf of the FBI in any capacity. The Commission's investigation corroborates this testimony. An FBI agent, James P. Hosty, Jr., had given his name and telephone number to Mrs. Ruth Paine so that she could call and give him Oswald's address in Dallas when she learned it. Mrs. Paine and Marina Oswald have stated that Mrs. Paine gave Oswald a slip of paper with the agent's name and telephone number on it. Marina Oswald had taken down the license number of Hosty's car and given it to her husband." (p. 660).

A State Policeman Threatened a Bombing Victim With More Dynamite

What Five Negroes From McComb Told Washington About the Terror There

The White House requested an FBI investigation of Negro violence in nine northern cities. It has asked for no similar report on anti-Negro violence in the Deep South. If it had, the report might resemble a letter to Asst. Attorney General Burke Marshall from Jessie Harris, Project Director in McComb, Miss. It tells of relative quiet in McComb until mid-August. Then 12 of the 16 FBI agents there began to leave. Then, also, public attention turned away from the Mississippi Summer Project. Local COFO workers planned their first voter registration drive for Aug. 18. The terror began on Aug. 15. Twenty city, county and state police raided COFO Freedom Houses and searched the files. On Aug. 23, they began to raid Negro establishments patronized by COFO workers. The proprietors were arrested. Three COFO workers were beaten in daylight in downtown McComb. Bombings began on Aug. 29. There were 6 within 72 hours in early September. The latest ones have been accompanied by mass arrests of Negroes under a criminal syndicalism law passed early this summer. It carries a maximum penalty of 10 years in jail, and a $1,000 fine.

What the FBI Said

We had a chance last week to talk with five Negroes from McComb. Three were women whose homes had been bombed because they gave help to COFO. Mrs. Quin's home was destroyed September 20. Neighbors were reluctant to keep her two injured children while she was away in Washington. "People are so scared their eyes turn a different color," she explained. The women came at SNCC's expense to tell their story directly to the Justice Department. They could trust no local authority. The police arrested Mrs. Dillon's husband the day their house was bombed in late August. He is still in jail. A state highway patrolman waved sticks of dynamite at her and said she would be killed if she didn't stay away from COFO. The FBI agent who questioned her about the bombing asked her to take a lie detector test to prove she hadn't done it as a publicity stunt. "The FBI were sympathetic at the beginning of the summer," said Mrs. Quin, "but now they tell us they can only comply with local laws." When the women saw the President, they asked him to open an FBI office in the Negro part of town. Now the FBI stay at an inn in the white section and Negroes are afraid to go there.

Before they left for home, Mrs. Quin's 19 year-old daughter called to say it was too dangerous for them to return. McComb Police Chief George Guy reportedly told her that if they came back, "they must pack their rags and get out or be blown out." The women left anyway. "We got to go," said Mrs. Brant, "It's our home."

Must We Have Three More Martyrs?

"The situation which is developing in Pike County resembles that which developed throughout Mississippi immediately before the Summer Project, culminating in the murders of three civil rights workers in Philadelphia. . . . A newspaperman with reliable contacts in the white community has reported that there is a definite plan to "get" three of the COFO workers: Dennis Sweeney, Jesse Harris, and Mendy Samstein. The McComb police have just put on the force a local Negro bootlegger known to have served time at the state penitentiary, to have shot two persons, and to have seriously beaten at least three others. . . . At present there are only 4 FBI agents in McComb, a decrease from the peak of 16 reached during the summer. Unless responsible forces are brought to bear in McComb, what happened in Neshoba County will happen here."

—Letter from Jesse Harris, McComb Project Director, to Burke Marshall, head of Civil Rights at Justice Dept.

The other two Negroes from McComb were Mr. and Mrs. Ardis Garner. They won't be going back. Mr. Garner knows too much. He joined the McComb police force when he heard they wanted Negroes. He resigned after being asked to spy on COFO workers. (Another Negro on the force is considered so dangerous by the Negro community that 150 have signed a petition to have him removed. See box.) The Garners' house was bombed minutes after they left McComb. They fled on a bus in the middle of the night and left their belongings. (They will try to settle in San Francisco.) Garner told the Justice Dept. that McComb needs federal marshals to stand guard while Negroes try to sleep. Now, he said, they're "workin' all day and watchin' all night."

Negroes have not been the only ones to suffer. Friendly whites have been intimidated too, and there are several northern students who plan to stay through winter. All would gain if, as Rep. Ryan (D. N.Y.) suggested, the Justice Dept. convened a grand jury to investigate collusion between local police and white terrorists. McComb must learn quickly that it is still being watched. There is a rumor that it has already selected its three young victims.

Why Was This Revealing Article on Vietnam Never Published in English?

Our attention has been called to an article in the French magazine Réalités last May which has not been published in its English language edition, though of great interest to Americans. The article "Vietnam—A New Korea" was written by Edgar Ansel Mowrer, who now edits a NATO publication, Atlantic Community. This article makes some interesting revelations (1) that Brigadier Gen. Edward A. Lansdale, ret., who helped Magsaysay defeat the Huks in the Philippines, favors a joint declaration by the U.S. and South Vietnam calling for an anti-Communist revolution in North Vietnam (2) that as Diem's military adviser from 1954 to 1956 Lansdale had already organized commando raids on the North, (3) that 3,000 Vietnamese, many natives of the North, had been trained in Special Forces for further action of this kind (4) that after some tentative attempts at "counter belligerency" the Kennedy Administration, over the objections of Assistant Secretary of State W. W. Rostow, called off the operations as "too difficult and too dangerous" but that (5) a number of American military chiefs still favor them. Mowrer also says he was informed that in September, 1963, Kennedy ordered Averell Harriman to draw up a plan of neutralization for South Vietnam by stages, beginning with the elimination of Diem. In our issue of August 24 we called attention to an article in Le Monde (Aug. 7) which said U.S. training of commando units against the North began in 1957, three years before the rebellion broke out. Mowrer dates them even earlier.

When That Chinese A-Bomb Does Go Off

Secretary Rusk made a generous contribution to the 15th anniversary of the Chinese Communist regime. His prediction that the explosion of China's first nuclear device was imminent gave Peking a birthday boost almost as resounding as would have been the nuclear blast itself. The failure of Peking to reciprocate by setting off a bomb must seem poor sportsmanship to our intelligence services. They have been consistently optimistic about China's nuclear potentialities. The Rand Corporation's leading necromancer on the subject, Alice Langley Hsieh, predicted in her "Communist China's Strategy in the Nuclear Age" (1962) that China might be expected to detonate its first atom bomb in 1962-63. Our propaganda agencies have been telling us for years (1) that China was on the verge of collapse and (2) that it was also on the verge of becoming a nuclear power. The loyal American could only conclude that Mao had hit upon some do-it-yourself shortcut, like that which turned out the home-made product known in our prohibition era as bathtub gin.

Another Way to Widen The War

". . . it is difficult to understand why some prominent officials, a few weeks before a national election should be talking so openly about expanding the war, and not only advocating but almost lobbying for such a course of action. It is even possible now to hear officials of this government talking casually about how easy it would be to 'provoke an incident' in the Gulf of Tonkin that would justify an attack on North Vietnam. . . . There is, of course, always a lot of casual talk here while major policies are in dispute, but this is an odd time and an odd way to proceed on anything so important as risking a war with China."

—James Reston, New York Times, October 2.

"Taipeh, Formosa (Associated Press)—Nationalist guerrilla raids on the China mainland will be stepped up, the Mainland Recovery Planning Board announced Sunday after a two-day meeting. Vice President Chen Cheng, the board's chairman, said measures also will be taken to incite anti-Communist revolts."

—Boston Herald, Sept. 28.

Ten Years Is No Eternity

The tone of the Rusk statement was splendid in its omnicompetence. "The United States," it said, "has fully anticipated the possibility of Peiping's entry into the nuclear weapons field and has taken it into full account in determining our military posture and our own nuclear weapons program." The Manchu Court in Peking must have been as complacent about the first penetrations of the Outer Barbarians into their empire. The press was told reassuringly in backgrounder briefings that before China had a sizeable stock of bombs and the means of delivering them on distant targets, it would be at least five years and more likely ten! Ten years are a mere tick of the clock in the history of China and ten years are very little time in which to adjust American thinking to a world in which China will also be a nuclear power.

The gravest decisions are just around the corner. Will we give nuclear arms to Chiang Kai-shek to deter atomic attack from the mainland, and how will we make sure he doesn't use them to set off the war he has so long desired? Will we encourage Japan to give up its renunciation of war and manufacture atomic bombs of its own, or accept them from us? And how will we be sure that the pacific Japan of today does not respond to the possession of this new military muscle by reverting to the aggressive Japan of yesterday, thirsting to revenge itself upon us for Hiroshima? Indonesia has already received Badger planes from the Soviet Union which can carry nuclear bombs. Will we compete for Sukarno's favor by being the first to provide bombs for them? Will impoverished India be encouraged to divert more food from its hungry millions to embark on the production of nuclear arms? We are approaching one of the decisive choices of human history. Will we continue to confront the new China with hatred, and give new and more dangerous dimensions to the nuclear arms race? Or will we seek a Far Eastern settlement which would bring China back into the family of nations?

A Fresh Report from China

The average American has been led to believe that China's is a tottering regime which holds by terror alone 700 million hungry slaves. Le Monde (Sept. 18-Oct. 1) has just finished publishing a 12-part account by Robert Guillian of his first visit to China in seven years. Now, as in his past writings, Guillian has many misgivings about the regimentation and thought control in the new China. But he was impressed with the progress and self-confidence, particularly in mastering the tremendous difficulties created by the abrupt recall of Russian technicians and the ending of Soviet aid. A people which has been able to cope not only with the isolation forced on them by American power but with the body blow of the break with Moscow, is a people which feels it can overcome any obstacle. The bomb will be a symbol of their power to raise themselves by their bootstraps.

The delusions about China built up among the American people by 15 years of hateful propaganda are dangerous to our future and to world peace. McCarthyism was in large part the product of the China Lobby and a new rightist storm in our politics may some day be precipitated if leadership lacks the courage to provide saner and more humane views of China. A therapeutic and timely anthology of past misinformation has just been provided in Felix Greene's new book, "A Curtain of Ignorance" (see boxes on this page). Its most important chapter traces the way in which Chinese views have been distorted to make it appear that they would welcome nuclear war. Greene traces this back to a New York Times dispatch (June 16, 1958) which reported, "without mentioning names or places, Marshal Tito said the Chinese liked to boast that their population of 600,000,000 was a guarantee of victory in war. According to President Tito, Peiping calculated that 'if 300,000,000 were killed there would still remain 300,000,000 Chinese!' ". This was amplified and embroidered to the point where five years later a newspaper commentator was reporting that "Mao is said to have remarked in Moscow" that even if a third world war came and half the people of the world were killed, half of those who survived would be Chinese and they would rule the world. Scholarship has kept pace with journalism. One scholar cited by Greene quoted from Mao's writing to prove moral indifference to war but omitted a key sentence. In it Mao called war "this monster of mutual slaughter" and predicted its final elimination "through the progress of human society, and in no distant future." That is quite an omission. Not one American in a million knows that Mao expressed such a hope.

"What is happening in China is that the Soviet Union is detaching the northern provinces of China from China and is attaching them to the Soviet Union."

—Secretary of State Dean Acheson to the National Press Club, Jan. 12, 1950.

"We can tell our friends in China that the U.S. will not acquiesce in the degradation which is being forced upon them. We do not recognize the authorities in Peiping for what they pretend to be. The Peiping regime may be a colonial Russian government—a Slavonic Manchukuo on a larger scale. It is not the government of China. . . . It is not Chinese."

—Dean Rusk, then Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs, May 18, 1951.

"[Walter S.] Robertson [Ass't Secy of State for Far Eastern Affairs 1953-59] had made no secret of his conviction that Mao Tse-tung was a passing phenomenon and Chiang Kai-shek remained China's 'real' symbol. Indeed in 1957 the affable Assistant Secretary assured me at a Washington party: 'Mao has no more real influence than the first taxi driver who goes by outside'."

—Felix Greene in his new book, "A Curtain of Ignorance" (Doubleday: $5.50) from which these quotations are taken. We recommend the book as a corrective to the poisonous nonsense on China in our press.

Will LBJ As President Reject the Oil-Gas Lobby He Served As Majority Leader?

Proxmire Warns of Another Assault on Federal Regulation of Natural Gas

The oil and gas lobby is preparing its third assault on federal regulation of natural gas producers. This will be a test of President Johnson. As Senate leader, he engineered the two previous de-regulation bills through Congress. Truman vetoed the first and Eisenhower reluctantly vetoed the second when former Sen. Case disclosed a $2,500 offer for his vote. "Unfortunately," said Sen. Proxmire in a Senate speech (Sept. 25) that warned of the coming assault, "there is some doubt that similar bills would be vetoed at this time." A veto would be in striking contrast to the Democratic Platform which boasts that the spiral of natural gas prices in the 50's "has been halted by vigorous regulatory action" and "the Nation's 36 million consumers have benefited from rate reductions and refunds."

The Producers and the Pipe-Lines

FPC Chairman Swidler recently explained the need for federal regulation of gas producers. In a speech before the Independent Natural Gas Association, he spoke of "the dominating bargaining position of a handful of producers who control our major gas reserves." Although there are over 6,000 producers who sell interstate, the 23 largest accounted for 60% of total (interstate) pipeline purchases in 1962. These giant companies are also the nation's major oil companies. They are under no compulsion to sell natural gas because they have little funded debt and a very profitable oil business to sustain them. The pipeline companies, on the other hand, are under considerable compulsion to buy. They have large funded debts and billions of dollars invested in fixed facilities, which become wasting assets if gas is not kept flowing. Furthermore, the pipelines are tied to relatively limited producing areas and cannot move to other sources of supply. "Under these circumstances," said Swidler, "if producers were freed from regulation they could sit on their reserves until in desperation the pipelines met their terms."

What LBJ Said in 1956

"If the Senate sits supinely by and lets the Supreme Court write the laws of the nation, I warn Senators that if the Supreme Court can do it with respect to gas, it can do it also with respect to other commodities. If the Senate by inaction or by defeating the pending [Harris-Fulbright] bill, lets the Supreme Court say to the Texas farmer or to the Louisiana farmer or to the Texas Oil Co. or the Louisiana Oil Co., 'This is going to be the heyday of the price-fixers' and that the control contingent has come back to the Capital of the Nation, I warn every Senator that what applies to gas may apply to oil—they come out of the same hole, and that what applies to oil can apply to coal. If it can apply to coal, it can apply to butter and to autos and to everything that is produced. If we wish to follow our free enterprise system, we can say, 'We the Senate can entrust to reasonable men the duty of setting reasonable prices'."

—LBJ, in the Senate, Jan. 18, 1956.

The renewed attack on producer regulation comes when the FPC is about to abandon the idea of holding separate rate cases for each of the many thousands of gas producers. Instead it will fix a single price for an entire geographic area. Four area cases now underway will dispose of the rates for 75% of the gas flowing in interstate commerce. One danger with area rates is that they may bring windfall profits to the large companies whose costs tend to be below average while depriving the small high-cost firms of a fair return. As an alternative, the Supreme Court has suggested that the Commission regulate only the large producers.

If either system is adopted, it will provide the first effective regulation of producers since passage of the Natural Gas Act in 1938. Until 1954 the Commission interpreted the Act to apply only to pipeline companies. In that year the Supreme Court reversed an FPC ruling and held that producer prices must also be regulated. (Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Wisconsin, 342 U.S. 672.) The Eisenhower-appointed Commission recommended legislative relief from the Court's decision in annual reports from 1955 through 1960.

The Kennedy Commissioners may never get a chance to complete their work. There are already two vacancies on the five-man Commission. When he fills these, Johnson will have put his stamp on the majority. As Vice President, he influenced the choice of Commissioner Lawrence O'Connor, probably the only Texas oil executive to sit on the FPC.

How Public Utilities Conceal Aid To The Radical Right As Charity

"The nation's electric light and power industry is noted for its generous philanthropy. Not so well known, however, is the fact that many IOU's* give financial and leadership support to a host of reactionary, rightwing propaganda groups. I have just made a far-from-complete survey of this situation, which disclosed more than 200 instances of private power contributions to such groups.

"The great majority [of contributions]—84%—are for less than $500 each. Small donations are more easily concealed from regulatory agencies. Although FPC regulations require all IOU's to file an annual report of contributions and other expenditures, the Commission has not required itemization of donations under $1,000, and in many cases companies have been allowed to file reports in which nothing is itemized. The Commission originally proposed requiring that all donations in excess of $100 be itemized. The IOU's, however, objected and, as a result, the Commission backed off.

"In 1962, the private power industry's unitemized lump-sum (donations) totaled more than $15 million. Detroit Edison—the grand champion—reported $815,006 in unidentified lump-sum expenditures last year. I was able to obtain breakdowns of such expenditures from only 57 of the Nation's 220 private power companies. This is where I found most of the recent rightwing contributions—concealed in lump-sum expenditures labeled 'charitable contributions' and 'miscellaneous expenses.' The vast majority of (this) is included in the companies' operating expenses, so that the consumers—the public—wind up footing the bill.

"I think the American people have a right to know when their local power company supports group which for three decades have plastered the labels of 'socialism' and 'communism' on every legislative effort to ease pain and suffering, hunger and want, injustice and inhumanity."

—Sen. Metcalf (D. Mont.), in Cong. Rec., Sept. 25 (abr.).

Footnote on Medicare's Defeat: U.S. Spending Relatively Less on Welfare Than in 1936

The Arms and Oil Lobbies Won Victories in The Rush to Adjourn Congress

The Civil Rights Act and the Equal Employment Opportunities Act—historic as is the achievement they represent—are only part of the story of the 88th Congress. A Senate speech by Clark (D. Pa.) in the closing hours helped to place these more spectacular accomplishments in perspective. "In terms of investment in our nation's wealth—roads, urban renewal, resource development, education and welfare," said Clark, "the United States stands at the bottom among the industrialized countries of the West." He pointed out that in the early 1960's we actually spent less annually (relative to GNP) on our domestic welfare than we did in 1936. This makes more damning Congress' failure to pass medicare and the Appalachian Development Program. The one compensation is that liberals will now have a chance to re-work these proposals, which are themselves so inadequate.

Private Sales of Arms

In the rush of adjournment, some unfortunate changes in major legislation went unnoticed. The arms and oil lobbies got the foreign aid conference committee to strike two salutary amendments. One, by Sen. Ellender, would have forbidden a new government program underwriting private sales of military equipment to foreign governments. The Defense Department justifies the guarantees as a way to cut down on public grants of military aid. To us they seem a way of increasing military aid behind the public's back. The other amendment, by Sen. Proxmire, would have put an end to a $35 million a year handout from AID to seven major international oil companies. The agency has been purchasing $100 million of oil annually at prices somewhere between 20% and 40% higher than the world market. The amendment required competitive bidding on all future purchases. Another indication of the power of oil may be seen in the restoration of aid to Indonesia. "The reason for the continuation," explained Sen. Morse, "is the investments of American oil companies there. We are constantly lulled with the theory that we have to preempt all the oil fields in the world to keep them from falling into Communist hands," he continued. "What we are really trying to do is extend our control over as much of the supply as possible in order to maintain an artificially high price for oil on the world market."

Unnoticed Contradiction

Rep. Jack WESTLAND (R. Wash.): I should like to talk about this matter of control of nuclear weapons. In reading many newspaper articles, you would think that the matter of giving any control or more say to NATO had never been discussed, that the President was always going to have the final, ultimate say on whether or not nuclear weapons were ever going to be used. If this is the case, then why has this administration so persistently urged this multilateral force, which would consist of members of NATO countries, Germans, Italians, Greeks, and Turks, all in the same ship with nuclear weapons, with Polaris weapons? Why would they persist in having this sort of NATO force if it is not to give NATO allies more control?

Rep. Craig HOSMER (R. Cal.): A great schizophrenia exists here between the MLF approach pursued by the administration on the international front and the zealous harboring of nuclear control which it pursues on the campaign trail.

—In the House, Sept. 22 (abr.).

The Supplemental Appropriation Bill also contained disappointments. The House Appropriations Committee removed from it $1.9 million for a Public Health Service research and education campaign on the hazards of cigarette smoking. The Senate Committee might have restored the funds, but Health, Education and Welfare never filed the necessary petition. This is typical of the Department's timidity with big business, whether drugs or tobacco. It illustrates why the regulation of cigarette labeling should go to the Federal Trade Commission and not to HEW, as some tobacco-state Congressmen have been suggesting. Also missing from the Appropriation bill were funds for a $50 million rehabilitation loan program authorized in the Housing Act. The low-interest loans were to provide owners of deteriorating homes and businesses with an alternative to relocation, which often creates more slums. Apparently the real estate interests thought that rehabilitated dwellings would mar the beauty of their high-rise luxury apartments.

Why I Would Not Vote for Bobby Kennedy

The New York Senatorial race has been a dull show because there is little difference between Keating and Kennedy. A decade ago both belonged to the fervently witch-hunting sector of the political spectrum. With the change in atmosphere, both have moved toward the moderate center in domestic affairs. In foreign policy, they are about equally belligerent, notably on Cuba, where Keating was stirring up a missile crisis before there was evidence that the missiles had arrived. Both are for civil rights but both reacted the same way at the point where Negro aspiration clashed with white backlash, i.e. on the school busing issue. There they both begged the question by saying they were against long-distance busing, something the New York City Board of Education had not proposed.

The Best Argument for Keating

From the standpoint of justice for the Negro, Keating offers one advantage over Kennedy. Keating is one of those Republicans, like the liberal Lindsay, who gave the Negro leverage to obtain a stronger Civil Rights Act than the Kennedys desired or thought it politic to ask. The Kennedy Administration originally wanted no new civil rights legislation at all. When a House Judiciary subcommittee drafted a strong measure, the Attorney General tried to water it down. He did not want stronger powers to enforce 14th Amendment rights and he was at best lukewarm about a Fair Employment Practices Commission. Liberal Republicans made it possible to win from the House and put through the Senate a strong Civil Rights Act this year. It was this which led Clarence Mitchell of the NAACP to come out for Keating in the Afro-American (Sept. 8). Though he praised Kennedy's record, too, Mitchell said Keating was "one of the men who must help to save the Republican Party from becoming a haven for advocates of white supremacy and racial discord."

The best argument for Kennedy is one that is put forward quietly in Washington, quietly that is in the hope that it won't be overheard by Lyndon Johnson. It is that Kennedy in the Senate would provide an alternative center of power and opposition when an expected landslide gives LBJ a mandate so sweeping there will be little check on his power. But there are any number of Democratic Senators whose liberalism has been demonstrated over the years, and who will naturally move into opposition on many issues. Any one of them would be a more dependable focus of opposition than Bobby Kennedy. A vote for Kennedy is not just a vote for a U.S. Senator. He acts as if the country owes him the White House. Two years ago his authorized biography (by Thompson and Myers) already urged the country after 1968 "to forget their fears of dynasty and stake their hopes on Robert Francis Kennedy."

The U.S. and the Cairo Parley

The Cairo conference of the non-aligned nations has been played in the U.S. press as a defeat for Communist China. It is true that the "peaceful co-existence" group won out over those who followed the Peking line. But look more closely at the two main recommendations affecting the U.S. One called for peaceful coexistence between the U.S. and Cuba. The other called for the resumption of the Geneva Conference to end the Vietnamese war by negotiation. The U.S. is opposed to both. Cuba has been asking for months to negotiate differences with the U.S.; it is we who have been rejecting them. China, for all its fierce rhetoric, has been supporting Ho Chi-minh of North Vietnam and Sihanouk of Cambodia in asking for peace talks in Vietnam. It is we who say no.

The AP (Baltimore Sun, Oct. 12) said the conference had rejected "Peking's violent approach to international life." Insofar as Cuba and Vietnam is concerned, this is also ours. The conference, in asking us to lift our economic blockade of Cuba, declared that "foreign pressure and intervention to impose changes in the political, economic and social system," of another country are contrary to "the principles of international law and peaceful coexistence." This is embodied in both the UN and in the OAS Charters; we have subscribed to both but conform to neither in our relations with Cuba, which we hope to treat as we did Guatemala. The "revolutionary" powers do not say they are against peaceful co-existence. They say the U.S. will not permit it. Cuba is their best argument, and if we persist it is we who will bring the defeat of the moderates.

As Attorney General, Bobby Kennedy gathered an able team around him and set a standard in refreshing contrast to the low cast of characters which had run the place since Francis Biddle's day. Except for Wm. Rogers, who made an honorable record in Ike's final years, there had never been a more depressing succession of Attorneys General; the worst was Keating's campaign manager, Herbert Brownell, who abused the office shamefully in his "twenty years of treason" campaign against the Democrats. But in anti-trust, Kennedy's record was not as good as that made under Eisenhower. Where FDR and Truman made monopoly a major concern, both Kennedys were anxious to prove themselves not hostile to big business. Bobby emphasized action against price-fixing —the easiest and politically safest aspect of anti-trust.

Kennedy's record is most disturbing on civil liberties. In one of his speeches (Nov. 12, 1962) on a favorite subject, counter-guerrilla operations, the Attorney General told a story of a brave young American prisoner of war in Korea who was asked by his Chinese captors what he thought of Gen. Marshall and insisted on terming him a great man

The GOP's Involvement in the Billie Sol Estes Case—Freedom in Danger in Poland

Supreme Court Agrees to Hear Test of U.S. Iron Curtain Around Cuba

Last June the Supreme Court ruled in the Aptheker case (378 U.S. 500) that an individual's freedom to travel could not be restricted because of his political beliefs or associations. The ruling, however, fell short of guaranteeing absolutely the freedom to travel. It left open the question of whether the government may prohibit travel to specific geographic areas. The Court last week agreed to hear a case (Zemel v the Secretary of State) in which this is the central issue. Louis Zemel applied twice in 1962 for a passport for travel to Cuba and each time was refused. A three-judge U.S. District Court split 2 to 1 against his plea for validation. Circuit Judge Smith declared in his dissent that "the present statutes [the Passport Act of 1926 and section 215 of the Immigration and Nationality Act] do not authorize area restrictions on travel and that the Executive cannot restrict the right to travel without specific statutory authority." The Supreme Court might go further, as it has been asked to do and declare area restrictions on the right to travel a violation of the Firts Amendment.

The GOP and The Estes Case

The Republicans can no longer claim a monopoly on virtue in this election. The House Government Operations report on Billie Sol Estes reveals that there were no less than four abortive investigations of Estes under the Eisenhower Administrations. One in 1953 showed that grain storage facilities which Estes built with government loans were being used to house Mexican workers (braceros) and were structurally incapable of holding grain. Another in 1958 found that Estes by fraudulent claims was planting about ten times more cotton than he was entitled to plant under the cotton allotment program. Most suspicious is the fact that James McConnell, an Assistant Secretary of Agriculture from 1955 to '56, served as a consultant to Secretary Benson on grain storage matters at the same time he was a director of Commercial Solvents Corporation (from 1957 to 1959). Commercial Solvents had a direct interest in Estes' grain storage contracts with the government because he had assigned his revenues from the contracts to the company.

Protest Few Heard on MLF

"The indications are that we are rushing headlong into a new military arrangement of doubtful strategic value and with severe political drawbacks. Originally we were told that MLF would be a genuine NATO operation which would strengthen that key alliance. But now it appears that virtually every NATO country—with the sole exception of West Germany—wants none of it. Yet nevertheless some zealots in the State Department keep pushing ahead toward a treaty which almost no one in the Congress or the country knows anything about, and which will make it even harder for our negotiators in Geneva to get the Soviet Union to agree to an all-important pact prohibiting the dissemination of nuclear weapons to nations that do not now have them.

"If we are to believe the newspaper reports, this new German-American joint nuclear venture may be accomplished fact by the time Congress comes back in January. It seems to me that the State Department owes it to the Congress and the American people to slow this thing down and let us see what it is we are getting into. The MLF idea has been kicking around for years. Surely a proposal of such great military and political importance can wait a few more months until the Congress can take a good, hard look at it."

Freedom in Poland

Everyone who has been to Poland (as I have) and has been impressed with its intellectual freedom will deplore the arrest of writer, Melchior Wankowic, two days after he participated in a meeting between Polish authors and the Polish government. Last March Wankowic was one of 34 Polish writers who signed a manifesto charging censorship. This leaked abroad. The very fact that such a protest—impossible in any other Soviet state including Yugoslavia—could have occurred reflected credit on Poland. Yet he now faces three years in jail under a law making it a crime to "harm the interests of the State" or "lower the prestige" of the State's authorities. Such laws would at once be attacked as barbarous in the "bourgeois West." In 1919 Lenin boasted that freedom of the press had ceased "to be a hypocrisy, because the printing presses and the paper are taken away from the bourgeoisie." They have since been taken away, too, from the best minds of the proletariat and the intelligentsia. Marx and Engels never dreamed that socialism would bring censorship, and Poland since Golmulka has been the bright spot in a slow dawn of freedom within the Soviet zone. We hope the Wankowic prosecution will be abandoned.

Little Noticed Measure May Provide Focal Point for Liberal Push in Next Congress

Clark Submits Economic Planning Bill for Full Employment

Since the debate over the Employment Act of 1946, few men in Congress have seriously tackled the problem of full employment. On one of the last days of the 88th Congress (Oct. 1), Sen. Clark (D., Pa.) introduced legislation that promises to do so. It is the culmination of several months of hearings in his Labor Subcommittee on Employment and Manpower. We criticized that committee's initial report because it failed to speak out boldly for economic planning. The Clark bill makes no such evasion. Where President Johnson has offered a grab-bag approach to poverty, the Clark bill provides for a coordinated, frontal assault. Senators Morse and Nelson have already joined Clark as co-sponsors, and in the not unlikely event of a Democratic landslide in November, the bill should become the center for a left opposition to the Administration.

Where Europe Is Ahead of Us

"Employment policy has not meant the same thing in Western Europe and the United States in recent years. The employment goal has been set high in Europe and the success in achieving the goal has been impressive. Unemployment in the United States has not been below 5 percent since 1957. Contrast this with [the fact] that not a single [major] European country had an unemployment rate as high as 4 percent in 1961 or 1962. Only Italy has experienced unemployment in excess of 4 percent since 1955. In the last half-dozen years or so, France, West Germany, the Netherlands, Sweden, and the United Kingdom have regularly been operating at unemployment rates well below 3 percent and usually below 2 percent."

—"Full Employment As A Policy Goal," by Prof. R. A. Gordon, economist at U. of Calif., Berkeley (abr.).

Where They Left Off in 1945

It attempts what Senator Murray's Full Employment Bill of 1945 failed to achieve. That bill was emasculated by a series of legislative compromises. "Full" was taken from its title and "federal responsibility for full employment" was taken from the body. Most important, the planning mechanism, a National Employment and Production Budget, was eliminated. In its place was substituted the innocuous annual Economic Report of the President. Today we are burdened with those compromises. We face not only the problem of converting an arms race economy to a peace economy but of doing it with millions already unemployed or underemployed. The retreats which defeated the aims of the Murray Bill must be erased.

The heart of the Clark bill is the requirement that the President submit to Congress at the beginning of each year a National Production and Employment Budget and a Full Employment Federal Budget. The first would identify the gap between where the economy is and where it must be in order to achieve full employment. The second would require short and long-range proposals needed to close that gap. Together they would establish federal responsibility for full employment and would permit no obfuscation of the amount of effort needed to achieve it. Any deviation from that goal in favor of price stability or balance of payments' equilibrium would have to be justified in the Budget. Congress would be required to debate the Budget as a whole and by doing so would become an institution for determining economic policy rather than a meeting place for petty accountants. Not least important, the bill would define full employment as a level of unemployment no greater than 3% after 1968 and no greater than 4% until then. This would reverse the current practice of adjusting the definition to the state of the economy.

Federal planning and an expansion of the public sector of our economy are long overdue. Even enlightened businessmen are beginning to doubt that private capital can cure our economic ills (see box below). Clark told the Senate that planning has virtually eliminated the business cycle in Europe and reduced unemployment in many countries to less than 2% (see box above). Here it is put officially at 5½% but the Clark committee report estimated it to be as high as 9% when one includes the underemployed and those who stopped looking for work. This is a travesty and in large part it is the result of our military expenditures. "Throughout the Cold War," said Clark, "we have been deceived into believing that because the Federal Budget has been large, it has been pumping life into our economy."

Clark Quotes A Banker's Speech on the Need for Lower Rates of Profit

"What seems to be happening is that in an evolutionary way scientific processes, not just automation, are bringing the American economy to a point where smaller amounts of capital are producing larger outputs of consumables. In order that a relatively free market economy may adjust to this structural change, consumption expenditures as compared with saving must grow proportionally larger. In the absence of a steady stream of exciting new products, there is little chance of this just happening when needed. For a time, perhaps, the excessiveness of saving is disguised, as funds chase each other in the stock market and find outlet overseas. But if consumer spending stay at the same percentage of income, saving remains redundant and business activity is sluggish. . . .

"Unfortunately, it is particularly difficult for businessmen to see this problem in true perspective. First, they can scarcely admit to themselves the need for ever-larger Government spending and conversely smaller inputs of capital. Instead, they ask for larger profits, greater permissible allowances for depreciation reserves. . . .

"Formerly, high profits were needed to lure cash from current consumption into necessary investment in productive facilities. Now more current consumption is in order. Formerly, high profits seemed only just compensation for the tremendous risks undertaken. . . . Now depressions are 'against the law' and even recessions do not always check yearly advances in GNP. . . . Formerly, corporations did not generate as much of their investment funds internally. They had to show good profits to get needed money for expansion. Now huge depreciation allowances permit corporations to generate their own funds. It is clear to sophisticated businessmen that profits up to former standards are inappropriate at this time. . . ."

—John R. Bunting, vice president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia, "What's Ahead for Business?", in Atlantic Monthly for June, 1964 and Cong Rec., Oct. 1.

Bobby Kennedy's Biggest Blindspot Is Civil Liberties

though each time he was knocked down for saying so. Bobby did not add, of course, that while this POW was being beaten, he went to work for McCarthy though McCarthy had just trampled Marshall on the Senate floor, calling him an officer whose decisions invariably served "the world policy of the Kremlin." Kennedy did not quit McCarthy until he picked Bobby's rival Roy Cohn, as general counsel. As recently as four years ago, in his book, The Enemy Within, Bobby's only criticism of McCarthy was that he didn't do enough research and relied too much on Cohn and Schine! As chief counsel of the McClellan rackets committee, though Bobby helped clean a lot of hoodlums and corrupt dictators out of the labor movement, he acted much as had McCarthy, equating invocation of the Fifth amendment with confession of guilt and treating a Congressional investigation as a pillory in which people he disliked could be held up to public scorn.

A Lost Opportunity

Bobby would like this record to be forgotten, but as Attorney General he lost his chance to dispel the misgiving it arouses. The prosecutions of Roy Cohn and Hoffa were carried out in the spirit of personal vendettas. His sweeping anti-crime legislation evoked opposition from the American Civil Liberties Union. He supported a House Un-American Activities Committee bill which would have authorized hearings without confrontation or cross-examination in the industrial security program. He supported the bill to overturn that part of the 1956 Supreme Court decision in the Yates case which narrowly interpreted the word "organize" in the Smith Act. The most conspicuous evidence of how little he had learned since the McCarthy days was his sponsorship of wire-tap legislation. The New Republic (Sept. 19) in endorsing Kennedy for Senator said he had had a change of heart and that his new bill would forbid the FBI to tap wires without court order and allow the Attorney General on his own to authorize wiretapping "only when the national security is patently involved." The editors had better look again. The FBI could be authorized by the Attorney General to tap wires without court order in a wide variety of so-called national security cases, including suspicion of "seditious conspiracy" and subversive activities. The McCarthy period and the FBI's record shows how loosely these categories can be interpreted and how easily they can be abused. Bobby quoted Jefferson's "eternal hostility against every form of tyranny over the mind of man" as the frontispiece to The Enemy Within. The record hardly indicates irresistible Jeffersonian impulses.

Equally grave are the fears Bobby stirs in the field of foreign policy. Anti-guerrilla activity has been one of his enthusiasms and he was among the planners of the Vietnamese adventure, now so dangerously near collapse into a wider war. He is reputed to have opposed more extreme measures in the Cuban missile crisis but there is no evidence that he would favor a more thoughtful and humane policy toward Cuba or Communist China. To start him on the road to the Presidency without knowing where he stands on these possibly life and death matters is a gamble I would not take.

Improving the Kennedy "Image"

An example of "improving one's image" turns up in Robert F. Kennedy's newly published book, "The Pursuit of Justice." He relates that in 1938 his father was appointed Ambassador to England "and there we saw the approaching war. . . . We went to Germany. The sight then of Nazism and storm troopers will never allow any of us to forget the price of dissolution and tyranny. Our eldest brother, Joe, was in Spain during part of the Civil War. . . ." The impression is of a family stirred by the dangers of Fascism. With all due respect to the memory of a man who died as a flier in World War II, Joe, Jr., did not visit Spain until three months after Franco won* a victory to which his father contributed. Hugh Thomas in his recent history of the Spanish Civil War recalls that an angry cable of protest from Ambassador Kennedy was instrumental in persuading FDR not to lift the Spanish arms embargo after Secretary Hull had agreed with Senator Nye to recommend it. Thus ended the last hope of saving the Spanish Republic. As late as the spring of 1941 the elder Kennedy was for appeasement, warning that, "We cannot divert the tides of mighty revolution now sweeping Asia and Europe." Bobby was 12 in 1938 and cannot be blamed for what happened then. It is the distortion of the record which is objectionable.

Just Another Item on The Moral Issue in This Presidential Campaign

"In the meantime it was learned that Mr. Goldwater felt a light-hearted tolerance about a political embarrassment of his own. This was the charge that John Grenier, executive director of the Republican National Committee, had paid $1,000 to a Democratic Party employee to steal confidential messages and information.

"The source said that Mr. Goldwater said that, frankly, he thought the culprit was the one who would take the money, that it was not a case of Mr. Grenier's being guilty but the other fellow.

"Mr. Goldwater, who picked Mr. Grenier for the No. 2 post at the national committee, has not spoken with him about the bribe charge, the source said. The source said that Mr. Goldwater would not have paid such a bribe himself—because he thought it would have been possible to get the wanted intelligence on the Democratic Party for nothing."

In Which We Nominate Nikita for the Nobel Peace Prize

Before Khrushchev passes from the stage, he more than any man on earth deserves the Nobel peace prize. It should not be forgotten that in the world's first nuclear confrontation, it was Nikita Sergeyevitch Khrushchev who did what so very few leaders have been willing to do in comparable situations, and that is to risk his power by climbing down for the sake of peace. The other day Robert F. Kennedy told a gathering of nuns that his brother decided against a direct air strike on Cuba's missile bases because this might have cost 25,000 lives; this was put forward as an example of humanity. But the escalation President Kennedy invited in insisting on the Russian backdown and withdrawal, risked easily 25,000,000 lives. If Khrushchev had not given in, if the mushroom clouds had begun to rise around our planet, would the survivors have thought Kennedy justified in destroying so many human lives rather than negotiating peacefully? Or even accepting on this side of the world the kind of bristling nuclear bases with which we had surrounded Russia on the other? To accept the Russian missiles in Cuba might have cost Kennedy his political future. To have accepted the U.S. ultimatum might have cost Khrushchev his. It was Khrushchev who paid the price for peace.

The Clue to K's Removal

On the other hand, the Cuban missile affair demonstrated that streak of impulsiveness which may hold the clue to Khrushchev's removal. Those missiles, an all too easy target in the event of war, would not have made a decisive difference in the horrible arithmetic of Soviet-American deterrence. It was not worth the cost in undermining relations between Moscow and Washington; it was rash and ill-considered, as light-headed in its way as Khrushchev's sudden call for troika leadership of the United Nations. In this perspective, it is easy to see that younger men, though devoted to the same general principles, might easily decide that Khrushchev's leadership had become a menace and a liability. But before he goes, one ought also to remember his other historic contributions, especially the 20th Congress "secret speech" forever destroying the mythology of Stalinism, and his signature of the limited nuclear test ban on American terms. It was this which cleared the skies of fallout, at the price of accepting U.S. superiority and U.S. continuation of underground testing. We—let us speak honestly—gave nothing. On the contrary Khrushchev's fall may be linked to our continued "tough" policy: 36 announced underground tests since the treaty was signed, the campaign for an MLF force with a German finger on the nuclear trigger, and our new moves to expel Russia from the UN unless it pays up assessments which the French, too, oppose as contrary to the UN charter. These are hardly contributions to peace nor advertisements for Khrushchev's policy of "peaceful co-existence."

SANE Words on That Chinese Bomb

"Keeping a doctrinaire and nuclear-armed country in a state of semi-isolation endangers world security. We urge immediate efforts by the U.S., Great Britain, the USSR and the 105 other signers of the nuclear test ban treaty to bring China and France to accept its provisions, and to extend the treaty to underground tests as well. In addition the U.S. should press for China's inclusion in disarmament negotiations. China would begin to take part in the world community. China and the U.S., now limited to occasional contacts through their ambassadors in Warsaw, would have an additional channel of communication. Additional steps by the U.S. which in time would encourage moderation by the Chinese leaders: 1. Negotiate the exchange of journalists. 2. Exchange of scientists and scholars between China and the U.S. 3. Removal of restrictions on trade in non-strategic goods. 4. Offer of surplus food for sale in case of agricultural shortages in China. 5. Encouragement to non-governmental organizations to sponsor informal meetings with their Chinese counterparts."

—Dr. Benj. Spock, co-chairman of SANE, Oct. 16 (abr.)

One hopes for the sake of the Soviet peoples and world stability that the new leadership will move toward a more civilized and constitutional method for change. They got rid of Khrushchev, as he got rid of Malenkov and later of the "anti-party" group, in palace intrigue fashion. Neither the people nor even the party are told the real issues; the other side is never allowed to explain its case; in the placid streets the people go about their business, politically inert, as if theirs

Kennedy Interview on Meet the Press Shows Need to Challenge Him on Foreign Policy

Bobby Cites Vietnamese War As No. 1 Benefit of Federal Spending

We were struck by a recurrent phrase which cropped up in Robert F. Kennedy's appearance last Sunday on Meet the Press. At one point in explaining his qualifications for the Senatorship, Mr. Kennedy said he had been involved in matters which "intimately affect the State of New York, whether it be the question of survival [our italics] or whether it be domestic matters." At another point, when asked about his ultimate objective, he said "I think first and most important is the question of survival."

Survival, Not Peace?

The phrasing is curious. He did not say the question of peace but of survival. A related glimpse into his thinking was provided when he was asked about his loss of temper with a young man heckling him about Federal spending. "I explained," Mr. Kennedy said, "the great things that were being done by the Federal government and by others for him. There were people who were fighting in Vietnam, there were people who were fighting, standing on the wall of Berlin, there were those who had been ready to invade Cuba. . . ."

Mr. Kennedy put the Vietnamese war, the Berlin wall and the readiness to invade Cuba first on his list of the benefits that young man derived from Federal spending. This was the answer of a man taken up with war, hot and cold. I would guess that when Mr. Kennedy talks about the "question of survival" he means finding a way to win that war, and that he thinks of it as an unlimited struggle, in which one is prepared, as in the missile crisis, to stake everything on the outcome.

In trying to establish his experience in foreign policy, Mr. Kennedy did not mention any of the peaceful accomplishments of his brother's administration, such as the test ban. He cited his service as chairman of a "Committee on Guerrilla Warfare." This was a new disclosure, but no one asked him how he thought we were doing against guerrilla warfare in Vietnam. It is a pity there is no pro-peace candidate in the field to press him on this and on that "question of survival." Of all the blank spaces in the inane New York campaign, this one is the most disturbing.

Bobby Disapproved of McCarthy?

Mr. [Edwin] Newman (NBC News): In short you disapproved of Senator McCarthy's conduct, did you?

Mr. Robert F. Kennedy: Yes, in the operation of the committee. —On Meet the Press, Oct. 18.

"Robert Kennedy remembers that when he met Joe McCarthy for the first time at the University [of Virginia], 'I liked him almost immediately.' The feeling was mutual and it was one that did not change. . . ."

—Robert F. Kennedy: The Brother Within, a biography by Thompson and Myers, published in 1962, boosting Bobby for President in 1968.

". . . not only was Bobby a legal counsel to Senator Joseph R. McCarthy's committee, but he would have remained quite happily on the subcommittee if he had not run afoul of another young-man-on-the-make, Roy Cohn. As it is, Joe McCarthy was a close personal friend and his loyalty to Joe's memory continues.

"Lately, Bobby has spent a good deal of time promoting the movie of The Enemy Within. He decided he wanted Paul Newman to play the part of himself as counsel to the McClellan committee. Newman declined. Bobby asked to meet him face to face. . . . The conversation was amiable until Bobby asked Newman what he was doing next. Newman said that he hoped to narrate a documentary about the late Senator McCarthy.

"Bobby snapped: 'You shouldn't allow your name to be associated with that.' Newman said: Why not? . . . Besides he [Newman] didn't like McCarthy. . . . Bobby exploded: Newman wasn't qualified to judge. He knew nothing about McCarthy. Newman said that he had followed McCarthy's career at the time; he had also read Richard Rovere's book on the subject. 'Well, Rovere didn't know anything about it either,' said Bobby."

—Gore Vidal in Esquire, March 1963.

What Kennedy Has Discreetly Forgotten About His Work on the McCarthy Committee

Mr. Newman: Mr. Kennedy, you were at one time connected with a Senate committee when Senator Joseph McCarthy of Wisconsin was on it, chairman of it, and that conceivably will cost you some votes in November. What precisely was your connection with that committee and how did it come about?

Mr. Kennedy: . . . I worked for Mr. [Francis] Flanagan [the ex-FBI man then general counsel to the McCarthy committee]. I was not involved in any of the so-called Communist investigations during that period of time. I was involved in matters such as the fact that the government purchased some palm oil and put it in tanks. . . . Momentous matters such as that.

—On Meet the Press, Oct. 18.

". . . as Robert Kennedy recalls, McCarthy during December 1952 and January 1953, painted an impressive picture of the future he had in mind for the committee. . . . 'I felt the investigation of communism was an important domestic issue,' he (Kennedy) says. . . . His biggest job in that period was an investigation of East-West trade, that produced some startling results, including angry denunciations of young Kennedy by the British. . . . Investigator Kennedy said . . . that in the first three months of 1953, while the Korean war was still flaming, 'an absolute minimum of' 162 Western vessels, 100 of which were British, did business with Red China. Then he added the real shocker: Two ships owned by the British firm of Wheelock-Marden had transported Chinese Communist troops. . . . McCarthy said: 'It seems unbelievable, unheard of . . . that a nation would have ships owned by its nationals transporting the troops to kill its own soldiers."

—Robert F. Kennedy, by Thompson and Myers (1962).

These charges by Kennedy turned out to be a typical McCarthyite mish-mash. There were two ships involved. One was the Perico, owned by Wallem & Co. of Hong Kong. "The company said" (Facts on File, 178N, 1953) "the Perico's captain took 462 unarmed, allegedly sick Reds and about 12 armed guards from Kwangchowan to Canton June 22, 1951, because he was warned that 'somebody would be shot' if he refused. The other ship was the Miramar, owned by Wheelock-Marden under Panamanian registry. It came under Chinese Communist control in August 1951 and was used to transport troops to Shanghai in June 1952. The British Ambassador in Washington warned against using "such isolated and doubtful cases to cast aspersions" on British loyalty in the Korean war.

Goldwater's Finance Chairman Comes From One of The Nation's Largest Arms Contractors

Billionaire Families of DuPont and Mellon Are Quietly Backing Barry

American business has not deserted the Republican Party's leading exponent of free enterprise so completely as is generally assumed. Billionaire families like the Du Ponts and the Mellons, for example, are conspicuously absent from the ranks of Johnson supporters. Although they aren't publicly endorsing Goldwater either, they have been helping him quietly. Lamont DuPont Copeland, president of E. I. DuPont deNemours, and Pierre DuPont, its vice-president, were co-hosts at a Goldwater luncheon for businessmen this fall. The Mellons have been more subtle. They have been contributing to Goldwater through closely held corporations like Gulf Oil and Consolidated Coal. Gulf has given a fortune to right wing organizations which in turn support Goldwater (see box at right). It has also urged its employees to make campaign contributions. (N. Y. Times, Sept. 12). Consolidated Coal's vice-chairman, R. Livingston Ireland, appeared in the "Businessmen for Goldwater" ad in the Wall Street Journal (Oct. 1). So did Bennett Chapple Jr., a vice-president of U.S. Steel, also a Mellon-dominated enterprise. Another Mellon ploy is to offer support through the Scaife side of the family. (R. K. Mellon's daughter Sarah married a Scaife.) Human Events reported last fall that Raymond Scaife, R. K.'s nephew, was lining up behind Goldwater.

Big Business and the Radical Right

"A total of 113 industrial, mercantile, and banking firms, and twenty-five electric and gas companies have been identified as having contributed in the last few years to organizations of the American Right Wing. . . . Broadly speaking, oil, steel, and heavy machinery producers, and manufacturers of motors and motor controls, tend to predominate. . . . So do chemical and textile companies. The names of electric, gas, and power companies in various sections of the country appear as contributors with noticeable frequency.

"Harding College and the National Education Program located on its campus have received corporate contributions that total hundreds of thousands of dollars over the years. The Republic and United States Steel corporations, as well as Gulf and Humble Oil companies were among the major corporate contributors." —Forster and Epstein, Danger on the Right

The Weapons Makers and the Utilities

The weapons merchants and the electric utilities have also been careful not to endorse Goldwater publicly. (With one or two exceptions they have not endorsed Johnson either.) This is understandable since one depends on government contracts and the other on government regulation. But Ralph Cordiner, recently retired chairman of General Electric, is chief fund-raiser for Goldwater. GE gets most of the subcontracts for electrical work on armaments and makes more profit from armament than any other U.S. firm (over $100 million annually). Another major Goldwater supporter with ties into the Pentagon and big business is the American Security Council (see box below). The clearest public expression of electric utility support for Goldwater has come from a trade journal, Electrical World. It commented shortly after the Republican convention (Aug. 10) that "present restraints on the investor-owned electric utility industry would be relaxed in the wake of November Republican victory." Besides their contributions to right-wing groups, which have been voluminous, the utilities are supporting Goldwater quietly by means of retainer fees. These are paid to a large number of lawyers, advertising agencies and engineering firms with the understanding that a substantial portion of the fee must go to a designated candidate or political organization. The utilities then write off the fees as operating expense.

Also backing Goldwater are several insurance companies who don't like social security and don't want medicare. The Hazard (Kentucky) Coal Operators Assn., is pro-Goldwater; both oppose the Appalachian Development Program. But the big monopolies support him for a larger reason. A good Goldwater showing in November would shift the whole spectrum of American politics further to the right and away from any tendency toward "socialist" planning. This is also why corporations supply a large part of the $25 million which is poured annually into crackpot groups on the far right. These zanies now appear weekly on over 7000 separate radio and TV programs.

"Businessmen For Goldwater" Draws Support From Industrial Witch-Hunters

McCarthyism may be out of fashion for the moment in government, but it is very much alive in industry. It flourishes there in the American Security Council, a rapidly growing tax-exempt corporation which operates a loyalty-security blacklist for employers. Its files, according to a Group Research special report, now contain the names of over 1,000,000 "subversives," and its annual operating budget is around a quarter of a million dollars. It was founded in 1955 by an ex-FBI agent and now has several more on its staff. Also on the staff is Karl Baarslag, a research director for McCarthy's Government Operations Committee and later a consultant for HUAC. Its field director is Cleon Skousen, who as Chief of Police in Salt Lake City was even too much for Mayor J. Bracken Lee, himself an ardent right-winger. In 1960 Lee fired Skousen as "an incipient Hitler."

Some of the most prominent members of "Businessmen for Goldwater" are also active in the Security Council. One Goldwater vice-chairman, Patrick Frawley (Chairman of Schick Safety Razor) is a major fund-raiser for the Council. Another Goldwater vice-chairman, Bennet Archambault (chairman of Stewart-Warner) is on the Council's Senior Advisory Board. Other Goldwater businessmen on the Advisory Board are Robert Gavin (President of Motorola), General R. E. Wood (Director of Sears Roebuck), Wayne Johnston (President of Illinois Central Railroad), and F. K. Weyerhauser, (Chairman of Weyerhauser Co.).

Even without a like-minded spirit in the White House, the Security Council enjoys considerable influence. Representatives from U.S. Steel and General Electric are its vice-presidents. Many retired military officers are on its staff. When Secretary McNamara in 1962 appointed a citizens advisory committee to look into Senator Fulbright's complaint about military sponsorship of seminars on communism, one of the appointments was Frank Barnett, although he was himself a member of the Security Council and had been singled out by Fulbright as an organizer of the seminars!

The U.S. Still Does Not See the No. 1 Item on the Planetary Agenda

but to do and die. "The worst thing," Togliatti wrote in his testament only a few weeks before, "is first to give an impression that everything is always fine and then suddenly to be forced to talk about difficult situations and to explain them." Moscow lacks a mechanism for legitimacy; the murky and incestuous smoke-filled rooms of the Central Committee are a poor substitute. The Czars at least had primogeniture as a guide to the succession. Now there is only covert whispering in the corridors. Equally bad is the habit of building up the leader as a hero one day and a monster or fool the next; this must develop a quiet contempt for the party leadership among the thoughtful in the Soviet Union. The mechanical feat of catapulting some more tonnage into space is no recompense for this barbarously bureaucratic conduct, which is then labelled—as it was by Brezhnev in his welcoming speech to the astronauts last Monday—as "socialist democracy"! A hundred years after the abolition of serfdom, the Russian people still are given no say in the decisions of government.

What We Do Abroad Shapes Our Society at Home

All this should not blind us complacently to the epochal changes taking place. Russian predominance in space and the explosion of the first Chinese nuclear bomb punctuate the end of an epoch. The American Century is drawing to a close; it lasted barely two decades. We must adjust for a time, not far distant, in which two other great Powers match us in brute power and soon after that in affluence. We can adjust wisely, setting an example in civilization or foolishly, and perhaps stumble into disaster. Even if major war is avoided, how we act abroad will shape the character of our society at home. The heritage of order and liberty we enjoy can easily be destroyed if we react by building more missiles. The problems of the near future are twofold. One is the delicate "three body problem" which physicists and astronomers have never solved: how to estimate the mutual adjustment between two great powers is difficult enough; among three, it is almost insoluble. The other is rapidly to bring China into the family of nations before the nuclear djinn is wholly out of control and every sizeable nation has the power of precipitating holocaust.

In the face of such momentous problems, the President's recent speeches on foreign policy are feeble and inadequate. Nothing better demonstrates the slow drift of our politics from reality than the general agreement, shared even by Miller with Humphrey, that we ought to invite China to sign the nuclear test ban—but without granting recognition! When we see how the whole world is shaken by a bomb in China, a succession in Moscow, or the possibility of an irresponsible like Goldwater entering the White House, we see how obsolete are the divisions among nations. All mankind has an urgent interest, and should have some voice, in these no longer distant decisions. The No. 1 item on the planetary agenda is now some federal form of world government or ultimately world catastrophe.

How The Vietnamese Feel About Our War

"It was the first light of gray dawn as our armored cavalry swung off the highway and into the flooded paddies. This was a police action. A manhunt. The villages of Phu Le and Tung Cai, secure behind the water that cut them off from Dong Ha and Quang Tri, were to be searched for draft dodgers and deserters. Able-bodied males between 21 and 25, who could not explain their status, would be hauled in for questioning.

"Recently, in this sector, 400 draft notices were mailed out. Seven less-than-able bodied young men, confident they'd be rejected, reported. South of here, in the Delta, whole communities turned on the military when it tried to round up draft dodgers. They surrounded planes and prevented their taking off. At one village they started a riot during which many draft dodgers escaped. Phu Le's draft dodgers had had ample warning. Only five bewildered youths were collared. Under guard they stared straight ahead. The parents of one showed up. The mother was outraged. Later there were tears and entreaties. The boy cried, too. He didn't want to be a soldier."

And Now—The Last Straw?—We Learn That Saigon Refuses to Bomb Hospitals

"Saigon, South Vietnam, Oct. 22 (Reuters)—Communist guerrilla forces in South Vietnam have developed an efficient and well-equipped medical service to care for their rising battle casualties, according to a new intelligence estimate. Evidence shows that the Vietcong are well supplied with modern drugs, including anti-biotics, and their facilities include large base hospitals and medical training centers.

"Government forces say they know the exact sites of several of the hospitals. Some U.S. officials are mystified at Saigon's apparent reluctance to take military action to put these hospitals out of operation. They say this would provide a major psychological setback to Communist troops risking danger in combat.

"Much of the drugs and other supplies the Communists use is of Western manufacture, some of it imported into South Vietnam under U.S. aid programs."

Whom The Gods Would Destroy, They First Render Smug

Secretary McNamara's press conference Oct. 22 on the Chinese bomb was a mixture of insight and smugness. On the one hand he recognized that "nuclear spread" is one of "the greatest dangers facing the world today." It was so, he said, because "nuclear technology is advancing so rapidly that the cost of building a minimum nuclear capability, whether measured in terms of capital expenditure, human skills or the time required to achieve that capability, is decreasing dramatically." These sobering words deserve the closest attention. On the other hand, he exhibited a dangerous complacency about the Chinese bomb. He said we had enough nuclear capacity to survive a surprise attack and still "assure the simultaneous destruction" of Russia and China. He added that he saw no reason to revise our strategic plans "because the Communist Chinese cannot for many years obtain the capability to inflict nuclear damage on this country or on our allies."

China's Neighbors Already In Danger

Such talk creates a false sense of security and is an obstacle to the fresh rethinking of our China policy which the bomb makes urgent. It may indeed take a decade before China has the capability to inflict damage directly upon the United States. But it is not at all certain that she cannot even now make a nuclear attack on American allies around her borders. "Poor as is China's bombing fleet by Western standards," the respected military commentator Mark Watson wrote in the Baltimore Sun (Oct. 17), "it is adequate for a fairly long haul, and nobody can be more fully aware of that than the nearby nations of Asia."

When Barry Told The Truth About Himself

"Mr. Goldwater is a Presidential candidate by inadvertence. Until a late date he spoke of himself and thought of himself as an improbable Republican selection, and he gave reasons. As recently as January of this year he said in Phoenix, 'I've never done anything to get the nomination and yet all of a sudden everyone wants to thrust it on me and, doggone it, I'm not even sure that I've got the brains to be President of the United States.' It was an engaging self-evaluation, and unlike many things Mr. Goldwater says off the top of the head it had the ring of verity."

—The Sun (Baltimore) endorsing LBJ Oct. 25.

Secretary McNamara said the Chinese bomb was "a crude device" too heavy to be delivered by available Chinese aircraft. Dr. Ralph Lapp, the nuclear physicist who worked on our A-bomb during the war, told UPI that our first bomb was also crude and heavy and delivered over Hiroshima by another "crude device," the now obsolete B-29. Dr. Lapp told us that Secretary McNamara's estimate that the Chinese bomb weighed 9,000 pounds was surmise. "We have no way of knowing," Dr. Lapp said. The U.S. was surprised to find from examination of the radioactive debris that the Chinese bomb was set off by a trigger more sophisticated than we expected and that it was made not of plutonium, like the first Russian, British and French bombs, but from enriched uranium, U-235. This requires greater industrial proficiency than we thought the Chinese had. Dr. Lapp said it was nonsense for the President to say that it was a national tragedy for China to have gone the enriched uranium route because of its heavier cost. The possession of facilities for making enriched uranium of its own will provide enriched material for its reactor complex, and a greater total output of power as well as bomb-stuff. Similar surprises are possible in terms of the bomb's weight and China's delivery capacity. But that is not the real point. The point is that fear of a Chinese bomb will make India and Japan think the time has come for them to make A-bombs, too.

The President has offered a pledge of protection to any nation threatened by nuclear attack from China. The Pentagon has let it be known that we placed a squadron of 15 B-52 heavy jet nuclear bombers on Guam last spring, only 1,000 miles from Communist China, the first time that the long-range B-52s have been stationed overseas. But these moves will not solve the problem, which is political not military. If China had been recognized ten years ago, if it had been admitted to the United Nations, if it had been included in the nuclear test ban negotiations, it might have felt secure enough not to embark on this vast nuclear enterprise. China's A-bomb is its answer to American hostility. If this hostility continues, if China is still excluded from the councils of mankind, if we keep it in outlawry, it may in ten years time have not only atomic but thermonuclear bombs and the means to deliver them. India and Japan, looking forward to that possible time, will ask themselves as does Western Europe today: Can we count on America coming to our defense if that means a suicidal exchange which could cripple the United States? Will the Americans risk Detroit or New York to save Tokyo or Bombay? Would we not be safer with weapons, air-fleets and missiles of our own? Thus the instability of the Far East, which our policies have perpetuated, leads straight to a nuclear diffusion which is dangerous to ourselves and the world. This is what our leaders should be telling us.

Only An Agreement With Peking Could Stop Nuclear Spread in Asia

What If Moscow Sets Up A Pacific MLF?

The emergence of the Chinese as a nuclear nation has already changed all the earlier equations of power politics. McNamara's self-assurance is based on the conviction that China will remain isolated. But what if the Russians were to make their peace with Peking and counter the creation of an MLF in Western Europe with an MLF of their own in the Far East? An MLF of 25 Polaris armed surface ships will not change the atomic stalemate between Russia and America. But a joint Russo-Chinese fleet of ships or planes, armed with nuclear weapons, would change the strategic situation in the Pacific overnight. It would provide a nuclear umbrella under which China could wage non-nuclear war on the ground in Southeast Asia, or even attempt a non-nuclear attack on Formosa. Or what if the Russians, angered by the sight of nuclear weapons within reach of their enemies, the Germans, were to give Peking supersonic planes or missiles, and aid in speeding up its achievement of thermonuclear weapons? Dr. Lapp estimates that with Russian aid China could have the H-bomb in two years. If China were suddenly given even a limited city-killing capacity to retaliate for any nuclear attack from America, we would face the same stalemate in the Far East as in Europe. We would be unable to threaten the nuclear escalation of the Vietnamese war without putting our own cities in danger. We would have to use ground troops at a disadvantage of distance and numbers. A prolonged Asian war, diverting American power to the Pacific, would weaken Western Europe and Western Germany vis a vis the Soviet Union. The Russians might feel about a war between China and the U.S. as some Americans felt before Pearl Harbor about the Nazi attack on the Soviet Union—a chance to let two rivals bleed themselves to death.

It is foolish that the State Department dismisses all this as light-headedly as does the Pentagon. It is tragic that only one American of any prominence, Alfred M. Landon, the GOP candidiate for President in 1936, should have spoken out for consideration of Peking's Oct. 16 proposal for a nuclear summit conference. Mr. Landon thought this proposal should be treated "with cordiality and caution rather than with coldness and negativity." Only one paper in the East, the Baltimore Sun Oct. 22 even mentioned the speech. It went almost unnoticed until Secretary General U Thant at a press conference later that day welcomed Mr. Landon's idea of a "dialogue" among the 5 nuclear powers. Unless we act quickly, the Chinese bomb will set off a chain reaction in India and Japan whose consequences we will live to regret.

That's All We Need Now— A Chiang Kai-shek A-Bomb

"Last week's convulsive events left a deeper mark on Americans than it did on two neighbors next door to Red China and the Soviet Union. Both Formosa and Poland took the nearby shocks calmly, their Ambassadors said last night.

"Ambassador Tsiang reported his people were 'more prepared' for the Communist China A-bomb than the Western World and had been told through its papers to expect it.

"Furthermore, he said, nuclear research on Formosa continues at full speed and has a reassuring effect on the people."

—Society Page Column, "Diplomatically Speaking" in the Washington Star, Oct. 21.

The Speech in Which Pres. Johnson Offered Hope of Restrained Policy in the Far East

"Some of our people—Mr. Nixon, Mr. Rockefeller, Mr. Scranton and Mr. Goldwater—have all, at some time or another, suggested the possible wisdom of going north in Vietnam. Well, now, before you start attacking someone and you launch a big offensive, you better give some consideration to how you are going to protect what you have. And when a Brigadier General can walk down the street of Saigon as they did the other day, and take over the police station, the radio station, and the government without firing a shot, I don't know how much offensive we are prepared to launch. As far as I am concerned, I want to be very cautious and careful, and use it only as a last resort, when I start dropping bombs that are likely to involve American boys in war in Asia with 700 million Chinese. . . .

"When we retaliated in the Tonkin Gulf, we dropped bombs where they had their PT boats housed, and we dropped them within 35 miles of the Chinese border. I don't know what you would think if they started dropping them 35 miles from your border, but I think that is something you have to take into consideration. So we are not going north and we are not going south. . . . We think that losing 190 lives in the period that we have been out there is bad, but it is not like 190,000 that we might lose the first month if we escalated that war. . . .

"The second illusion I want to talk to you about is the illusion that the U.S. can demand resolution of all the world's problems and mash a button and get the job done. . . . I do not think that our future is going to be a simple one. . . . I expect victory. We are going to have victory. But it is not going to be a swift victory. It is not going to be the victory of arms, and it is not going to be the victory of the grave. . . .As the threat of war fades, that victory, I want to warn you, is going to take great strength and going to take patience. It will take men willing to deal with the real events of a real world and not trapped by the dangerous illusions of fantasy."

D. C. Sanitation Department Cleaning Out Leftists As Well As Trash

A New Police State Practice Comes to Light in Washington

A little known police state practice has recently come to light here and may be the subject of congressional investigation in January. It's a trash cover. Like wiretapping, electronic eavesdropping, and mail covers, it is used by government officials to pry into the private lives and political activities of citizens. In this case the government's agent is the local garbageman. On orders from above he puts the trash of designated individuals into special bundles which are then turned over for inspection.

A Lawyer's Waste-Basket

The trash cover first came to public attention when the wife of a prominent Washington lawyer reported to the National Capital Area Civil Liberties Union that her trash was receiving special treatment. Local press stories treated the complaint as an isolated incident, but the NCACLU told us they have received two more complaints, one from a local Black Muslim leader. A letter which we were permitted to see tells an even more disturbing story. The author, who must remain unidentified, has close connections with the D.C. Sanitation Dept. He wrote, "The practice is very widespread in all sections of the city. It is estimated that every truck has at least one 'special' a week and some have one or more a day." This, he noted, was considerably less than during the McCarthy period. "One oldtimer says that during the period right after the Korean war, and during it, the practice was so prevalent in Georgetown that it seemed like every time a truck went to the incinerator, it had 2 or 3 specials. Since a truck makes an average of 7 loads [a day], and there are maybe 7 trucks coming into the Georgetown incinerator, that is an impressive estimate."

Just who is ordering the trash cover and why remains unclear. In a phone conversation with the above source it was suggested that the D.C. police may have requested some in order to track down narcotics and numbers rings. Others appear more directly related to political activity and may be the work of the FBI or perhaps of a D.C. "Red Squad." The letter just quoted says "foreigners are the most frequent targets" in one area. The lawyer whose wife first complained of a trash cover has represented Communists and has been active in civil liberties work.

Unfortunately, the NCACLU has dropped the case and considers it closed. It says it has been assured by an independent source that the practice has been discontinued. Maybe so, but no city or federal official has said so on the record. The cover could be continued again at any time and may be going on now in other cities. For this reason we were pleased to learn that Congressman Gallagher (D. N.J.) may conduct an investigation when Congress convenes. He was recently appointed chairman of a new special subcommittee of House Government Operations Committee. Its task is to look into the investigating practices of federal agencies, including the FBI. Gallagher has already written D.C. Commissioner Duke to find out "what federal agency requested that garbage be segregated."

Trash covers are dirty business in more than one sense. They seem to be a relatively recent refinement in snooping. We can find no mention of them in Corpus Juris Secundum or Wigmore's On Evidence, but they bring to mind counsel's noble plea in that English court case in 1765 which inspired the drafters of our Fourth Amendment prohibition against unreasonable searches and seizures (Entick v. Carrington, 19 Howell's State Trials 1029). "What?" asked counsel, "has a secretary of state a right to see all a man's private letters of correspondence, family concerns, trade and business? This would be monstrous indeed; if it were lawful, no man could endure to live in this country."

Historian Makes Startling Disclosure

Founding Fathers Never Cleared!

To the Editor:

It was startling to read in your Oct. 16 editorial on the Jenkins case the dogmatic assertion that "every Government official should have a security check."

Studies by the Fund for the Republic and the Cornell Civil Liberties project provide persuasive arguments that, over the years, the program of security checks and clearances has done more harm than good to the public service. In any event, it is relevant to recall that there was no security check on the men who wrote the Declaration of Independence, and no security check on the men who drafted the Constitution of the United States and that we somehow managed from 1789 to 1947 without a program of security checks.

Have standards of public service really been so much higher since 1947 than they were in the preceding 160 years? Henry Steel Commager

The FBI's Latest Report Offers Its Usual Comfort to Southern Racists

The FBI's 1964 annual report (released Oct. 19) devotes one chapter to the domestic communist menace but only one-third of a page to civil rights. The agency's anti-communist activity is entitled "Protecting Democracy". Civil rights is buried in a section on "Combating Crime." There we are told that all civil rights cases receive "impartial treatment." Southern sheriffs may see a fraternal wink in that phrase. The report makes no mention of white terrorist organizations and indicates no FBI effort to infiltrate these as it does the Communist and liberal organizations. There is no reference to the bombings that have destroyed dozens of Negro churches and homes nor any indication of FBI activity under the federal anti-bombing law.

The sins of commission are even more damning. The Southern racist is comforted. He is told that Communists worked unremittingly to increase their influence in the racial struggle" and "waged a constant effort to exploit civil rights." Is this not the South's own propaganda? The report feeds the delusions of the radical right. It says the Party "stepped up its activity on all domestic fronts," was encouraged by the signing of the test-ban, and is aided by talk of withdrawal from Vietnam. The picture of a mailed fist stamped CPUSA and surrounded by tags marked "peace", "women", "youth", "civil rights and liberties" is used to illustrate communist front activities. If President Johnson desires to end racism and bring a new sobriety to foreign affairs, he might begin with the FBI which still equates co-existence with subversion.

Eastland Praised Bobby's Nomination as Attorney General

That Judge Cox, Eastland's College Chum, Was Kennedy's First Appointment

It is a pity the Keating-Kennedy campaign was so flaccid. The clash between Federal Judge W. Harold Cox of Mississippi and the Department of Justice was a chance for Keating to hit hard at Kennedy's civil rights record. More important he could have put the spotlight on the way the Kennedy Administration named so many racists to the Federal bench in the South. Cox was the first Kennedy appointment, one of six racists named to the District Courts and two racists to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals in the deep South.

Ike Named The Liberals

The Fifth Circuit is one of the most liberal in the country because it is largely filled with Eisenhower appointees. As a Republican he could ignore the wishes of Democratic Southern Senators. So can a Democratic President if he chooses. FDR turned down a Bilbo nominee in the 40's. The wave of terror in the South against Negroes and civil rights workers is encouraged by the presence of racist judges on the bench. Judicial candidates are investigated thoroughly, but no one seems to investigate their attitude toward Negroes.

Cox told a New York Times reporter (March 8), "I'm not interested in whether the registrar is going to give a registration test to a bunch of niggers on a voter drive." The clash between him and the Justice Department arises from a two-year campaign on his part to use the perjury laws against Negro civil rights leaders, seizing on immaterial discrepancies in voter registration testimony. Such prosecutions would add another element of terror against Negro voting.

The need for impartial judges has been vividly demonstrated in recent days. Convicted bombers go free while civil rights leaders are subjected to wholesale arrests. The current issue of Ramparts, a new militantly progressive Catholic monthly published in Menlo Park, Cal., carries an "eye-witness" story by Louis E. Lomax on how Chaney, Schwerner and Goodman were murdered in Mississippi. Part of the terrible story is how the martyred three were shadowed by the police in their fatal trip to Neshoba County. The police broadcast every move over a short wave band used by the KKK.

Bobby's Reluctance on Civil Rights

"In January of 1963, the Mississippi Advisory Committee of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights suddenly woke up to the sobering fact that, as far as Negroes' rights were concerned, Washington had been dragging its feet for generations . . . the Committee stated that wide-spread police brutality was the most urgent civil rights problem in the state. When confronted with unmistakable evidence of both official and unofficial violence, Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy consistently maintained that the Justice Department did not have power to do any more in Mississippi than it was doing—which was very little. . . . On June 24, 1964, Robert Kennedy told an outraged NAACP delegation that the situation in Mississippi was 'a local matter for law enforcement' and that the Federal authority in that state was 'very limited.' He was immediately contradicted by 29 of the country's foremost law professors."

--Wm. M. Kunstler in Ramparts Magazine.

This has a direct bearing on a suit brought by Wm. M. Kunstler on behalf of COFO under an 1866 statute long neglected by the Justice Department (see box this page) for an injunction barring state, county and local officials, the Klan and other racist organizations from violence against rights workers. That suit has to be argued before this same Judge Cox!

Judge Cox, the first Kennedy appointment ("I'm very proud of the judges that have been appointed," Bobby told the New York Times April 27) was Senator Eastland's close friend and college chum. At the hearing on Kennedy's appointment as Attorney General, Keating tried unsuccessfully to get a commitment from him for stronger civil rights legislation. Eastland and the other three Southerners on the committee passed Kennedy without a question. Eastland moved the nomination in the Senate calling him "qualified in every respect." Kennedy's authorized biographers in The Brother Within explain that this is because most Southern Senators are "realistic and philosophical individuals."

What the German Generals Dream About The Next War, P. 3

The Worse The War in Vietnam The Finer The Double-Talk in Washington

"The Administration took the Bienhoa attack as an occasion to issue new warnings to North Vietnam and Communist China. It cautioned them against believing that after the election the U.S. would alter its Asian policies and move toward disengagement from the Vietnam war. Officials also insisted that while the new episode was important because of the losses suffered, it should not be taken as proof that the overall situation in Vietnam was deteriorating. In fact, high officials were adamant in maintaining that the Administration was greatly encouraged by the formation of a civilian government in Saigon last week and that it hoped that the stabilization of the political situation would be reflected in better conduct of the war effort." —From Washington in the New York Times Nov. 2.

"One year after the overthrow of the Diem regime, the war with the Communist guerrillas has reached a stage more desperate for South Vietnam than ever. The deterioration is both military and political, and it has touched all aspects of the life of a weary people."

"Officials indicated that as few as nine guerrillas, using captured American ammunition, had been able to damage in varying degrees jet aircraft with a replacement cost of $25 million."

—From the wrecked air base, same paper, same day.

An Election to Make Us Proud of Our Country

The election returns make me proud of my country. The United States voted overwhelmingly for racial justice, for patience in foreign policy and for continuation of the welfare state. The landslide for Johnson was a landslide for a sane nuclear policy. The white backlash against the Negro proved to be a myth. In the East at least there were Polish and Italian neighborhoods which turned in bigger majorities for Johnson than they had for Kennedy; except in the South, racism fared far more poorly here than it did in the recent British elections. Coming on the heels of the strongest Civil Rights bill in our history, and in the wake of a Negro upsurge which threatened white supremacy in the skilled trades and the lily-white housing areas of the North, the vote showed plainly that conscience was stronger than interest in the white majority. The American ideal of the equality of man demonstrated its power. If we look about the world objectively, recalling the bloody recent clashes between so-called colored races in places like Singapore, noting that tribalism and racism afflict the human race all around the globe, the election results in America should hearten good men everywhere, and give our Negro fellow Americans a healing moment of surprise and pleasure. The result was achieved without demeaning compromise; Johnson picked as running mate the Senator most clearly identified with justice for the Negro, and he himself did not pull his punches on the racial issue even in his native South. On no issue was there a clearer verdict in this election, and we are grateful to Lyndon Johnson for it.

An Unremarked Bit of Progress

A remarkable incident occurred—and went unremarked—in the closing days of the campaign. We refer to the President's warning to the steel companies not to raise prices, and Goldwater's failure to make an issue of this. Here were two candidates who have tried to outdo each other in devotion to free enterprise. Here we had the President, without statutory authority, deliberately interfering in the free market because he thought a steel price rise would be unwarranted and unwise, unwarranted because steel profits rose about 25% in the first 9 months of this year, unwise because it might set off an inflationary spiral. Such tinkering with natural law should infuriate every faithful follower of Adam Smith or Milton Freedman. The stock market dropped sharply Oct. 28 when the White House warning appeared on the ticker. This seemed to prove everything Goldwater had been saying about the Democrats. It was Presidential dictatorship, an act of economic planning, in short socialism, if not down right C-------m. But Goldwater was silent. Block of Inland Steel protested, "Prices should be determined by the free play of the market." Barry did not echo his cry. Neither did the other steel magnates. On the contrary they accepted the President's ukase (only in Russian, as you see, could one find the right word for it). There will be no general steel price increase. Creeping socialism has crept a long way when a country which talks as much about free enterprise as ours does, takes it for granted that the White House has a right to block a steel price rise, agrees that the rise would be bad for business and acquiesces in this unmistakable form of government economic planning. Obviously, without realizing it, we are face to face with a new consensus. "Free enterprise" seems to have lost the election.

A New Dawn in The South

In the South itself, which Goldwater had hoped to carry solidly, the old order has been shattered. The one party system has been broken, and though the Republicans tried to be more lily-white than the Democrats, their emergence in Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia and South Carolina must bring both parties around to seeking the Negro's good graces for he will hold the balance of power. The unprecedented heavy turnout of Negro voters in every Southern State except Mississippi, where they were barred by a murderous terror and blatant trickery, is a foretaste of the future. The victory of the liberal Yarborough in Texas, the defeat of the rightist Republican, Bruce Alger in Dallas, the reelection of the cou-

No Civilian Government, If Free, Will Continue An Unpopular War

The Next Big Surprise in Vietnam May Be A Call for Peace

We suggest that the peace movement call for a cease-fire in South Vietnam, and the holding of free elections by secret ballot under international non-aligned auspices. The daring attack on our biggest airfield just 12 miles outside Saigon indicates how little control we have managed to achieve over that unhappy country in three years of "advising" its military. Major Gen. Max S. Johnson, Ret., until recently head of the U.S. Army War College, just back from Saigon, writes in the Nov. 9 issue of U.S. News & World Report that our military there are now talking of "a 12 to 20-year war." We have no right to impose this on the Vietnamese against their will.

Very soon we shall have to decide whether to go on with the first steps toward civilian government taken in Saigon, or move back to a military dictatorship. Since every attempt at military dictatorship has failed, this time we will have to be the dictators. This means a large American expeditionary force to occupy and police the country. It is true that the new civilians talk of total war against Communism. But there are indications that all this is only for our benefit. Dennis Bloodworth reported to the London Observer (Nov. 1) from Saigon that the Americans face "a conspiracy of peace" which may soon pose "an even more acute problem" than the war against the Vietcong.

What The New Head of State Seeks

A free choice, if allowed, will lead to peace. Bloodworth cabled his paper that intimates of Phan Kac Suu, South Vietnam's new Head of State, "claim discreetly that behind this democratic demand for early elections to a new National Assembly lies one outstanding purpose: To arm the future Government with a popular mandate so it can negotiate peace with the Communists without its authority being challenged."

It is time to bring home to Americans the full cruelty of the war we have been supporting. "If I were a peasant," an American military adviser in Vietnam told the Associated Press in a dispatch we saw only in the Baltimore Sun Oct. 25, "I don't think I would be exactly overjoyed every time the usual government unit moves into my area on an operation. The regular soldiers have had no special indoctrination on the need to win friends and influence people. So they rob peasants blind, they force them into labor detachments, they burn down houses and raise hell generally—and act more like an invasion force than citizens of the same nation." These are the "liberators" on our payroll.

A former U.S. military adviser to Diem, from 1955 to 1960, Lieut. Gen. Samuel T. Williams, Ret., was interviewed in the Nov. 9 issue of U.S. News & World Report on why we're losing the war in Vietnam. It's not very impressive but the truth breaks through at two points. Gen. Williams recognizes that we may face a crisis when a civilian government asks us to get out so it can make peace. He also protests the indiscriminate bombing and napalming of villages "because every non-Communist in such a village is going to be a darned good Communist by the time you get through." This is one reason why the longer the war goes on, the stronger the guerrillas become.

"How can we explain to a mother when her child is burned by napalm?" Father Hoa asked in Manila recently (N.Y. Times, Sept. 1) when this famous anti-Communist Vietnamese priest was given the Magsaysay award. "And how can we expect a young man to fight for us when his aged father was killed by artillery fire? Indeed how can we claim to be with the people when we burn their homes simply because those houses happen to be in the Vietcong-controlled territory?" This is what lies on the conscience of America.

It Happened to the French, Too

"In addition to the environmental limitations, there was the enemy; an enemy who did not possess a single aircraft but who over the years had acquired a great deal of proficiency in anti-aircraft gunnery and in destroying parked aircraft and airbase installations in daring commando raids. The latter finally reached strategic importance during the battle of Dien Bien Phu, when a Viet Minh commando infiltrated the largest French airbase in North Viet-Nam, Cat-Bi, by crawling for more than a mile through the sewers.

"Cat-Bi, situated near the coastal city of Haiphong, was heavily fortified, surrounded by electrified barbed wire and mine-fields and watched even by infra-red devices, in addition to crack troops and watch dogs. By an incredible act of raw courage and stamina, the Viet-Minh raiders (who would have helplessly drowned in the sewers had there been even light rain that night) emerged directly in the aircraft parking area and attached explosive charges to eighteen of the transport planes virtually needed to supply the French garrison in a faraway fortress."

—Bernard B. Fall: Street Without Joy, pps. 262-3, a new edition with much new material bringing up to date the story of the Indochinese wars (Stackpole: $7.95) especially recommended for its compilation in a new chapter of the falsely optimistic reports issued by U.S. authorities in 1963-4.

All Deliberate Speed—Or How to Get Where You Don't Want to Go in 1,000 Years

Ten years after the Supreme Court's desegregation decision 98.8% of the South's Negro children are still in segregated schools. Even this figure is deceptively high. The statistical charts at the end of the Civil Rights Commission's 1964 report on education reveal that one state, Texas, accounts for more than half of the integrated enrollment. It has an estimated 18,000 Negro pupils in desegregated schools. By contrast, in Alabama there are 21 and in South Carolina there are only 9 Negroes going to school with whites. This is respectively .007% and .003% of the total pupils enrolled in desegregated schools. Mississippi had no school integration below the college level until this fall when a court order opened up three public school districts. In one of these districts, in Clarksdale, no Negro pupil tried to register at a white school.

In other Southern States desegregation is concentrated in a few school districts. Louisiana had 1,814 Negro pupils in desegregated schools, but these are located in only 3 out of 67 bi-racial school districts. In Georgia only 10 out of 181 bi-racial districts are desegregated; in Arkansas 21 out of 228; in Texas 289 out of 899; in North Carolina 61 out of 171; in Florida 21 out of 67; and Tennessee 58 out of 142.

At this rate—little more than one percent in a decade—it will take almost ten centuries to desegregate the South.

What Some German Generals Dream Is What the Rest of Europe Fears

The MLF As A Posthumous U.S. Device to Help Germany Win the Next War

In discussing the MLF with a colleague, I turned up a prize item for an anthology of nuclear horrors. He had been talking with German military men in Washington, who are strong, of course, for this idea of a 25-vessel fleet each armed with 8 Polaris missiles on whose triggers the Germans would have a finger. The German fear is that in the event of a Soviet clash with Germany, the U.S. would not risk its own destruction by a nuclear exchange with Russia but would try to limit the war to Central Europe and conventional arms. I asked what difference the MLF would make, since the U.S. would still be able to veto its use.

The German military, he found, make a different calculation. They believe that a new war may begin with a suicidal nuclear exchange between U.S. and U.S.S.R. which would leave both in ruins. The Soviet armies, however, might still remain largely intact and would move westward, if for no other reason than to escape radioactivity and find food. With the U.S. out of the picture, the Germans could then take over and use the MLF to "interdict" and destroy these armies by nuclear bombardment, and emerge the victor from the Third World War! Obviously someone has been giving the German Generals Herman Kahn for Christmas.

Five Basic Counter-Arguments

I can think of better posthumous pleasures than the thought that we had arranged for Germany to dominate Europe once America had passed away. Unfortunately the Johnson Administration was committed to putting this monstrous device through Congress early next year in time to help Erhard win the next German election. The peace movement had better organize a counter-campaign quickly. An MLF treaty will have to be ratified by a two-thirds vote of the Senate. There is thus a fighting chance of stopping it. The main arguments against it are that (1) it is contradictory to McNamara's policy of recognizing nuclear overkill and shifting emphasis to conventional weapons (2) it cannot be reconciled with Johnson's policy of preventing proliferation of nuclear weapons, since many nations East and West fear MLF as a halfway house to a German nuclear deterrent, (3) it conflicts with the policy of seeking relaxation of tension, since putting a German finger on the nuclear trigger will be regarded by the Soviet countries as a hostile act (4) it will drive the Soviet bloc closer together helping to heal the rift between Moscow and Peking and (5) it will encourage those revanchist forces in Germany which look to a new showdown to regain their 1937 borders.

And on A-Arms For Germans?

"London, Oct. 30—The British Government has decided to ban arms sales to South Africa. . . . An arms embargo for South Africa has the support of the whole Labor Party, but it has been particularly dear to its Left-wingers. There are signs now that the way Prime Minister Harold Wilson intends to cope with the foreign policy demands of left-wing Socialists in his Cabinet is to satisfy them on highly emotional but secondary issues such as South Africa, Spain, and Portugal's African colonies. But where necessary, he apparently will overrule them on such major issues as those involving Anglo-American relations, Germany and East-West negotiations."

—Washington Post Foreign Service, Oct. 31.

The MLF is supposed to tighten NATO unity. It will do the opposite. Unanimous opposition to MLF was registered at the opening of Norway's Parliament Oct. 23. The U.S. sees MLF as a means of weakening the bonds between Germany and France, and binding Germany closer to the U.S. It is therefore not surprising that de Gaulle is threatening to leave NATO if the plan is approved. The threat of a German-American "multilateral force" is being used to bring other reluctant NATO members into it. Here we are told the U.S. will always have a veto over its use, but the Germans have been encouraged by the State Department to believe that ultimately a system of weighted majority voting may be substituted. The Germans, as the largest European contributor, would have the biggest European vote under such an arrangement.

De Gaulle's threats and British Labor negotiations for a modified plan may delay, even possibly shelve, the plan, especially if enough popular opposition can be aroused. The Laborites campaigned against MLF but seem now to be proposing to accept a smaller MLF in a new joint NATO nuclear command to which they would contribute their own "independent" deterrent. The effect would be to water down German influence. This has already evoked a sour reaction from Bonn which wants to be No. 1 in the MLF.

Belgian Statesman, Back from Cuba, Pleads for A More Humane U.S. Policy

A plea for joint European action to bring about a "rethinking" of the U.S. attitude toward Cuba is made by M. Raymond Scheyven in a series of four articles in Le Monde Oct. 27-30. M. Scheyven, brother of the Belgian Ambassador to the U.S., represents Brussels in the Belgian Parliament. He is a Catholic, a leading member of the dominant Christian Social Party and a former Minister of Economic Affairs. This visit was part of a tour in which he had interviews with Belaunde Terry in Peru, Eduardo Frei in Chile, and Castello Branco in Brazil as well as a 10-hour talk with Castro. In Washington, on his way home, M. Scheyven spoke with Secretary Rusk and later in New York to U Thant at the UN.

M. Scheyven reports that, despite great difficulties imposed by the U.S. blockade, most of Cuba's people are better fed than before the Revolution. He says progress is being made in mechanization of the sugar industry. He found the atmosphere less restrictive than in other Soviet countries and he thinks that, given peace, Cuba would evolve rapidly toward greater freedom. "It is for this reason," he writes, "that I doubt the wisdom of the policy adopted by the State Department." He found Castro willing to renounce all Soviet military aid if the U.S. withdrew from Guantanamo and made peace with Cuba. The Belgian found Latin American leaders dubious of U.S. policy and anxious for reconciliation, notably the newly elected Christian Democratic President of Chile, Eduardo Frei. M. Scheyven suggests that a united European policy on Cuba could make the U.S. realize that "like the cordons sanitaires of yesterday, the blockade of today cannot overturn the Cuban regime—the quarantine makes Cuba's little people suffer rather than weakening the team in power."

People Ready to Translate Generalities About Peace Into Concrete Policy

rageously outspoken Weltner in Atlanta, were the gratifying highlights of the Southern returns. Those bloody streaks across the sky in Mississippi were the signs of a new dawn.

A Setback for Fascism

Had Goldwater been elected, the whole world would have felt a tremor of fear. In every country Fascist elements hoped for a Goldwater victory. Among the neo-Nazis in Germany, the Phalangists in Spain, the white supremacists in South Africa and Rhodesia and Angola, there was an instinctive feeling of fraternity for the man behind whom all the crypto-Fascist forces in our own country had rallied. His defeat is a setback to the paranoids everywhere. It is also a defeat for the military. His cave-man oversimplifications, his get-tough stance, reflected the dominant stereotypes of the military bureaucracy which has grown so strong on the cold war, but has failed to carry the country with it. The candidate of the know-nothings, of the Birchites, and of the ignorant rich failed to carry a single State outside the South except his native Arizona. In every class, in every region, and among every ethnic group outside the South, the verdict was against him. The suburban vote was particularly significant, for it showed that among the better educated, though the more prosperous, there was a sober readiness to accept welfare state, justice for the Negro and a crusade against poverty. How much has changed since the days when the well-to-do saw only a threat of Communism in the New Deal! The press, which was overwhelmingly against FDR a generation ago, was now overwhelmingly against Goldwater. This was a victory for the educated, and above all for the education which the New Deal gave this country. It is a pity Eleanor Roosevelt did not live to see these returns.

A New Maturity in The Country

Johnson won his victory despite the dirty campaign waged against him. Dirty campaigns are hardly new in our history. What was new was the sign of a new maturity and of a higher level of good taste in the electorate. The cheap and vulgar Miller antagonized the country; the reaction to the Jenkins affair showed that it had grown up. The McCarthy-style Red menace books with which the Goldwaterites flooded the country seemed to have an impact only on a minority already nutty. Something has been learned from the witch hunt years. Perhaps the most heartening aspect of the whole election was the fact that it so obviously turned on fear of what a man like Goldwater might do if his hands were on the nuclear trigger. However poorly informed on other matters, the electorate showed that it had instinctively and universally seized on the new facts of life in the nuclear age. The country realizes that we live on the brink of world catastrophe, and that the new weapons call for a new sobriety. We believe that the reaction of the country to the nuclear issue, which seems to have outweighed even racism in parts of the South, is the most hopeful development. The American people showed itself more intelligent than its political leaders have given it credit for. We believe that the country would be prepared to follow Johnson if he were now to translate his campaign generalities about peace and restraint into concrete peace policy on Vietnam, Cuba and China. The people have shown their confidence in Johnson. We look to him to show his confidence in the people.

Democracy Marches On (and Out) in Brazil

"Lincoln Gordon, U. S. Ambassador to Brazil, was quoted in Washington as saying that earlier fears in the U.S. that Brazil's military-backed government was anti-democratic had practically disappeared."

—Baltimore Sun from Rio de Janeiro, Oct. 22.

"A new period of tension between Brazilian politicians and military authorities appeared imminent to observers here today. . . . A number of State Governors—including Mauro Borges of Boias, accused of harboring Communists in his Administration—were under renewed military pressure. There were rumors that some military extremists would like to close Congress altogether and impose a military dictatorship. Mouro Andrade (President of the Senate) warned that 'not even President Castello Branco is immune from being the next victim.' He added, 'A regime is no longer democratic when a Lieut. Col. judges the President of the Congress; a Major, a scientist of world reputation; and a Lieutenant, a university professor."

—Washington Post from Rio, Oct. 27.

How NBC's Gen. Sarnoff Went to Bat for the Cigarette-Makers, Pps. 2-3

The Author of "The Quiet American" on Our Not-So-Quiet Use of Torture in Vietnam

"In the past few weeks photographs have appeared in the British press showing the tortures inflicted on Viet Cong prisoners by the Vietnam army. In the long frustrating war in Indochina there has, of course, always been torture—torture by Viet Minh, torture by Vietnamese, torture by the French—but at least in the old days of the long, long war hypocrisy paid a tribute to virtue by hushing up the torture inflicted by its own soldiers and condemning the torture inflicted by the other side. The strange new feature about the photographs of torture now appearing is that they have been taken with the approval of the torturers and published over captions that contain no hint of condemnation. They might have come out of a book on insect life. 'The white ant takes certain measures against the red ant after a successful foray.' But these, after all, are not ants but men. The long slow slide into barbarism of the Western world seems to have quickened. For these photographs are of torturers belonging to an army which could not exist without American aid and counsel. Does this mean that the American authorities sanction torture as a means of interrogation?"

The MLF—One Sure Way to Heal the Sino-Soviet Rift

An important passage in the French Prime Minister's warning against the MLF was not reported in the U.S. press. M. Pompidou (Le Monde, Nov. 7) told the French Parliamentary correspondents that the American plan for 20 Polaris-armed ships with a German finger on their triggers would be "destructive for Europe and provocative for certain other countries." He declared that "if we take part in a permanent confrontation between the two blocs" there will be "no durable equilibrium" in Europe. M. Pompidou concluded that "the two blocs ought to be less rigid and they ought even in some degree to interpenetrate each other [s'interpénétrer] in order to facilitate the peaceful co-existence for which everyone wishes at the present time." In other words the French Prime Minister sees the MLF as a device which will harden the division of Europe and stifle hopes for a continued detente between East and West.

How Germany's Army Officers Think

Americans will begin to see the full implications of the MLF if they compare this French view with the views which Prof. Amitai Etzioni of Columbia found among officers of the West German Staff College in Hamburg when he spoke there a few days before M. Pompidou's address. Prof. Etzioni told M. S. Handler in an interview in the New York Times (Nov. 8) that a third of them, the most senior group, saw the MLF as a means of "political blackmail" to compel the Russians to permit reunification on West German terms while another third thought it could be used to force the dismantling of the Berlin wall and guarantees for West Berlin. Thus for two-thirds the MLF was a means, by implied threat of nuclear war, to exact concessions from the Eastern bloc. The higher the rank of the officer, the Columbia professor said, the more ardent his support for the nuclear force. A third of the officers, presumably the younger men, thought that Germans cannot and should not be trusted with nuclear weapons. The reactions of these German officers show that M. Pompidou was not opposing MLF out of mere de Gaullist pique, as the State Department would like us to believe.

Kennedy was cool to MLF. Johnson is reported to be strongly for it. We find it hard to reconcile those reports with the interview which the President gave the German picture magazine, Quick (May 3) shortly after Erhard's visit to Washington. "When it comes to peace," Johnson told his German interviewer, "we will meet the Russians halfway and more than halfway if necessary. When Chancellor Erhard was here, I told him: 'Put yourself in the place of the Russians. Try to understand their feelings. They are worried about the Germans, and that is understandable. The Russians are afraid.' I begged Erhard to do everything he could to arrive at better relations with the Germans and dissipate their anxieties." The MLF will increase those fears.

The Grimmest Computation

"How many of the 5500 sailors, who would serve on the MLF rocket-ships, may survive the zero hour of an atomic war, has likewise already been estimated by the military planners in Washington: more than half. But no one has yet figured out how much chance the survivors of these modern Noah's Arks would have, ever to set foot again on unharmed and uncontaminated land."

—Conclusion of a critical article on the MLF in Der Spiegel, Germany's leading independent weekly, Nov. 4.

All this casts its shadow over Asia as well as Europe. Washington is complacently sure that there will be no firm Sino-Soviet reconciliation. MLF could bring it about. It is China's strongest argument with the Soviet bloc. "Johnson seems to be very keen," said the Peking Peoples Daily Oct. 22, "about preventing nuclear proliferation. But as a matter of fact it is the U.S. itself, and not any other country which is engaged in spreading nuclear weapons. The Johnson Administration is pushing ahead with the so-called multilateral nuclear force plan for placing nuclear weapons in the hands of NATO countries, and in particular those of the West German revanchists." If there is anyone the Russians fear more than the Chinese, it is the Germans. This also goes for the Poles, the Czechs, the Hungarians, the Yugoslavs and the Rumanians. If we want to refreeze the Soviet bloc, and deep-freeze the hopes of peacefully reuniting Germany, if we want to increase the power of the intransigeant Chinese over the conciliatory Russians, MLF is the way to do it.

Tobacco Industry's Profits Still Rising 10 Months After Surgeon General's Report

NBC's General Sarnoff Goes to Bat for the Cigarette Makers . . .

The Surgeon General's report on smoking and disease has so far caused the tobacco industry remarkably little annoyance. Every cigarette company but one has now reported 1964 third-quarter profits slightly higher than last year's. Only R. J. Reynolds showed a decline in profits and this was blamed on the high cost of promoting a new brand (Wall St. Journal, Oct. 30)! The industry as a whole has registered a net decline in profits of only 0.1%.

The Dissenter Won

The crucial test between cigarette profits and health will come early next year when Congress debates federal regulation of cigarette advertising and labeling. The industry will be well-prepared. It has won a series of preliminary skirmishes that place it in a comfortable position. Its latest victory was won behind the closed doors of the President's Commission on Heart Disease, Cancer, and Stroke. The Commission was appointed last February "to map an attack for the Nation on these three great killers." It will issue its report in late December, just before Congress convenes. A source who attended its meetings told us the Commission was prepared to go beyond the Surgeon General's report in recommending "very vigorous" regulatory action against cigarette advertising. A strong statement had been drafted by Emerson Foote, a member of the Commission who recently resigned as chairman of the board of McCann-Erickson because the advertising firm would not drop its tobacco clients. Foote's proposed draft never came to a vote, however, because General David Sarnoff, chairman of the RCA communications empire, threatened to take the matter to the White House and said he would prevent the Commission from adopting a unanimous report. Tobacco company advertising averages around a quarter-billion dollars a year, half of it on TV. (When we told Sarnoff's Washington and New York offices we were going to publish this story, neither would comment.) Foote withdrew his statement even though Sarnoff was the only dissenter. This is a pity since the Commission's authoritative voice would have off-set tobacco's other recent victories.

4500 New Young Smokers A Day

Rep. Lionel VAN DERLEEN (D. Cal.): You would agree that any warning that was imposed upon (cigarette) advertising and especially broadcast advertising might achieve the proportions of a national joke.

Dr. SCOTT (President of the American Cancer Association): It does not necessarily have to become a joke or anything of the sort. We have to remember there are 4500 young people taking up cigarette smoking everyday. These are all new people. It has to be a continuing and repetitive process to be effective. Even the advertising people tell us that for their own product.

—Interstate Commerce Comm. Hearings on Tobacco, Jl. 2.

The first of these came when Rep. Oren Harris (D., Ark.), Chairman of the House Interstate Commerce Committee, challenged the right of the Federal Trade Commission to regulate cigarette advertising and labeling without specific authority from Congress. The Commission was in the midst of issuing a rule which requires all labels and advertisements to carry a warning to the effect that "cigarette smoking is dangerous to health and may cause death from cancer and other diseases." This rule is weaker than the Commission's original proposal but not so weak as the one Congress is likely to turn out. Tobacco-state congressmen chair one-fourth of the Senate committees including Finance, Banking and Currency, Armed Services, and Post Office and Civil Service. In the House, they chair 7 out of 21 committees, including the nearly omnipotent Rules Committee. This helps explain why Congress until late last session had never held hearings for any one of 30 bills on the cigarette danger. The one exception that proves the rule was Rep. John Blatnik's investigation in 1957 of false and misleading filter-tip advertising. Before his Government Operations subcommittee could finish its work, the subcommittee was dissolved.

The tobacco industry won a third victory at the Harris committee hearings this summer. These gave it a pseudo-scientific smokescreen, as the boxes on these pages indicate. Every scientific witness but one supported the tobacco companies and attacked the Surgeon General's report. Their statements looked so much alike they led one congressman to suspect a single author (see box at bottom). One witness admitted

How The Tobacco Companies Helped Prepare The Testimony of The Scientists

Rep. J. A. YOUNGER (R. Cal.): The format of your testimony and Dr. Garland's who is to come, appears to be exactly the same. Were these printed or mimeographed at the same place? What causes all of these to be exactly the same?

Dr. Henry RUSSEK (Consultant in Cardiovascular Disease, U.S. Public Health Service Hospital, Staten Is., New York): I submitted a statement quite similar to his with a few differences. I said, for example, the undersigned is so and so and I was told perhaps it would be better before a congressional committee to say rather than "the undersigned," "I am."

Rep. YOUNGER: You submitted them to whom?

Dr. RUSSEK: To an attorney for one of the tobacco companies. I showed him the statement that I would give.

Rep. YOUNGER: Are you employed in any way, shape or form by any tobacco company?

Dr. RUSSEK: In no manner whatever. This statement that I have given here I gave at the AMA meeting last week in San Francisco.

Rep. YOUNGER: All of these start out in exactly the same format. My experience with witnesses before the committee, I rarely find that. I was just wondering if there was any correlation between the format that we have and the position that all of you take in regard to smoking?

Dr. RUSSEK: No, it had nothing whatever to do with this?

Rep. YOUNGER: Who mimeographed yours?

Dr. RUSSEK: I imagine it was mimeographed by Mr. Hardy of one of the tobacco corporations.

Rep, YOUNGER: That is what I am trying to get at. Evidently they were all mimeographed by the same company. Dr. RUSSEK: I presume so.

Congressional Hearings Stacked by Nicotine-Stained Scientists

. . . Reported Blocking Strong Stand by President's Commission on Cancer

he had consulted with an attorney for the tobacco companies before submitting his statement. Another admitted that he had gone over his testimony with a medical consultant for the American Tobacco Co. Several said the tobacco companies had done the printing of their statements. At least one witness admitted he had recently received a grant from the Council for Tobacco Research, a tobacco company affiliate. Dr. Wendell Scott, President of the American Cancer Society and the only non-tobacco-tainted expert to testify, said that to his knowledge none of these witnesses had ever published a paper or done any original research on smoking and health.

A Quarter-Million Deaths A Year

The testimony of these "experts" was as specious as their credentials. Their favorite ploy was to point out that the Surgeon General's report did not "prove" that smoking "caused" cancer because it was based only on statistical evidence. This is the same stale line that the industry has been using for 15 years. It was emphasized by the statistician in the group, Mr. Alan Donnahoe, who also happens to be vice-president of The Richmond Times. The Surgeon General's statistics show that ten times as many moderate smokers die of lung cancer than do non-smokers. Donnahoe calculated off-the-cuff that if these figures are adjusted for all possible error, they show only five times as many smokers dying of lung cancer. That seems pretty bad too. Actually, a scientist at the Public Health Service told us that the Surgeon General's report "leaned over backwards to underestimate" the health hazard, and that instead of 40,000 deaths it would not be too much to speak of 250,000 to 300,000 deaths annually.

One witness upon whom the committee lavished innumerable compliments was Bowman Gray, chairman of the board of R. J. Reynolds and spokesman at the hearings for all the tobacco companies. Gray revealed the industry's strategy when he said he favored a "congressional [regulatory] statute pre-empting the field" from the States because "this is the big year for state legislation" and "unless something such as this is done there will be a rash of [state] action." When asked how much advertising the industry would do if it had to use the FTC's health warning, Gray answered, "Doggone little." This was the best argument for regulation that we saw in the five-volume set of hearings.

These stack the public record against the consumer. They give the well-meaning but timid congressman an excuse not to offend the industry or the powers in Congress. Only some White House magic can defeat the industry now, but two of our Sorcerer's chief apprentices, Earle Clements and Abe Fortas, have the tobacco companies for clients.

How to Form An Opinion Without Even Trying

Mr. Paul ROGERS (D. Fla.): You feel there is really no basis in these studies at all to show this connection [between cancer and cigarette smoking]?

Dr. BURFORD (identified below): No, sir. I have to stick firmly with my somewhat dogmatic opinion. This opinion was not formed easily. I would remind the committee that this opinion was formed when I was working side by side with one of the really great surgeons of America, Evarts Graham.

* * * *

Rep. J. A. YOUNGER (R. Cal.): Dr. Scott, do you know Dr. Thomas H. Burford?

Dr. SCOTT (Pres., American Cancer Society): Yes. Dr. Burford is one of my close friends and associates. I work with him almost every day of the year.

Rep. YOUNGER: How do you account for his statement (above)?

Dr. SCOTT: He has felt this way from the very beginning. When Dr. Ernest Windaur first came to him to undertake the first studies, Dr. Burford did not feel there was any merit. Dr. Windaur went to Evarts Graham, the professor in charge of the department, and he said, "All right, we will go ahead with the studies (anyway)." This is Dr. Burford's personal opinion. It is not supported by a series of scientific studies and investigations.

How One Expert Witness Evaded The Facts About Lung Cancer

"I have found no really convincing evidence that the incidence of lung cancer is actually increasing although cigarette consumption has been rising for several decades. . . . Post mortem examinations today are carried out in a far more careful and meticulous fashion than they were two decades or even one decade ago resulting in more frequent discovery of lung cancer."

—Dr. Thomas Burford, Chief of Thoracic and Cardiovascular Surgery, Barnes and Allied Hospitals, St. Louis, before House Interstate Commerce Committee, June 29.

"In the United States, for example, only 371 deaths were attributed to lung cancer in 1914. This number rose to 2,357 in 1930; 7,121 in 1940; 18,313 in 1950, and 36,420 in 1960. . . . (1) The simple bulk of the increase makes improved diagnosis an inadequate explanation. (2) Improvements in diagnosis also occurred with respect to such other forms of cancer as stomach cancer. Yet no comparable rise in reported cancer rates generally or in cancer at other internal cites has occurred. . . . (3) There is the strange but unchallenged fact that lung cancer remains today a rare disease among men and women who do not smoke and who have never smoked. Improved diagnosis, to the extent that it has affected the statistics through the years, would have produced a rise among non-smokers."

—"The Consumers Union Report on Smoking and the Public Interest," (Consumers Union, 1963) pp. 16-20.

* * * *

"It seems to me that any unbiased examination of the world's scientific literature will conclude that there is as much or more reason to suspect air pollutants as there is to suspect cigarette smoking."

—Dr. Burford at tobacco hearings, June 29.

"[In] Iceland . . . lung cancer remained a rare disease and cigarette smoking a relatively unpopular habit as recently as 1940. Since then, cigarette smoking has become increasingly popular and lung cancer increasingly common. . . . The increase cannot be attributed to air pollution for at least since 1943 Reykjavik (where most of the deaths occurred) has had the purest air in Europe. A municipal heating system based on hot springs near the city has replaced both coal and oil for heating purposes."

CIA Director McCone Leaving? A Poor Way to Improve U.S. Standing in Brazil

Easy Way for Bobby Kennedy to Prove He Can Be Liberal and Magnanimous

Now that Bobby Kennedy has been elected, one way for him to refute his critics and demonstrate liberalism and magnanimity would be to join in a protest to ABC to reinstate Lisa Howard, whom it once billed as TV's No. 1 Newswoman but has dropped for helping to organize Democrats-for-Keating. Her TV interviews with Castro and Guevara were courageous forays for better understanding. . . . There was good news in Joe Alsop's resumed column Nov. 9 (we dislike his views but are glad to see he's well again) that CIA Director John A. McCone "may have to return to California, to keep an eye for a while on his large West Coast enterprises." McCone managed as AEC Chairman and CIA Director to keep these enterprises despite conflict-of-interest laws governing both posts. But the main objection to him is that he is a Republican of far right views, who would fit better into a Goldwater government. . . .

Civil Liberties Cases at The Court

The Supreme Court this week agreed to decide the constitutionality of a Landrum-Griffin Act provision which makes it a crime for a Communist to serve as an officer of a labor union. The 9th Circuit Court of Appeals set aside the conviction of Archie Brown, an officer in a San Francisco local of the ILWU, on the ground that Congress could not "impose personal criminal sanctions on . . . (the) basis of political affiliations." The Solicitor General has asked the Supreme Court to overturn this ruling. The Court also said the NAACP and the ACLU could file amicus curiae briefs in support of James Dombrowski, director of the Southern Conference Educational Fund, indicted in Louisiana for subversive (i.e., civil rights) activities.

Ambassadorial Errand Boy?

It was poor public relations for U.S. Ambassador Lincoln Gordon to accompany John J. McCloy, acting as lawyer for the Hanna Mining Interests of Cleveland, on a visit to Brazil's new military dictator President Castelo Branco in Brasilia Nov. 6. The vice president of Hanna is George H. Humphrey, Ike's Secretary of the Treasury, and a leading Goldwater supporter, who has used influence of all kinds to obtain control of rich iron deposits in Brazil. The concessions granted him 5 years ago were later cancelled June 30, 1962, by a Nationalist Minister of Mines. The cancellation is on appeal to the Brazilian Supreme Court. "After presenting Mr. McCloy," the New York Times reported meaningfully, Nov. 7, "Ambassador Gordon paid President Branco a second visit outlining the U.S. financial and economic mission to Brazil." First the U.S. supports a military coup which purges some of Brazil's leading statesmen from public life and then it brings pressure for iron deposits that Brazilians from far right to far left prefer to keep under public control. This is hardly the way to lay the spectre of Yankee Imperialism. . . .

Remember the campaign for continued underground testing on the plea that it was required to perfect our means of detection? Since the nuclear test ban treaty went into effect, we have staged 38 tests. The official AEC run-down as of Nov. 9 shows 30 weapons tests, six Ploughshare (supposed civilian uses), one joint weapons test with the United Kingdom—and one Vela (test detection). Moscow is now asking a complete ban on all tests. How can the Russians convince the Chinese to stop testing when we go on doing so? . . . Are these tests really necessary or just provocative "needling" exercises? . . . An Agence France Presse dispatch from Bonn in Le Monde (Nov. 5) reports that the West Germany government is resuming talks for a trade agreement with Red China. These were postponed earlier this year on Washington's request until after the elections. . . . We welcome the news from Moscow (New York Times, Nov. 4) that the Leningrad poet Brodsky and Boris Pasternak's friend, Olga Ivinskaya, have been released from prison by the new regime as a conciliatory gesture to Russian intellectuals and world opinion. Brodsky was sentenced to five years in jail as a "social parasite" for his non-conformist verses and the Khrushchev regime took out on Ivinskaya its displeasure with the author of "Dr. Zhivago." This sensitivity to world opinion is a welcome change from the days of Stalinism.

Democracy — The One "Option" We Shy Away From in Vietnam, P. 3

The General Who First Launched the Idea of MLF Now Predicts Its Rejection by NATO

"Los Angeles, Nov. 21 — Gen. Lauris Norstad, former commander of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, said yesterday the U.S. proposal for a multilateral nuclear force 'has succeeded in dividing rather than unifying the member nations of NATO.' Norstad told a news conference he doubts NATO nations will ever adopt the proposal. 'It doesn't appear that any agreement is imminent, and an impassioned speech at a conference table won't alter things,' he said. 'Gen. de Gaulle will not agree now, later or ever,' Norstad continued. 'The plan has not been accepted by Britain either, and Germany agreed only under pressure'." —Associated Press in Washington Post, Nov. 22.

J. Edgar Hoover's Novel View of Racism

J. Edgar Hoover turned up at Gwen Cafritz's party here in Washington the other evening and found, according to the Washington Star's society reporter (Nov. 21) that he couldn't get past the entrance "as he drew group after group of guests expressing admiration for his outspoken comments during an unusual three-hour press conference with women reporters earlier this week." The spontaneous ovation showed that beneath the cynical surface of Washington society there beats a warm heart, ready to welcome the dissenter even in this age of conformity. Mr. Hoover told the admirers thronging around him that he was surprised at the reaction from the country. He said he had received almost 400 telegrams, "all favorable except for two or three who were critical or hostile" and these he said "were probably from racist groups associated with Martin Luther King."

Not Even Bull Connor or Ross Barnett

We have often asked why Mr. Hoover did not speak out on the subject of racism. We are encouraged to see that he has at last broached the subject, though from a novel angle. We had never thought of Rev. King or the organizations associated with him as racist, though we suppose that in a sense they are. Mr. Hoover obviously considers as racist any organization which seeks to give the Negro equality with the white man, to set race against race by insisting that Southern registrars register Negro voters, too, and generally to stir up the Negro against white supremacy. This has, come to think of it, long been the South's point of view but no Southern spokesman has had the daring to express it in quite so original a way. It never occurred to Bull Connor to assert that he had set the dogs on those demonstrators in Birmingham to protect the city from racism. Nor has Ross Barnett thought of defending the burning of Negro churches in Mississippi as a means of safeguarding the State from racist agitation. To call Martin Luther King "the most notorious liar in the country" may have seemed a little extreme even to members of the White Citizens' Councils. But to come up with the idea that NAACP, CORE, SNCC and Southern Christian Leadership Conference can be termed "racist" organizations—that's close akin to genius.

This observation by Mr. Hoover shows the wisdom of his attitude toward press conferences. Though Mr. Hoover is constantly writing articles on various favorite menaces (usually red or pink) in the Sunday supplements, his usual practice on interviews is to answer prepared written questions submitted in advance. The lucky reporter gets the answers in written form and a handshake. In 40 years as head of the FBI, Mr. Hoover had never before held a general press conference, and even this first of its kind was restricted to women. According to The Washington Post's society reporter, Marie McNair (Nov. 21) Mr. Hoover explained this at the Cafritz party. "With men journalists," he told his admirers, "the questions are loaded and the reporters are trying to trip you up. However, there are exceptions to this, he declared, naming half a dozen newspapers throughout the country in which he has confidence." It is reassuring to learn that Mr. Hoover does not regard the entire American press with suspicion, and is prepared to grant clearance to six newspapers at least. It is easy to imagine what the run-of-the-mill subversive Washington correspondent (male) would have done at a press conference in which Mr. Hoover implied that Martin Luther King was a racist. Some slippery fellow might even have asked Mr. Hoover blandly whether he was perhaps thinking of arresting the Rev. King under the new Civil Rights Act.

Three Leading Papers on J. Edgar

"The extensiveness of his list of hates and the intemperance of many of his utterances speak poorly for the clarity of his judgment. . . . It would be wise to let the mandatory provisions of the Federal retirement law take effect on Mr. Hoover's 70th birthday."
—New York Times, Nov. 20.

"Mr. J. Edgar Hoover hasn't been in the habit of holding news conferences, and his performance Wednesday suggests it may have been just as well for his reputation. He managed . . . to state as fact that 'no one' dares to walk in New York's Central Park 'even in the daytime'—a purported fact which would no doubt surprise the thousands of New Yorkers who use the park daily. . . . For the holder of one of the most sensitive posts in the government, the FBI director showed a cavalier recklessness with fact and fancy."
—New York Herald-Tribune, Nov. 20.

"Unaccustomed as he is to public criticism, J. Edgar Hoover customarily responds to its occasional expression by impugning the integrity, virtue or patriotism of his critics. . . . This kind of talk, if it came from any other bureau chief in the Federal Government, would be generally recognized as insufferable effrontery on the part of a public servant."
—Washington Post, Nov. 21.

Our Liberal Democrats More Timorous About Public Control Than England's Tories

Britain Far to The Left of U.S. on The Crucial Question of Steel

Britain is on the verge of nationalizing its private steel monopoly for the second time in little more than a decade. We have not begun to regulate ours. In comparison with our retarded politics even the British Conservatives look like left-wing radicals. As long ago as 1951 they renounced the idea of a free market in steel. They established a regulatory commission, the Iron and Steel Board, with authority to set maximum prices and supervise major investments. That's a good bit further than many of our liberal Democrats would be prepared to go even now. The steel debate in the House of Commons November 9 showed that the Conservatives have moved still further left. The main question for many was no longer whether to nationalize steel but by how much.

The London Economist framed the question similarly last May when it came out with reservations for "[public] ownership or control of part of the industry." Even the steel industry is not pressing for a return to unregulated competition. Its Iron and Steel Federation wrote recently that "in such a key industry as steel, the public has a right to know whether the activities of the companies accord with the public interest, and to ensure that they do." Our steel companies won't even let Congress see their costs of production. When Kefauver's Antitrust Committee tried to subpoena the figures in 1962, the companies simply refused.

Barrier To Full Employment

The need for some form of government control over steel is as great here as in Britain. There the main economic problem is a trade gap; here it is an employment gap. Solutions to both are linked with the price of steel since it is our most important industrial material. The high price of steel since the war has contributed to reduced demand and increased unemployment throughout the economy. Prof. Otto Eckstein, now on the Council of Economic Advisers and no great economic radical, told the Kefauver committee in 1959 that at least 50% of the wholesale price inflation in the 1950's was due to the steel companies raising prices when they should have been lowering them. The committee calculated that a price raise in 1957 had added $540 million to the cost of steel products and this was just one of three price increases within a year. Although Congress has investigated steel prices in no less than seven out of the last fifteen years, so far no member has been bold enough to offer a legislative remedy.

Steel pricing is too important to be left to the vagaries of presidential politics. Kennedy blocked an across-the-board price rise in 1962 but then permitted piecemeal increases on the sly. The logical place to tackle this problem is within the context of Sen. Clark's Planning-For-Full-Employment Bill. The original Full Employment Bill of 1945, before it was emasculated, authorized the regulation of monopoly prices. Sen. Clark should go at least as far in his bill. It would be gentle treatment for his steel mogul constituents in Pennsylvania when compared with the position taken by Britain's Conservative Prime Minister Harold Macmillan in his book, "The Middle Way". "The Socialist remedy should be accepted," he wrote, "where the general welfare of the economy requires that certain basic industries and services need now to be conducted in the light of broader social considerations than the profit motive."

Germany's Foremost Physicist Against MLF

"The relationship of the MLF to Germany and the German question is a painful problem for international politics. The Federal Republic is the only European country that gives the impression of really wanting the MLF. To the foreign observer there must appear a good reason for this. . . . The MLF seems to be the only way for the Federal Republic to come close to control over nuclear weapons. At the same time the Federal Republic is the only country in Central Europe that publicly raises territorial claims. The Federal Republic gives assurances in full sincerity that it will seek to achieve those aims peacefully. It is not in our power to eliminate mistrust in our sincerity. In these circumstances, the entire world, including even the West, must react nervously to Germany's approaching the status of a thermonuclear power."

—C. F. von Weizsäcker, the Reich's leading nuclear physicist in Die Zeit (Hamburg) Nov. 20.

Erich Fromm Believes U.S. Drive for MLF Played Part in Khrushchev's Downfall

"Khrushchev's fall has been explained as a result of his permitting the rift with China to become unbridgeable. The fact, however, which is hardly mentioned in the press, is that Khrushchev's failure can be understood only if we consider his total political strategy and our part in contributing to his failure. His aim was accommodation with the United States, thus securing his Western flank while facing a hostile China. . . . Khrushchev was afraid of the spread of nuclear weapons, especially among his two most dangerous opponents—China and West Germany. There are good reasons to assume that his concept of an accommodation with the United States included the aim to prevent (perhaps through the UN) the Chinese and West Germans from obtaining nuclear weapons. . . .

"Khrushchev did his best to achieve this aim. He stopped technical aid for the Chinese nuclear development. He made the important concessions to the United States of dropping his plan for a peace treaty with East Germany and political neutralization of East Berlin. . . .

"But when we had gotten this concession we went ahead to threaten him in a more vital area: the multilateral force which is likely to give West Germany a de facto possession of nuclear weapons, a Germany which has not relinquished its claims to the pre-war boundaries in the east. Thus Khrushchev's policy has led to a situation where the Soviet Union is threatened on both flanks—a political failure which would remove any leading statesman from his position in any country. . . .

"If the United States goes on with its plans for the MLF, the new leaders will be forced to seek an accommodation with China, and to follow an aggressive policy, or they will be replaced by a still tougher group. The next months may offer an opportunity of avoiding this by not going ahead with the MLF. Khrushchev's fall should be a lesson showing where further 'victories' in the cold war will lead."

—Erich Fromm, author of "May Man Prevail", in a letter to the Wash. Post, Nov. 19.

Could We Find A More Honorable Way Out Than to Give The Vietnamese Free Choice?

Gen. Taylor and His Chief Aides Make Some Revealing Admissions in Saigon

On the eve of Gen. Maxwell Taylor's return from Saigon and possible new decisions on Vietnam, much can be learned from a close and careful reading of the interview Life published Nov. 27 with him and the other heads of U.S. mission in that country. A good place to begin is with an admission by Deputy Ambassador U. Alexis Johnson. "This country," he said, "has never had any experience at government. During the whole period of their colonial administration, no independent political activity was permitted. This was also true, from 1954 to 1963, during the Diem period." This admits that our domination like the French was undemocratic. The "freedom" we claimed to be protecting was cold war rhetoric, not the reality of self-government.

Where We Look Totalitarian

To the peasants, Barry Zorthian of USIA admitted, the totalitarian side seemed to be ours, not the Vietcong's. When he was asked about the motivation on the Vietcong side, Zorthian replied that "only a small portion" were "hard-core Communist", that "many went over to the other side because of the Diem government, because of their reaction to what they felt were totalitarian methods under the Diem government. They have not perhaps been persuaded sufficiently to come back as yet. . . ." Perhaps a real offer of freedom would persuade them to "come back."

In the urban areas, Zorthian went on, "the appeal of a democratic form of government is a very strong one" and "part of the political unrest" is due to the fact that for the first time "educated Vietnamese" have a chance to "express themselves politically." He did not add that from all account what they are trying to express is their dissatisfaction with a civilian government of dodoes hand-picked by the military and completely under their thumb. It is a fraud, which only sharpens desire for the real thing.

If the Communist hard core of the Vietcong is small, if the desire for free government is widespread, why don't we try giving South Vietnam the freedom for which we claim to be fighting? If the majority want self-government, isn't the satisfaction of that desire the one way to win the majority from hard-core Communist leadership and to establish a stable regime? These questions were not put by Life. But they are there, between the lines. This is the one "option" we do not discuss. The "options" we prefer to talk about are forms of widening the war.

When Gen. Taylor was asked about these military "options" he gave the answer of an honest and troubled man. "These possibilities do exist," he said, "but they have their pros and cons. I would add again that military action outside the country, just as pure military action inside the country, will not win. (Our italics). We must restore a viable society within these provinces of South Vietnam." The real "crunch" is that a viable society means a democratic society and a democratic society will vote for peace and possibly a coalition government of national reconciliation. This is why we fear a democratic solution, and talk of bombing Hanoi instead. But isn't it worth the risk? Why not demonstrate our sincerity about self-government, challenge the other side to internationally supervised elections, and allow the Vietnamese a free choice? Could we find a more honorable way out?

Screening Communist Mail Propaganda from Abroad Held Contrary to First Amendment

"The Postmaster General and the Customs Bureau maintain 11 screening posts in the U.S. for the interception of 'communist political propaganda.' . . . The addressee is mailed POD Form 2153-X identifying the mail and advising him that it will be destroyed unless he signifies a desire to receive it. . . . In the instant case plaintiff . . . refused to sign the card and instead filed this suit. Thereafter the General Counsel of the Post Office notified plaintiff that the filing of this suit constituted an expression of a desire to receive [all such] mail. . . . In short, contrary to plaintiff's wishes, his name was placed on a list of people desiring to receive 'communist political propaganda.'

"Initially, defendants argue that this suit has been rendered moot by the aforementioned action of the General Counsel. . . . This same defense was raised, successfully, in Lamont v. Postmaster General, 229 F. Supp. 913 (1964). We cannot agree with that distinguished court. . . . To render this case moot . . . is to approve a device which would enable defendants to prevent any potential recipient of mail originating abroad from ever testing constitutionality. . . . Furthermore, we think contrary to the court in Lamont that plaintiff may also assert the rights of third parties. . . . Persons interested in receiving political matter from abroad may be deterred from bringing suit . . . lest this be construed as expression of a desire to receive 'communist political propaganda.' The social stigma and economic injury they may suffer is very real. We do not think a person should be made to suffer social disapprobation in order to assert his constitutional rights. . . .

"Similar lists under earlier non-statutory screening programs were routinely turned over to the House Committee on Un-American Activities. . . . Assurances by defendant that these practices have been discontinued cannot be reasonably expected to mitigate a person's reluctance to have his name associated with 'communist political propaganda.' There are no similar assurances that this information will not be made available in the future in view of the lack of a statutory requirement that [this] information . . . remain confidential. . . .

"The purpose of the new legislation was primarily to control, restrict and prevent the delivery of matter found to be communist propaganda, an infringement upon the dissemination of ideas and therefore a clear and direct invasion of First Amendment territory. . . . We are compelled to declare the statute unconstitutional on its face."

Endless Debates on Liturgy But The Question of Nuclear Weapons Shelved in 48 Hours

The Ecumenical Council as the "20th Congress" of Roman Catholicism

The Ecumenical Council, which has just closed its third session in Rome, is in a sense the "20th Congress" of Roman Catholicism. Khrushchev, who opened the windows at the 20th Congress and let in a little fresh air on the stagnant atmosphere of Stalinism, resembled in some ways Pope John XXIII, who within three months of ascending the throne of St. Peter, decided to call the first Ecumenical Council since 1870, and bring the Church "up to date." Both were men of the people, almost peasant types, with a sense of humor and good sense often absent in their bureaucracies.

We deal here with two dogmatic world systems, which owe their ultimate origin to the Jewish passion for social justice (one in Jesus, the other in Marx). Both have congealed into vast power structures, claiming infallibility through revelation. Both have the intrinsic intolerance of systems claiming to possess the one and only truth. Both are having slowly to adjust to man's instinctive desire for intellectual freedom.

A Sharp Contrast With Its Predecessor

Compared to the last Council in 1870 and to Pius XI who presided over it, the new Council shows a fresh wind blowing through the ancient structure. Pius XI, in his reign of 32 years, set himself like a Canute against all the tides of modernity. The achievement of his Council was an exercise in anachronism, the promulgation of Papal Infallibility. The sharpest contrast is on religious liberty, which Pius XI attacked along with all other forms of liberalism in his notorious Syllabus of Errors. In this Council only a last-minute maneuver by the Roman Curia, abetted by Pope Paul, who is no liberal, blocked a majority declaration for religious liberty. That, and a new majority declaration clearing the Jews of guilt for the Crucifixion, seem certain of adoption at the next session. The latter will help shut off a poisonous source of anti-Semitism.

Compared with the needs of the modern world, the Church's progress is snail-paced. The progressives failed to get a new stand on birth control, and asked in vain for the Church to recognize the right of conscientious objection in wartime. Most disappointing was the debate on nuclear weapons, when Bishop Hannan of Washington pleaded against their condemnation, especially when "small" and "clean." An Oriental Patriarch, Maximos IV, in opposing use of the atom bomb, asked the Council to imitate St. Ambrose, who barred the Emperor Theodosius from his Cathedral for having ordered the massacre of an innocent population. The Council resisted such romantic pleas. Le Monde's correspondent noted (Nov. 12) that after debating minor liturgical questions endlessly the Council disposed in less than 48 hours "of this most agonizing question for the whole of mankind"—by postponing action. Those prelates of the Church who believe even these horrible weapons may be used in a "just war" are not however alone. Except for a handful of pure pacifists, this is a doctrine on which all mankind, from Rome to Peking, seems to be achieving a unique and miraculous near-unanimity.

Pius XII's Fear of Hitler

The latest volume of German Foreign Office documents simultaneously released by the State Department and the British Foreign Office covers the 6 months from Hitler's attack on Russia to the end of 1941. One document (No. 309) made headlines. In it the German Embassy in Rome reported, "In his heart, one is assured time and again, Pius XII stands on the side of the Axis powers." The news stories did not mention that the same report added, however, that the Pope was unwilling publicly to take a stand against Russia because he feared "that after the defeat of Bolshevism, the Catholic Church, and indeed all Christianity, would, so to speak, go from the frying pan into the fire." The Italian Ambassador in Document No. 330 said Pius XII complained that "Germany was the first in making every effort to get along with Bolshevism, not the Holy See," a reference to the Hitler-Stalin pact. "If I should talk of Bolshevism," the Pope asked him, "should I then say nothing about Nazism?" The Pope deplored "that parody of Our Father" in which German children were taught to "thank Hitler for their daily bread" and said he had been "told long ago" that if Hitler won, he would "do away with the Vatican, because there was no place for it in the new European order."

Eyewitness in The Congo, P. 2

President Johnson Shows His Anger Over War-Mongering Press Speculation on Vietnam

"Q. Mr. President, is expansion of the Vietnam war into Laos or North Vietnam a live possibility at this point?

"A. I think Mr. [Malcolm] Kilduff [assistant White House press secretary] reviewed with you yesterday the feelings of this Administration [when he advised the press not to expect "any great horrendous decision"]. . . . When you crawl out on a limb, you always have to find another one to crawl back on. And I have just been sitting here in the serene atmosphere of the Pedernales for the last few days reading about the wars that you have involved us in, and the additional undertakings that I have made decisions on, or that General Taylor has recommended, or that Mr. McNamara plans, or that Secretary Rusk envisages. . . . Some people are speculating and taking positions that are somewhat premature. . . . In retrospect, as you look back over your writings . . . they're somewhat similar. . . . I don't know whether you have a blacksheet that you take out and every time we have a meeting on it [Vietnam], rewrite it. But at Honolulu we had these dire predictions. . . . I anticipate that there will be no dramatic announcement to come out of these meetings, except in the form of your speculations." —LBJ at his ranch Nov. 28.

VOL. XII, NO. 41 DECEMBER 7, 1964 WASHINGTON, D. C. 15 CENTS

LBJ's Historic Opportunity for Peace

The crises in foreign policy which confronted President Johnson on his return to Washington may be summed up in one question. Is our objective to build a more stable world, or to dominate the earth? Whether we look at Southeast Asia, or at the Congo, or at the conflict in NATO over MLF, or at the split threatening the UN, we see stresses developed by U.S. insistence on having its own way. If it were possible to impose a Pax Americana on the globe, Roman style, the salutary end might justify the painful means. But the number of our missiles is a delusive measure of our power. These give us the capacity to destroy the world, but not to make it obey us. The Vietcong peasant with his home-made shotgun, the Congolese rebel with his spear, de Gaulle with his nuclear slingshot, illustrate difficulties our superiority in firepower, though fantastic, cannot overcome. We cannot impose our will on Asia nor on Africa nor on a recovered Western Europe. "We made a mistake in going in there," Senator Russell said of Vietnam after a visit to the LBJ ranch Nov. 25, "but I can't figure out any way to get out without scaring the rest of the world." What will frighten the world more is if we persist in wasting our strength trying to solve complex problems by military means. Nothing would reassure it more than to see us use our resources to take the leadership in a struggle of a very different sort, for a safer world.

A Wilful Horse

This is the choice the President must make. "Never since 1945," the British Left Laborite Michael Foot wrote in the London Tribune (Nov. 27) on the eve of Prime Minister Wilson's visit to Washington, "has an American President occupied a better posture from which he can launch a real initiative for peace." His electoral victory gives Mr. Johnson in the next few months a power for peace he is unlikely ever to have again. But to use it he has to exercise leadership of an unmistakable kind. The military, diplomatic and intelligence bureaucracies of this country's government, like most of its press, are geared to permanent cold war and rendered insecure by any turn toward relaxation of tension. Only a strong President, freshly elected by an overwhelming majority, can take initiatives which go against the grain of this mammoth apparatus. Mr. Johnson complained at his ranch last weekend of the warmongering in the U.S. press about Vietnam. His complaint was justified. But as an experienced Washington hand he also must know that these were planted stories intended to deprive him of freedom to decide freshly just what he wants to do.

As Mr. Johnson approaches his hour of decision, he cannot do better than remember the humiliating disaster to which John F. Kennedy was led at the Bay of Pigs in the very first months of a new Administration. The outcome demonstrated that the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the CIA for all their resources were incapable soberly of assessing the situation in a little country as close to us as Cuba. The same apparatus is now urging expansion of the war in Southeast Asia and deeper involvement in the Congo, which may easily become a second Vietnam. That Rube Goldberg device, the MLF, is another product of the same bureaucratic labyrinth, as is our collision course at the UN on the question of peace-keeping costs. Mr.

As Labor's Left Sees MLF

"I regard with gloom the prospect of the first international act of the Labour Government having to go off to Washington to sign on as 'Tail-End Charlies' in an American nuclear bomber with a German co-pilot. . . . The present situation does not call for any immediate measures to strengthen NATO but rather . . . of how to get on with disarmament. . . . The crisis [in NATO] is being brought about by the fact that the U.S. wishes to appease the West German desire for nuclear weapons. . . . We should take our stand on the UN Charter and not on the military alliances. . . . Unless and until Germany agrees to accept her frontiers . . . we should be totally opposed to any more armaments for Germany. . . . We should give notice that . . . in case they go on with policies we consider provocative such as the MLF, we will start pulling our troops back from NATO . . . and using the money for our economic and social program at home."

—Konni Zilliacus in the House of Commons, Nov. 23.

A French Correspondent, Just Back From The Congo, on The Savagery We Don't Hear About

Tshombe Would Fall Without White Mercenaries and U.S. Arms Aid

By Emile Lejeune*

When I returned to Paris, I saw in a large evening newspaper, spread across 8 columns, a horrible headline: "Stanleyville Hostages Wait to Be Eaten". I did not recall that one could push indecency so far, nor that one could exploit horror to such a point. What the hostages feared was not cannabalism. It was death, and that was enough. Everything in this story is hateful: from the very idea of hostages up to the assassination by his own troops of the revolutionary chief who tried to stop the massacre of the whites.

One will never be able to say enough about the hideous senselessness of these murders. But one could at least demand that emotion make no distinction between victims of different color and that indignation not be so cynically selective. For in the course of the last four months I have seen planes strafe and burn dozens of villages. I have seen tens of thousands of peasants exterminated in the bush by the army of M. Tschombé. Their corpses are still there; the stench hangs over the streets and the fields of a ruined country.

Double Standard

Who cares? Only when the troops of General Olenga, commander of the Armée Populaire (termed "a band of rebels"), threatened to execute white hostages did the civilized world, as it is termed, notice that a savage war was raging in the Congo, one that did not spare civilians. No voice is ever raised in the Western world in favor of the Africans. Those elements of the Congolese army which swept through the Albertville area like a flaming lance set fire to all the villages in the region of Fizzi and of Baraka. That was the mission assigned them. They grilled alive all the men and women they encountered. These were their orders. Only the children were spared. No government intervened. There is one law for the Whites and another for the Blacks.

For six months the Tschombé government has stayed in power thanks only to white support. Only mercenaries, come from Rhodesia and South Africa for the pleasure of "cracking Negro heads", have made it possible ~~to~~ stop and then to push back the revolutionary wave. Tschombe's military adviser is a Belgian, Colonel Van de Walle. The planes which supply the regular forces are American, piloted by Americans. The pursuit planes which machine-gun and bombard the Soumialist troops and the villages which have joined the rebellion are American and piloted by anti-Castro Cubans. Massacred by the American and Belgian military, the insurgents threatened to revenge themselves on American and Belgian civilians. That's abominable, but it is not astonishing.

Where would the Congo be today without foreign intervention? It would probably be in the hands of the rebels. No force seems able to stop them. The Katanga gendarmes? For several weeks after his accession to power, M. Tschombe thought that he could make them the spearhead of the Congolese army. He was wrong: the gendarmes began by demanding their back pay. Then they asked an advance. Finally, they refused to fight. At Bukavu their weapons served to intimidate the street-walkers when the girls demanded pay.

Why make your livelihood in the risks of combat if you can do better by pillaging and by selling arms to the rebels? That's how they see it in the Congolese army.

Unable to wage pitched battles with their rudimentary weapons (which very often were not firearms), the troops of Gaston Soumialot are learning today in blood and fire the hard lesson of the Algerian and Indochinese peasants: how to wage guerrilla war. Thanks to these methods, Pierre Mulele has been able to defy the legal authorities for a year. M. Tschombé can win military victories, Belgian parachutists can retake Stanleyville, but peace cannot be reestablished that way any more than in South Vietnam. Achieving power after the murder of Lumumba by the grace of the mining companies; victorious, thanks to white mercenaries and foreign armies; rejected by the Organization of African Unity and by the third world as a whole, M. Tschombe has no way of rallying the Congolese nation to his banner.

The One Safe Way Out

"If the U.S. and Belgium continue to back Tshombe militarily, they will find themselves opposed not only by the Congolese rebels but by most of Africa. . . . There is only one way in which the Belgians and the Americans can extricate themselves from the present situation in the Congo and damp down the dangerous anti-Western feelings which are inflaming Africa. They should publicly identify themselves with the Organization of African Unity's insistence on a cease-fire in the Congo to be followed by political reconciliation. . . . They should then seek agreement with the OAU to secure the quarantining of the Congo from all foreign military intervention through a new initiative at the UN. . . . If the West genuinely proposes to disengage itself from the Congo, the Russians will support an OAU-UN initiative. Their own interests are involved in securing Western and Chinese disengagement."

—Colin Legum in The (London) Observer, Nov. 29.

 M. Lejeune, just back from the Congo, wrote this for the splendid first issue of Le Nouvel Observateur (Nov. 26) the new French liberal weekly (10 rue des Pyramides, Paris 1er) edited by Jean Daniel, formerly of L'Express.

Two Senators Warned Last August Against U. S. Intervention in the Congo Rebellion

"Mr. President, yesterday's announcement that the U.S. is sending 4 Air Force transports and 106 American fighting men, including 40 paratroopers, to the Congo arouses my apprehension. . . . Is this but the first of a series of steps? . . . Will it be followed by others which gradually escalate our efforts, so that ultimately we shall be involved in another undeclared war, as in Vietnam?"

—Stennis (D. Miss.) in the Senate Aug. 14.

"The news of increased U.S. involvement in the Congolese revolution is disturbing. . . . Already it appears that three Americans have lost their lives in the tribal rebellion in Kivu province. Before long more American lives are likely to be lost if our unilateral participation continues to increase. . . . The jungle of emergent African politics is marked with pitfalls for the unwary outsider."

—Mansfield (D. Mont.) in the Senate Aug. 21.

Mississippi Negro Farmers Unrepresented on Loan and Crop Committees

Secretary of Agriculture Promises Action on Rural Discrimination

A Negro's life in the rural South can be utterly wretched when U.S. farm programs are run by and for whites only. And that is just how they are being run in Mississippi. To give Washington a worm's-eye view of the problem, the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee recently brought nine Mississippi Negroes here. Their stories, which they told at a little noticed public hearing, were so painful that they inspired a meeting at the Department of Agriculture with all its top officials, including Secretary Freeman.

"The White Man Takes Your Land"

Charles Dixon, who farms 27 acres in Holmes county, told why until this year he had not applied to the Farmer's Home Administration for a loan to build a new home for his wife and ten children. They now live in a one room building with three beds, two for four children each and "two in bed with me and my wife." "I was afraid," Dixon explained. "I didn't apply because I thought I would lose my land too. . . . All they [the FHA] want you to do is miss one payment, and the white man takes your land." No regular member of the 82 FHA county committees is a Negro, even though Negroes constitute 62% of the farm population, and committee members are appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

There also are no Negroes on the all-important Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation (ASC) committees. They administer the crop allotment program; that is, they decide how much of his land a farmer may plant. The ASC county committees are elected. When asked why he didn't vote this year, Dixon said he never received a ballot. Just last week in Panaloa county, the ASC chairmen tried to intimidate ten Negroes who had been nominated for places on the county committee. Four of them withdrew their names, but the Agriculture Department had three of the names restored.

The cruelest discrimination takes place in the Surplus Food Program. The food is supposed to go to impoverished families. Sometimes county officials don't request the food from Washington because they know 90% of it will go to Negroes. Some food items that are requested have a way of being sidetracked into white retail establishments where they are sold to the public. At the SNCC meeting, Fannie Lou Hamer, who ran for Congress on the Freedom Democratic Party ticket, testified that she had never seen butter among the surplus food although it is supposed to be there. When a relative of hers went to the local grocery store, he came back bearing a crate in which butter had been packaged. It bore the label, "U.S. Surplus Food—Not For Sale."

Speaking of Savages

"At least 50 persons were partner to the conspiracy to murder Mr. Schwerner, it is believed here. As for motivation for murder, it is suggested by some that the Klan mob was worked up to an embittered conviction that the state was facing an invasion by Yankee beatniks, Jews and other 'scum' and decided to make Mr. Schwerner an example. . . . Even today there are Philadelphians who say they cannot comprehend 'all this fuss over two Jews and a nigger.'"

—Homer Bigart in the New York Times, Nov. 29.

Secretary Freeman is said to have been shocked by some of these revelations. He committed his Department to remedial action. He already has ordered an investigation of the surplus food program. In addition, he promised to appoint Negroes to the three-man FHA county committees and to the state ASC committees in Mississippi. Similar appointments in the past have been selected from the ranks of "Uncle Toms." This time they will be chosen from a list drawn up by COFO workers. Freeman also promised to establish an Ad Hoc Negro Advisory Board to report on the administration of all the Department's programs. Each county will have one Negro advisor. They will meet every month, expenses paid, with a Department consultant in each of Mississippi's six congressional districts. The consultants will in turn fly to Washington for monthly meetings with the Secretary. Freeman is moving just in time. The Civil Rights Commission is about to issue a report on discrimination in his Department's programs. The test of his commitment will come January 1, the date on which appointments to FHA and ASC committees must be made. If he doesn't follow through, it will be a blow to the war on poverty. Rural Mississippi counties are among the poorest in the country.

A Half Century Ago Hoover Regarded the Negro Rights Movement With Suspicion

In his outburst about Martin Luther King, J. Edgar Hoover was running true to form. For nearly a half century Hoover has regarded the movement for Negro equality with suspicion.* Forty-five years ago Hoover was made chief of a new division in the FBI to deal with sedition. Among its earliest reports were two which dealt with "agitation" among Negroes. "The reds have done a vast amount of evil damage," said a report sent to Congress late in 1919, "by carrying doctrines of race revolt" to Negroes. A collection of articles from the Negro press was captioned, "Radicalism and Sedition Among the Negroes as Reflected in Their Publications." One quotation said, "The colored people . . . must arouse themselves to the fullness of their powers and inherent rights." Apparently Hoover regarded this as subversive.

With World War II, the Negro became strong enough politically to demand Federal enforcement of his civil rights. Hoover opposed this. In a letter to the Attorney General in 1946, he argued that the FBI was "expending a considerable amount of manpower" investigating crimes in the South "in which there cannot conceivably be any violation of a Federal statute." He felt it was "a mistake for the Department to accept for investigation so many of these cases."

Hoover's animosity to the Negro was again visible in the first public speech he made since the protests stirred by the press conference in which he attacked the Rev. King. In his "Sword of Loyola" award speech in Chicago Nov. 24 he pledged that the FBI would remain "objective in its investigations" and spoke of pressure groups "which would crush the rights of others under heel in order to achieve their own ends" and accused them of "carping, lying and exaggerating." A few more speeches of this kind and somebody's liable to award Hoover an honorary nightshirt.

Germany's Socialists Are The Only Ones In Europe to Approve the MLF

Johnson has mounted a wilful horse, which can carry him off to one bad spill after another, if he does not make it clear now, who is the master.

A Fresh Look Before A Fresh Plunge

The country needs and deserves a fresh look at a whole series of stale situations. The same military and political advisers who persuaded Mr. Johnson to call the inglorious Diem "the Churchill of Asia" on his visit to Vietnam in 1961 would drag him deeper into that morass. The demonologists who continue to see the colonial upsurge as a Communist plot would commit us further to military support of Tshombe in the Congo against the will of all Africa. Never was a more complex tangle reduced to a more simpleminded melodrama than to represent the intricate tribal rivalries and elitist aspirations in the Congo as a long-range seduction from Moscow and/or Peking. The question in the Congo is not the right to rescue citizens in trouble, but the wisdom of policies which got them into trouble. Beginning last spring we identified the U.S. with Tshombe by placing U.S. planes and military men, "counter-insurgency" experts and the CIA, at his disposal in the savage war of extermination (See P. 2) he has been waging against rebellious provinces, a war that has made Americans hated in the Congo.

Above all the President needs to free himself from the imprisoning web spun by his bureaucracies on the MLF. Its rejection by Belgium, the attack upon it by the new British Prime Minister in the Commons last Monday, the statement by Chairman Chet Holifield of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy that he has "grave doubts" about the project should warn Mr. Johnson that it faces a growing storm at home and abroad. Kennedy was dubious of this contraption. If Mr. Johnson wants to know why it creates such disquiet in both Western and Eastern Europe, let him ask his aides for a full report on the party conference held last week by Germany's Social Democrats. Behind the podium was a huge map of Germany in its 1937 frontiers; to achieve them would require war or atomic blackmail against Poland and Russia. Equivocal support was given the hopes of the Sudeten Germans for a return to the Czechoslovakia they dismembered with Hitler in 1938. (Anatole Shub from Karlsruhe in the Washington Post, Nov. 27.) When Max Brauer, the venerable former Burgomaster of Hamburg, pleaded with the delegates that the MLF "ghost fleet" would violate the ancient customs of the sea by pretending to be merchantmen (Die Welt, Nov. 27), his protest drew little echo. The conference voted for MLF though its opponents pointed out that this would mean that they would be the only Socialists in Europe to approve the project (London Times, Nov. 27). The scene must recall in both Belgium and the East how the majority German Socialists rallied to the Kaiser in 1914. Under cover of a cry about strengthening NATO, we are strengthening a revanchist Germany. In doing so we are blighting the hope of progress toward an easing of the arms burden and the war fear. "A defense policy which does not contain within itself the seeds of further progress towards disarmament," Prime Minister Wilson told the Commons last Monday, "is one which in the present state of the world, we can no longer regard as appropriate." These are the warnings and the voices Mr. Johnson should heed before he finds himself and the country propelled into a sea of troubles.

What Vietnam's Civilians May Not Understand

"Whatever the outcome of South Vietnam's war for survival the U.S. Armed Forces will emerge from it vastly better prepared to cope with guerrilla-type wars —the most likely sort of conflict in the years ahead. . . . There are now about 20,000 U.S. military men advising and training South Vietnamese forces. . . . Thousands more are likely to get their turns before that war is finished. It all adds up to a body of experience that may pay important dividends in future operations elsewhere. . . . All of this 'on the job' training has had its price—U.S. casualties in a three-year campaign are creeping toward the 2,000-mark in dead, wounded and missing. But for the first time in American history this Country may, as a result, be ready for new conflicts and military challenge with the weapons of the future rather than with those of past wars. The men on the line in South Vietnam understand this, though the civilian population may not."

The Truth About the Vietnamese War As Seen By Our Experts on China's Doorstep

"Hong Kong—Hope that an accommodation with Communist China might provide an alternative to either the present effort or a military escalation in South Vietnam is regarded as wildly optimistic by most China experts here. . . . Even if Peking chose to call off the war in Southeast Asia, it probably lacks influence in Hanoi and among the Vietcong. . . . Even with Chinese moral support and the limited supply of arms and men from North Vietnam, the struggle in the South has been and remains largely a native Communist rebellion. . . The analysts here believe that in the event a policy decision is taken to cautiously escalate the war . . . and even puts the U.S. in a strong enough position to negotiate for a settlement, the bargaining would have to be done primarily with Ho Chi Minh, not Mao Tse-tung. In fact, Ho with his inherent Vietnamese distrust and fear of the Chinese is probably the man we should be secretly feeling out now and perhaps already are."—Richard Critchfield in the Washington Star, Dec. 3.

If Only Neshoba County Were In The Congo

If the U.S. felt as deeply about racist murders in Mississippi as it does about racist murders in the Congo, there is much it could do as a government and as a people. It would be utopian to expect paratroopers to be dropped on Jackson to protect Negroes endangered by a State virtually in rebellion as we dropped paratroopers on Stanleyville. It may not be possible even to force an impartial trial of the men arrested for the murders of the three martyred civil rights workers, Schwerner, Goodman and Chaney, a crime unpunished for six months, though the circumstances have been an open secret in the community, where their killing was cold-bloodedly arranged. But the Federal government, the Congress and the better conscience of the country have immediate means to act against the system of white supremacy which these murders, like countless forgotten others in the years since Reconstruction, were meant to enforce by naked terror. This is what could be done:

The Crime of 1890

The right of Mississippi's five Congressmen to their seats could be denied when Congress convenes next month until it has passed on the suits filed here a few days ago to contest their election. These suits call sharply to public attention for the first time in this generation that the State of Mississippi has been violating the conditions under which it was readmitted to the Union in 1870. One of those conditions was that the "Constitution of Mississippi shall never be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or class of citizen of the United States of the right to vote who are entitled to vote by the constitution herein recognized." The words are those of the 1870 statute readmitting Mississippi to the Union. The constitution "herein recognized" was that of 1869 which granted the vote to all male inhabitants 21 or over who had resided in Mississippi for six months and were not insane. Since 1890, when there were 70,000 more registered Negro voters than whites in Mississippi, the State has embarked on a series of discriminatory election law changes which have reduced the number of registered Negro voters from 189,884 in 1890 to 23,801 in 1961. There could not be a clearer case of electoral fraud and racial oppression.

In three of the five Congressional districts, the seats are contested by three candidates of the Mississippi Freedom Party, Fannie Lou Hamer, Victoria Gray and Annie Devine. They claim that the elections held by their party were the only ones which conform to the non-discriminatory standards established by Congress when Mississippi was readmitted to the Union. Four years ago, in the election contest of Roush v. Chambers, the House by resolution refused to allow Chambers to take the oath of office though certified by the Indiana Secretary of State. Both men were given pay as Congressmen, office space and the privileges of the floor until the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections had reported and the House acted, when the contestant Roush was awarded the seat. There could be no better rebuke to the racist atmosphere which condones the killings of the martyred three than the passage of a similar "in all fairness" resolution when Congress convenes giving these three brave Negro women the privilege of the floor until their challenges have been decided. The effect, the world over, would be electric as a symbol of America's determination to see racial justice done.

The liberal "Study Group" in the House, which hopes to see its number increase to 175 with the new session, should

Detente Preferred to MLF

We hope that on the eve of the Johnson-Wilson talks the White House noted two developments imperfectly covered in the U. S. press. One is the rising opposition in Congress to MLF: the latest dissents were those of Sen. McGovern and Reps. Brademas and Reuss—these two on their return from Europe reported even the Germans privately lukewarm to MLF. The other was the action taken by the Western European Union, the "Parliament of NATO." Its resolution for a European nuclear force, which our press represented as an endorsement of MLF, was passed only after all reference to MLF in it had been excluded; even then the vote was only 37 to 15 with 9 abstentions. But a resolution unreported here calling on the NATO powers "to make east-west arms control and the normalization of relations between European powers the overriding aims of their foreign and defense policies" (London Times, Dec. 3) was passed unanimously. The W.E.U. preferred detente to MLF.

What British Critics Said of The Weekly—

These were among the reviews which greeted "The Haunted Fifties", a collection of the best pieces from the first ten years of the WEEKLY, when it was published in England this year. What better gift for your friends than a subscription? You can send it to them at the special holiday rates on the opposite side of this flap and you can add a copy of The Haunted Fifties for yourself or them at only $4.95 additional. Just add that to your check.

"Among the lonely dissenters of American politics, none has been more intrepid or articulate than I. F. Stone . . . he has become the self-appointed spokesman of America's bowed but still unbroken radical Left . . . a courageous reporter who has never hesitated to speak his mind. He has an engaging sense of humor, an analytical ability to put isolated news items into coherent perspective, and an indefatigable energy. . . ."

Ronald Steel in The Observer

"If The Haunted Fifties proves one thing, it is that in the United States of today, H. L. Mencken has an heir. As a live reporter, as a merchant of ridicule, as a pamphleteering pugilist, Stone is at the very top of the league."

Anthony Howard in The New Statesman

"It is not only the vivid language, however, that makes these pieces worth preserving in hard covers. It is also the attitude from which they are written. Whether digging out what scientists have to say about anti-missile missiles or what politicians have said before Congressional committees, Stone's aim is the same. It is to cut through the candy floss of official statements and conventional wisdom to the truth beneath. He is the dedicated enemy of liars, no matter where or what they are. He is a great journalist and a true disciple of Thomas Paine. This is a wonderful book for raising one's spirits."

Raymond Fletcher in The Tribune

"Mr. Stone is the main Washington gadfly. He dislikes and distrusts the American Establishment . . . he pulls no punches and plays no favorites . . . this is a lively and welcome book."

Former FCC Official Says It Promotes Instead of Regulating Telephone Monopoly

Break-Up of A.T. & T. Super-Giant (Into 35 Little Giants) Urged

For almost two-thirds of a century the government has tried to prevent the American Telephone and Telegraph Co. from monopolizing the nation's telecommunications. So far it has failed. A.T.&T. has become the world's largest corporation (see box at right) and is now about to put its only remaining nationwide competitor, Western Union, out of business. This prospect caused the Federal Communications Commission in 1962 to order a Domestic Telegraph Investigation. At hearings last month, Prof. Dallas Smythe, formerly Chief Economist for the FCC and now at Saskatchewan University, proposed a "final solution" to the A.T.&T. problem. He would break it into 30 to 35 separate pieces. Each of its regional companies would become independent. So would Bell Telephone Laboratories, A.T.&T.'s long distance operations, and Western Electric, which manufactures 90% of U.S. telephone equipment. Average total assets of the independent units would be approximately $800 million each!

AT&T = U.S. Steel + GM + Esso (N.J.)

"Bell System revenues in 1959 were larger than the combined national public revenues of Canada and Sweden. They were $2 billion larger than the combined national public revenues of Denmark, Norway, Sweden and Finland. They were $2 billion larger than the public revenues of Italy. . . . . . . To equal the total assets of the Bell System at the end of 1959, it would be necessary to add together the total assets of Standard Oil of New Jersey, General Motors and the U.S. Steel Corporation."

—Prof. Dallas Smythe, before the FCC, Nov. 4.

The Pentagon Speaks Up For A.T.&T.

This was heresy. A.T.&T.'s counsel urged that it be stricken from the record. Within the space of a few moments he managed to call it "scurrilous," "vituperative," "unsupported," "irrelevant," "unwarranted," "irresponsible," "frivolous," "abusive," and "defamatory." The Defense Department's spokesman supported the A.T.&T. objection. Smythe's testimony, he said, was "a discussion of law by a non-expert." We recollect a similar favor in 1956: A.T.&T. was permitted to ghost-write the letter that Secretary of Defense Wilson sent to the Justice Department recommending that A.T.&T. not be divested of control over Western Electric, a favorite defense contractor.

Smythe has been the only witness so far to recommend dissolution of the Bell System. Not too long ago such ideas were commonplace. Pres. Wilson's Postmaster General recommended public ownership of the entire telephone and telegraph industry. Congressional committees had reported favorably on the idea no less than 17 times. Instead the Justice Department chose to compromise. It required A.T.&T. only to divest itself of Western Union stock with the implicit understanding that it would stay out of the telegraph business. Today 42% of domestic telegraph revenue goes to A.T.&T.

The Hoover Commission reported in 1948 that "any real regulation of the telephone industry continues to remain a matter of statutory hope." Smythe's testimony shows how little has changed since then. The FCC, despite much congressional criticism, still sets most A.T.&T. rates on the basis of informal negotiations. All other federal regulatory agencies hold formal rate hearings. FCC officials conceded to The New York Times November 26 that "the negotiation procedure might yield slightly higher rates than those that could be established by a unilateral order." Smythe, who examined a transcript of the 1961-63 meetings, was more blunt. The Commission's attitude, he said, "is one of deference bordering on collaboration." The meetings are private. Industry presents its own witnesses, examines them, cross-examines Commission witnesses, if there are any, and calls rebuttal witnesses. "The telephone rate payers," he said, "get a species of star chamber treatment."

Sloppy regulation has permitted A.T.&T. to subsidize its expansion into the telegraph business at the expense of telephone users. This, Smythe said, can be seen from a comparison of earnings: a 10.7% return on private line telephone business but less than 2% on private line telegraph. This loss-leader pricing long went unnoticed by the Commission because it looked only at A.T.&T.'s overall rate of return, about 8%. The cost to the consumer of this and similar monopoly practices has never been adequately measured. It is impossible to know, for example, the price of telephone equipment in a competitive market when Western Electric has eliminated all competition. Since it controls Western Electric, A.T.&T. has little interest in reduced equipment prices; it can pass the cost on to the consumer. The abortive anti-trust prosecution in 1949 to separate Western and A.T.&T. concluded with the three participating federal agencies (Defense, Justice and FCC) all recommending the position taken by A.T.&T. That leaves only Prof. Smythe, and the American Communications Assoc. for which he spoke, representing the public.

Latest Cut In Telephone Rates Still $50 Million Less Than FCC Staff Recommended

The FCC's order for a $100 million cut in A.T.&T.'s long distance telephone rates will do more for the agency's public image than for the public itself. The inadequacy of the reduction has been pointed out in The Wash. Daily News (Dec. 1) by Rice Odell, the only Washington reporter who seems to speak critically of A.T.&T. The cut is supposed to lower A.T.&T.'s rate of return to 7 per cent, but the FCC's staff has repeatedly suggested that a 6.5 per cent return is adequate. The difference: $50 million a year.

It seems doubtful, Odell wrote, that the reduction will lower A.T.&T.'s earning even to 7 per cent. Normal growth in demand and the decreasing cost of electronic equipment have frustrated past attempts to reduce returns to this point. In 1963 the Commission ordered a similarly large reduction but earnings remained at 7.5 per cent. Twelve months later they were at 7.7 per cent and today are at 8 per cent or more. In 1959 the Commission ordered a $50 million rate reduction that also was expected to bring the earnings level down to 7 per cent. Instead, earnings were at a record 7.9 per cent in 1959.

As mild as the reduction was the reaction of Mr. Kappel, A.T.&T.'s Chairman. "The Commission has now insisted on rate reductions larger than we think justified," he said. But he offered, magnanimously, not to appeal the decision.

After 30 Years, Isn't It Time To Abolish This Excrescence on A Free Society?

WSP Slyly Sends Flowers, and 100 Leading Lawyers A Brickbat, to HUAC

Anyone watching Channel 5 Sunday night Dec. 6 and hearing former President Truman describe the Un-American Activities Committee again as "the most un-American committee in the government" might have imagined it a thing of the past, linked as it was in that "Great Moments" show with a line of similar horrors back to the Salem witch hunt. But next morning there it was on Capitol Hill still in business. It had subpoenaed Dagmar Wilson and Donna Allen of Women's Strike for Peace and Russell Nixon of the National Guardian. Object: what happened when the two women visited the State Dept. in Nov. 1963 to urge an entry visa for Prof. K. Yasui, of the Japan Council Against the A and H Bomb. Yasui's subsequent lecture tour was sponsored by the Guardian.

You Can't Be Too Careful

After an all-day wrangle in which the witnesses refused to testify except in public session and the subcommittee* threatened contempt proceedings, it turned out that this was to be the tenth in a series of secret hearings begun last February to investigate "whether certain executive agencies of the government [Justice and State] in permitting by special waiver the entrance into the U.S. of aliens inadmissible under the Immigration and Nationality Act [i.e. persons suspected of Communism] are acting in accord with the security interests of the United States." The two women peace leaders later told reporters they were subpoenaed because they were the only two to go in person to the State Department to ask a visa for Yasui. The target of the investigation this time is not Women's Strike for Peace or the Guardian but State, a department HUAC (like McCarthy before it) regards with suspicion. It's just safer for discreet citizens not to go there.

Last time HUAC had Dagmar Wilson before it, the Committee didn't do so well. This time it wanted to hear her first in private. The executive session, in the long history of the witch hunt, has usually served not as a way of protecting witnesses but the committee. It provides a dress rehearsal. The three witnesses by refusing to testify except in open session put the committee on the spot since any contempt action must be filed before the year end. With Congress out of session, this requires action by the Speaker, McCormack. There ought to be pressure on him to refuse, especially since he and the late Congressman Dickstein of New York launched this monstrosity on its career just 30 years ago as the Dickstein-McCormack committee to investigate un-American propaganda. It was aimed at the Nazis but soon turned, in the hands of Dies of Texas, into an anti-New Deal smear factory.

Heart of the Abolition Petition

"The Committee on Un-American Activities . . . has attempted to create in the legislative branch a permanent institution, consisting of staff, files, informants and similar machinery, designed to serve as a bureaucratic Big Brother to censor the opinions and associations of American citizens. . . .

"We do not suggest the abandonment of all legislative machinery for investigation of matters pertaining to legislation necessary for assuring internal security. . . . Adequate authority for these purposes is already vested in . . . the Committee of the Judiciary (which) . . . now has jurisdiction over 'bankruptcy, mutiny, espionage and counterfeiting.' . . . In the event members of the House feel that the authority of the Committee should be clarified, however, this can readily be accomplished by amendment. In order to avoid perpetuation of the problems noted previously, such an amendment should make clear that the Judiciary Committee has power to investigate overt actions but not 'propaganda' or other forms of expression or association. . . .

"There remains the question of disposing of the files of the Committee on Un-American Activities . . . containing miscellaneous and often inaccurate data about millions of citizens. . . . Self-respecting citizens of a democratic country cannot allow their representatives in government to keep dossiers on their beliefs, ideas, political views or associations. . . . We recommend that the files be transferred to the Archives, not to be open for official or public inspection for 50 years."

—Petition for abolition of HUAC.

While Women's Strike for Peace, with sly and subversive femininity, flooded the hearing room and the corridors outside with flowers wired from all over the country (roses were individually offered to each subcommittee member but patriotically rejected), 100 constitutional lawyers hurled a formidable brickbat at HUAC: a petition (see box below) calling for its abolition. Thurman Arnold and Henry Steele Commager were among the distinguished signers. The time to act is when Congress reconvenes.

 Two lame-ducks defeated in the last election, Johansen (R. Mich.), and Bruce (R. Ind.). The other two were Ichord and Poole (D. Tex.) who chaired the hearing.

Swedish Double Agent Says We Began Mapping Soviet Bomb Targets 10 Years Before U-2

Some fresh revelations about the cold war were inadvertently supplied by the Senate Internal Security Committee in translating and releasing the testimony of Col. Stig Wennerstroem, recently convicted as a Soviet agent in Sweden. The testimony discloses that he began his spying activity as a U.S. agent with "a feeling of sympathy for NATO and an antipathy for the Soviet Union." The occasion for the shift in sympathies, he explained, "was that it became quite clear in my mind that the Soviet intelligence service was purely defensively oriented, while the American one was offensively oriented."

Wennerstroem testified that the U.S. began sending reconnaissance planes over the Soviet Union ten years before the U-2 spy-plane incident of 1960. The purpose "was to obtain information on bombing targets." He said the operation also made use of tourists inside Russia. When Soviet air defenses developed the range to hit these earlier spy planes, the U.S. resorted to higher-flying and unmanned balloons.

The Wennerstroem transcript also threw new light on the U.S. planes shot down along the East German border, the latest one last March. U.S. officials said they had strayed accidentally into East German territory. Wennerstroem testified they were using special radio equipment to contact secret agents inside Russia. The altitude permitted communication at longer distances than from the ground.

For 40 Days MFDP Counsel May Do What Justice Dept. Should Be Doing declare this its No. 1 Battle. It will make a mistake if it limits itself to an attack on the seniority and party privileges of Mississippi's John Bell Williams and South Carolina's Albert W. Watson for having supported Goldwater. The White House is reported ready to forget and forgive such peccadilloes; if this is true, it will pull the rug out from under the liberals. But the issue of the Mississippi elections can be fought independently of the White House. Though the elections subcommittee is chaired by Ashmore of South Carolina and all but one of its Democrats is a Southerner, it must submit a recommendation to the House. If sufficient pressure is generated, it can be forced to hold hearings on the evidence which will be submitted to it. Under the rules governing such contests, the seats will remain in doubt at least until next July. By then the Supreme Court will have heard and may have decided the case of U. S. v. Mississippi in which the Justice Department is asking that all the discriminatory voter laws enacted by Mississippi since 1890 be declared unconstitutional. The laws attacked in the election contests are the same ones attacked by the government in its suit. This offers the House liberals powerful leverage.

A Hitherto Unused Weapon

Whatever the liberal Congressmen do, the election laws give the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party a novel weapon. Within 40 days of the filing (Dec. 3-4), the Congressmen must furnish their answers. Within the period of 40 days from their answer, which will begin in January, attorneys for those bringing the challenges are empowered by law to issue subpoenas and take sworn testimony from anyone in Mississippi who has information bearing on the alleged illegality of the elections. During that period volunteer teams of counsel can do what the Department of Justice and the Civil Rights Commission ought to be doing. The challenges rest in part on acts of terror to discourage the voter registration drive. Many of these are alleged against Mississippi law enforcement officers themselves. Such acts are a clear violation of the Federal civil rights laws even as most narrowly construed, and the interrogations should lay the basis not only for a successful election contest but for Federal prosecutions. Wm. Kunstler and Arthur Kinoy, counsel for the MFDP, have already served notice on the Attorney General and the Civil Rights Commission of their plans and asked that observers be assigned to go with these teams of lawyers, to pave the way for prosecution where warranted. During those 40 days much can be accomplished if enough volunteers and funds can be mustered. A memorial fund to the Martyred Three is being established thus to attack the racially stacked electoral system they fought against at the expense of their lives. (The MFDP's Washington headquarters, for the memorial fund and volunteers, is at 1353 U Street, Northwest).

Those whose consciences are stirred may also by letter and otherwise bring pressure directly upon the White House (1) to make sure that the FBI and Federal marshals provide protection to the lawyer-teams in the election challenge and (2) speed up action under the new regulations for withholding Federal funds from communities which practice segregation. This is what Mississippi most fears.

We hope California readers will give utmost support to the students at Berkeley; college students willing to fight for free speech and association are all too rare on today's campuses. . . . We deplore the resignation of Ronald Hilton as director of the Hispanic American Report at Stanford and the end of this irreplaceable source of information on hemispheric affairs. Hilton was the first to expose the training camps in Guatemala for the Bay of Pigs invasion; his was an independent and sympathetic Latin American scholarship all too rare in the U.S. . . . A distinguished reader, Erwin Panofsky of Princeton, asks us to correct the error in the Nov. 30 issue which referred to Pius XI when Pius IX was meant. We regret the injustice to a Pope, "I and many other scholars of my generation," Dr. Panofsky writes, "fondly remember as Mons. Achille Ratti, the kindly and ever helpful prefect of the Ambrosian Library in Milan." . . . We salute the death at 80 in Philadelphia of David Levinson, a lawyer who fought all his life long for justice to the oppressed.

The Early Distant Warning Out of the Congo

United Nations, N.Y.

It is a pity more Americans could not have seen the events of the past week through African and Negro eyes from the vantage point of the UN debate on the Congo. The summary dismissal of charges against the accused killers of the three civil rights workers in Mississippi, the refusal to hear the confession by one of the accused, could not have come at a more terrible moment. Mr. Botsio of Ghana, on the opening day of the Congo debate, had already told the Security Council that under international law the U.S. was no more entitled to intervene in the Congo than Ghana in the American South where "Afro-American inhabitants" are "from time to time tortured and murdered for asserting their legitimate rights." Next day came the news from Meridian, like a flash of lightning before a storm, revealing sharply the true lineaments of the racial landscape, with the colored man everywhere a creature of lesser concern, even to white men of good will.

Their Common Bond

Nothing could be more unwise for our country than to treat the Congo debate as another inning in the cold war, calculating its effects on the UN dues quarrel and China membership issue, as if following a familiar sporting event on a score-card. The protests to the Security Council were downgraded in our press as coming from "left-leaning" African states, the implication being that ideology explained it all. This is dangerous self-delusion. The common bond that unites Negro and Arab, African and Asian, Hindu and Chinese, and the whole underworld of mixed blood in Latin America, is the all too fresh recollection of humiliation at the hands of the white man. This is what the Congo episode stirred up and this is something they do not need to read about in pamphlets from Peking. There never was a sharper cleavage at the UN between white and colored than on the Congo question. Intervention to protect lives and property—gunboat diplomacy—has too long been the traditional excuse of imperialism in Latin America and Eurasia. The Western plea of humanitarianism created solidarity among those accustomed to being regarded as not quite human. Suddenly Africa was talking about Mississippi and Cuba, as if in a world-wide colonial and racial upsurge.

Mr. Beovagui of Guinea protested to the Security Council that the U.S. and Belgium had tried for weeks before the rescue at Stanleyville to impose a military solution on the Congo while the African States were seeking to bring about a political reconciliation. He complained that white mercenaries "under the protection of U.S. military planes piloted by Cubans recruited and financed by the U.S.—soldiers of fortune trying to redeem their fiasco in the Bay of Pigs" had massacred Congolese civilians and "bombarded cities held by the forces of the National Liberation Front . . . as in Albertville and Bakavu" without stirring any indignation in the West. "Was it," he asked, "because the thousands of Congolese citizens murdered by the South Africans, the Rhodesians, the Belgians and the Cuban refugee adventurers had dark skins just like the colored U.S. citizens murdered in Mississippi?" This is a bitterness we would do well to heed. The debate was a Distant Early Warning Line on which we may hear in time the approach of a conflict more serious than the anti-Communist cold war with which we continue to be obsessed. Mississippi, Rhodesia, South Africa and Brazil each in their own time and their own way may bring about a new polarization between white and colored, rich and poor, threatening a war in which our ICBM's would stand impotent, a war from which all mankind would lose.

View from The Lower (and Darker) Depths

"The most pressing problem, as far as my government sees things, is that of poverty. . . . The poor cannot be persuaded to wait. They are no longer politically illiterate either. They do not have to be educated to listen in on their own or their neighbor's radio sets telling them, with a great deal of vanity, about the staggering sums of money misspent on this or that scheme—I need not mention nuclear weapons, studies of outer space and what-not, things which do not help people to live happily or become human beings in the strict sense of the word, things which will only add to the destruction of civilization. . . . And poverty nowadays seems to be the lot of the colored. A most alarming phenomenon. The indignity they suffered over the centuries is receding, but their political emancipation was only the first step on their long road to redemption in the fullest sense of the word."

—Mr. Maghoub (Sudan), in UN Gen. Assem. Nov. 10

We exaggerate the divisions among the African States. Senegal, with Liberia and Nigeria, is counted "on our side." The speech made by Mr. Thiam of Senegal to the General Assembly a week earlier should put us on guard against such over-simplifications. Mr. Thiam did indeed address some perceptive advice to his fellow Africans. "Very often," he pointed out, "it is we ourselves who start the cold war in our countries. Because of internal rivalries between men and different political tendencies, we invite others to interfere in our domestic affairs." He said interventions are approved or condemned, depending on whether they were from Washington or Moscow, without concern for the principle of non-intervention, "bringing into question our independence and our sovereignty." But Senegal's spokesman is no Western mouthpiece. He opposed expulsion of the Soviets on the debt issue. He warned that the chaos in the Congo was a preview of what would happen in Angola unless Portugal unlike Belgium began to train native cadres to take over. He ended by touching on issues more fundamental than color: the con-

The New Gore-Ribicoff "Dynamic Cost-Sharing Plan" A Hidden Snare for The Aged

Time to Challenge Timid Liberals For A Stronger Medicare Program

The number one item on President Johnson's legislative agenda should not be to pass medicare but to re-write it. The version the Senate approved last August is not merely inadequate; it is a fraud. In the closing moments of that debate Senators Ribicoff (D., Conn.) and Gore (D., Tenn.) quietly added a provision that makes the aged and not the government responsible for paying future increases in the cost of hospitalization. The provision is delicately being called "The Dynamic Cost Sharing Plan." We asked an actuary at the Social Security Administration to translate that for us into dollars and cents. This is what we learned:

Upping The Costs For The Aged

Hospital costs are increasing at the rate of 7% a year. At this rate they will double (from $40 to $80 a day) within ten years. Because of cost "sharing," the aged will then be paying for hospitalization under medicare what they are now paying for it without medicare. Social Security now taxes only the first $4800 of a worker's wages. If Congress chooses to increase this wage base to keep up with the 4% annual rise in wages—something which it has refused to do for the past several years—then the benefits of medicare will still be negated though in fifteen years, instead of ten. The objective of cost sharing was to pacify Rep. Wilbur Mills (D., Ark.), chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee. He has been arguing that because hospital costs are rising so rapidly medicare would soon bankrupt all social security programs. Mills is right, but the solution lies not in further pauperizing the aged but in attacking the problem of hospital costs.

This is what the liberals in Congress have been too timid to do. Medicare in fact will probably cause costs to spiral at a rate higher than 7% a year. Like Blue Cross, Blue Shield and most commercial plans, it is a hospital-centered program: it provides benefits (except for some home care) only for hospitalization or for nursing-home care after hospitalization. This encourages over-utilization of hospitals and higher costs. Reformers in the medical field have long been urging more treatment of patients "on the hoof rather than between the sheets." But the insurance plans have generally refused to offer more comprehensive coverage out of deference to the wishes of the hospitals and doctors.

More comprehensive health insurance is a matter of lives as well as money. The just released report of the President's Commission on Heart Disease, Cancer and Stroke stresses the importance of early detection in combatting these three greatest killers. (They account for about 7 out of every 10 deaths.) Almost three out of four strokes can be detected before they occur and many can then be prevented. So can many forms of heart disease and cancer, if they are detected early. What the Commission does not say is that the entire system of hospital-centered health insurance discourages early detection. Most people go to hospitals only when already ill. Preventive medicine requires a health insurance system that encourages periodic check-ups by paying out-of-hospital physician fees. This in turn may mean paying doctors a fixed salary.

There never was a better time for a comprehensive medicare bill. Inside the House Ways and Means Committee the Southern Democrat-Republican alliance that bottled-up medicare is about to be broken. Speaker McCormack has given his approval to a plan for increasing the Democratic representation from 15 to 17 and reducing the Republican from 10 to 8. Provided the two Democratic appointments are liberals, the Southern Democrat-Republican alliance will be reduced from a majority of 13 to a minority of 11. Instead of pressing this advantage, some liberals are urging further compromise.

On December 11, Senator McGovern proposed "give and take conference sessions" with the AMA. Somebody should remind him that the AMA announced at its last meeting that it will not compromise. And somebody should remind the AMA that their House Of Delegates once indorsed a compulsory national health insurance program. "The time has come when we can no longer resist the social movement," its Board of Trustees reported in 1916, "and it is better that we should initiate the necessary changes than have them forced on us."

While the Sick Are Neglected

"'We face so many real threats,' Dr. Brown said, 'that we can't afford to occupy ourselves with imaginary ones.' Among the 'imaginary threats' of the last few years was the mythical bomber gap and the prospective missile gap that never materialized. These false alarms caused the U.S. to invest billions in the DEW Line, liquid fueled ICBM's and other devices that are now either obsolete or of little value."

—Dr. Harold Brown, Director of Defense Research at the Pentagon, New York Herald-Tribune, Dec. 6.

COFO Volunteers Explain How HUAC Aids The White Supremacist in Mississippi

"HUAC and similar legislative investigating committees have been libel-free centers for false accusations; they have dignified irresponsible smears as 'official' government findings. They have thus promoted among the white community in Mississippi the belief that civil rights protest is synonymous with subversion and treason. The Mississippi press and public officials consistently smeared participants in the 1964 Summer Project; they relied primarily on HUAC 'citations' for their smears.

"The pervasive feeling among white Mississippians that the civil rights movement is 'red-inspired' enables Mississippians to dismiss civil rights as illegitimate, to avoid admitting the existence of the intolerable conditions of the Mississippi Negro which give rise to such protest, and to rationalize violence and economic intimidation against civil rights workers as 'patriotic acts'."

"Having witnessed the workings of a closed society—where the First Amendment is not operative, where white as well as Negro is labelled 'subversive' if he dissents—we feel more deeply the need to oppose threats to free speech and free association in the rest of the country. HUAC, condemning ideas and associations as 'Un-American', is the fountainhead of the threat to an open society. HUAC denies what we went to Mississippi for."

—Petition To Abolish HUAC, signed by 142 workers in the Mississippi Summer Project, Dec. 10.

The Senate's No. 1 Peace Champion Sees Vietnam as LBJ's "First Great Test"

Morse Fears Johnson Administration Swinging Toward Goldwater Policy

By Senator Wayne Morse[*]

A few weeks ago, people laughed when Presidential candidate Barry Goldwater talked blithely of "interdicting" the routes from North Vietnam into South Vietnam, especially by use of chemicals and radiation to defoliate the trees that conceal the jungle trails. But today there is every evidence that the American Ambassador has returned to Saigon from Washington with something very similar to the Goldwater prescription for the civil war in South Vietnam. A traditional signpost that points to this conclusion is the increased emphasis upon infiltration of men and supplies from North Vietnam through Laos into South Vietnam. This new emphasis is in total contrast to the previous official testimony on this point presented to the Foreign Relations Committee. In fact, no new evidence has been offered to change the assessment that the great bulk of the Vietcong rebels were local residents, that close to 90% of their weapons were captured from government sources, and that their civil war would continue whether or not it received aid or leadership from North Vietnam.

Mistake Admitted But Perpetuated

But the 100% expansion of the South Vietnamese Air Force and the drumbeating in both Washington and Saigon about alleged infiltration from North Vietnam, suggest to these experienced ears that air attacks by U.S. jets flown by U.S. and Vietnamese pilots will soon commence in Laos, as they may already have begun in the de-militarized zone of North Vietnam. One of the most astonishing elements in the discussions of this policy is the number of Washington officials who will tell you that getting into South Vietnam was a hideous mistake, but once involved we have no choice but to continue.

It has cost American taxpayers $5½ billion, exclusive of the cost of our own forces, to try to keep a Western foothold in Southeast Asia. Journalistic spokesmen for the Defense Department are vehement in declaiming that to lose our foothold in Vietnam is to lose all we fought for in the Pacific in World War II. Nothing is further from the truth. Before World War II, the most we ever had was the Philippines, which we voluntarily relinquished in 1935 and formally freed in 1945. Since 1945, we have maintained base rights in the Philippines, as in Japan; and we have kept a base in Okinawa, won by conquest. Our present "foothold" in South Korea is a legacy of World War II, not its objective.

Bombing Supply Lines Futile

"All this talk about blocking Communist supply routes to the Viet Cong operating in South Vietnam with bombs indicates one thing: Somebody has not done his homework on the effectiveness of air assault against supply lines in Korea—or World War II, for that matter. As any Korean veteran can tell you, the Red Chinese sustained a million-man army at the far end of a 300-mile supply route in the teeth of the best aerial effort the U.S. could mount. . . . There were 8 highways leading from Manchuria south to the 38th parallel and for a solid month aircraft from the Air Force, Marines and Navy plastered all of them. . . . The Chinese simply used manpower to make temporary road repairs at night and quickly moved their trucks under cover of darkness. . . . By the time the all-out assault was brought to a halt—no targets left apparently—there was no indication that the fighting abilities of the Chinese troops had been drastically impaired. They were still able to mount an offensive in which they could fire as much as 100,000 rounds of artillery ammunition in one 3-day fight."

—Bem Price, AP, in Wash. Post, Dec. 13.

What these Defense Department spokesmen really have in mind are not the strictly American footholds and bases in that part of the world but the whole network of French, Dutch and British possessions that in World War II were freely used by Americans in the prosecution of the war against Japan. The possibility that these staging areas should no longer be available for use at our pleasure vis-a-vis China is for many of them so unthinkable that they believe it is worth a war to retain at least one of them.

It still is not too late for President Johnson to lead the American people out of this morass. Whether he leads us out or further in will be the first great test of his Administration.

The AP's No. 1 Man in Saigon Reveals How The News From Vietnam Is Prettied Up

"Frequently, sins of dishonesty by the Vietnamese were compounded by U.S. officials. As a trivial case in point, the Viet Cong released two U.S. Army prisoners on May 1, 1962, after holding them in the jungle for several weeks. The idea that the Communists would voluntarily release prisoners ran counter to the Saigon propaganda line, and its information directors let it be known that a detachment of Vietnamese had overwhelmed a Viet Cong camp and liberated the Americans. This statement, with details about the valor of the government unit's commander, was passed along to correspondents by the U.S. military information office. Some news stories spoke of the government troops "slashing their way into a Viet Cong camp," and made the whole thing sound like a cowboy movie, in which the good guys wiped out the bad guys.

"A few of us smelled a rat. The Viet Cong had never before let themselves get surprised into a jam like that, and it seemed an odd coincidence that the Americans were freed on May 1—a big Communist holiday. It turned out later that the Viet Cong had not only released the two men, but had sent a squad of escorts with them to make sure they got into no further trouble on the way back. . . .

"For a long time, U.S. information policy tried to avoid publishing American battle casualties. On one occasion, U.S. military authorities reported to newsmen that an Army enlisted man had 'slightly injured his arm' on 'a training exercise with Vietnamese troops, when he accidentally tripped over a wire.' But about one week later I learned that the man involved was a sergeant friend of mine, and I looked him up at the hospital. It turned out that he'd been on patrol with Vietnamese troops, all right, and he had tripped over a wire. He had tripped because the wire was connected to an electrically detonated Viet Cong land mine, which had blown away half his elbow."

—Malcolm Browne, the AP's senior correspondent in Saigon, in Columbia Journalism Review, Fall, 1964.

Adlai Could Not Have Made A More Feeble Reply to Che Guevara

tinued fall in the raw material prices on which the ex-colonial countries depend; the damage done them by the one-crop economies imposed under imperialism; "the elementary duty of justice and humanity" which requires the ex-colonizers "not to go away and leave us to pay the bill"; the need for "a new organization of our planet based on a new ethics." This was man's better conscience speaking through Africa.

Savagery—After Auschwitz?

Mr. Spaak of Belgium defended his country with eloquence. He said he would not attempt to give lessons to black men because after Buchenwald and Auschwitz the white man had no right to give lessons in humanity. He said that in the Nairobi talks, the representative of the rebels had demanded a cease-fire, which Belgium and the U.S. could not obtain because the Leopoldville government opposed it. But Tshombe was put into power by Belgium and the U.S. They could have put pressure on him if they were not themselves opposed to a peaceful settlement which would bring the rebels into the government. Spaak was on stronger ground when he discussed the people Belgium had rescued. He said these were the technical assistants, the professors, the veterinarians, the doctors for whose services the Congo had asked. "They went to the Congo at our request," he said, "and it was because we had a special responsibility toward them that we had to make a special effort in their behalf." How could Africa get the white technical aid it needed if they were to become the hostages of internal struggle?

But one felt that the quarrel had reached that blind stage where neither side hears the other, and each is more concerned with his own grievances than in squarely meeting the issue. The Belgians felt aggrieved that after being asked to come back they were being mistreated and denounced. The Africans remembered Leopold and the horrors of his Congo Free State; this is but yesterday for them. They recalled how the CIA had connived in the overthrow of Lumumba, the Congo's one national leader, and picked that clown, Mobutu, as our strong man. They regard Tshombe as Lumumba's murderer and our puppet and feel as a slight on all of them the headlines about a cannibalism that never occurred. In their rage they forgot that their own savagery to each other in the Congo was worse than anything the white man had done to them.

That Two Deaf Nations May Hear Each Other

Except for the writer Edgar Snow and relatives of Americans imprisoned in China, Dr. Samuel Rosen of New York is the first American in 10 years to be cleared by both sides for a visit to that country. There is a gratifying symbolism in this. This distinguished ear surgeon discovered and perfected the "mobilization of stapes" operation for deafness. Both China and the U.S. need to hear each other again. Dr. Rosen has taught his technique in 27 countries including Egypt and the Soviet Union, where five doctors he instructed have been awarded Lenin Prizes. Dr. Rosen was first invited to China two years ago by its medical association but then the State Dept. said "no." The invitation was renewed last spring, and has not only been approved now but the story was given out by State. We hope it is a harbinger of better relations. Dr. Rosen's favorite proverb is, "If every man would mend a man, the world would soon be mended." He lives by it. We might add, as a grateful postscript, that it was he who operated recently on our right ear, with results that promise to be near-miraculous. We hope to have the other done when he returns.—IFS

There never was greater need for the voice of reason. The debate may cost Africa aid it badly needs from the U.S. Congress. The news from the Congo will not make it easy to recruit the technicians it requires. Che Guevara in his green fatigues, symbol of the guerrilla fighters against whom the West has proven powerless, suited the mood of the moment and was given an ovation by the Afro-Asians after a revolutionary speech even the Chinese might have thought a bit sweeping. He was escorted out of the hall by a throng of admiring blacks. Mr. Stevenson could not have made a more foolish reply than calling Guevara "a man with a long Communist and revolutionary record in Latin America." In that atmosphere it sounded to the Europeans as a feeble echo of McCarthy and to the embittered Afro-Asians as a positive accolade.

Our Last Chance in The Congo, Pps. 2-3

The New Year Begins With Two Hopeful Harbingers for A More Peaceful World

The two most hopeful events in the week before we went to press were grossly underplayed in the press. One was the news that the State Department was closing down its special office for the MLF; its head, Gerard C. Smith, had already left the government. This marks the end of the campaign for this nuclear monstrosity. The other was the announcement Dec. 30 by Senator Russell of Georgia that the Senate Armed Services Committee he heads would hold hearings soon on Vietnam and the Congo. "It would be nothing less than a tragedy," he said, "for us to go and get involved in the Congo as we are in Vietnam." Of Vietnam he remarked, "I thought we made a terrible mistake in getting involved" and he said "the time is about at hand when we must reevaluate our position." President Johnson likes to "touch bases" with key figures in the power structure before embarking on major policy changes. Russell was at the LBJ ranch Nov. 25. This is no longer Morse and Gruening calling for peace from the periphery of the Senate. This is the most powerful figure in the Senate establishment speaking.

I. F. Stone's Weekly

VOL. XIII, NO. 1 JANUARY 11, 1965 WASHINGTON, D. C. 15 CENTS

LBJ's Great Society—and Mrs. Fannie Hamer's

The first full Johnson Administration has made an auspicious start. Even before the Inaugural, there were reassuring portents for better international relations: the deflation of the campaign for an MLF, the discouragement of plans for widening the Vietnamese war, the announcement that we would negotiate a new treaty with Panama. The Inaugural set a useful precedent in picking prime TV time for the President's message; there is no reason why that communications wasteland should not be commandeered more often. The President's diction and delivery have improved, as has the style, though it dragged a little toward the end with repetition. The one sentence which reached a truly high level was "We seek the unity of man with the world he has built." The passage which was most revealing and touching, amid so much that was corn, came when Mr. Johnson said the President's hardest task was not to do what was right but to know what was right. "Yet," he added sadly, "the Presidency brings no special gift of prophecy or foresight." This was the man himself speaking.

The Potential for Peace

The latest Louis Harris poll (Washington Post, Dec. 28) shows how strong is the potential support the President can muster if he moves toward peace. The poll showed: people favor negotiations with the Communists almost 3-to-1; 83% favor the test ban treaty with Russia and 74% would negotiate a world-wide ban to include Communist China; by more than two to one, people oppose war with China or Cuba, and only 9% think war inevitable. On policy toward the new Russian leaders: 55% were for trying to negotiate with them, 13% favored "getting tougher," 32% wanted to wait and see. Peace was the biggest issue of concern (65%) followed by race problems (43%) jobs and prosperity (26%). Only 7% thought "Socialism, Communism at home," the mainstay of the witch hunters a No. 1 concern.

No Mention of The Arms Race

In the sphere of foreign policy, the Inaugural recalled the cautious Eisenhower more than the combative Kennedy. Mr. Johnson is taking up where Eisenhower left off with the U-2 incident. His invitation to the new Russian leaders to visit here, communicated in advance of delivery to the Soviet Embassy, opens the door to that first Presidential visit to Russia which Ike originally discussed with Khrushchev at Camp David. The Communist menace, that standby of the past two decades, was subtly subordinated at least in Eastern Europe to "older and deeper sources" of world unrest. "In Asia," Mr. Johnson said, "communism wears a more aggressive face." We hope the time will come when U.S. policy recognizes that the more aggressive face we see in the Far East is in substantial degree the mirror image of the aggressive face we steadily turn toward it. The friendlier face in Eastern Europe is largely a reflection of our own. The discussion of Vietnam continued the sham that we are only there to help a friendly nation against outside aggression, but mercifully it was brief and left the door open for more flexible policy in the future. The one distressing and perhaps historic omission was the absence of any reference to the arms race; we have settled down comfortably to our annual $50 billion dollar pump-priming war expenditures and Mr. Johnson is not one to disturb the comforts of the status quo. His is a prudent and peripheral idealism.

This was evident in his domestic program. He recalled—in his buoyant optimism about U.S. business—the inaugural of Herbert Hoover, which promised two cars in every garage and two chickens in every pot. There was the same naive confidence that our business civilization is the best of all possible worlds, which needs only to be cleaned up around the edges to become the Great Society. The most revealing passage was the President's call for "a new and substantial effort . . . to landscape highways"—those highways onto which General Motors and Ford can pour ever more cars at the fabulous 20% or more they earn on net worth. But what happens to prosperity when these roads are hopelessly clogged? There was no recognition in the Inaugural of those tougher problems before us if full employment is to be achieved in the shadow of automation and profit-maximizing administrative prices in our basic industries. Mr. Johnson spoke of "relentlessly" pursuing "the conquest of space." This makes new millionaires in Houston but there is still UN's New Resolution Offers A Peaceful Way Out of the Congo Civil War . . .

The ideal solution for the Congo would be a United Nations trusteeship administered by the non-aligned nations; it is obviously unready for independence and self-government. But the Africans would never accept this. The second best solution would be an agreement between East and West to keep hands off the Congo while the African states bring into being a government of national reconciliation to hold fresh elections when its various rebellions have died down. The Congo needs Western technicians and Western capital; these now operate in other independent African States; they could operate safely in the Congo, too, were the Western powers honestly to keep hands off and end their constant intervention in Congolese politics.

The Usual Vendetta Spirit

The resolution on the Congo passed by the Security Council at the close of the year, after three weeks of acrid debate, could be the framework for such a new start. As usual, the spirit of East-West vendetta has obscured the constructive aspects. Our press has focused on the Western victory in amending the original resolution to take out of it the condemnation of the Western powers for the Stanleyville operation. The rest of the resolution is being dismissed in a tide of cynical inspired stories.

But to treat the resolution as nugatory is to increase distrust of the Western powers in Africa, and disillusion with the UN. The resolution was passed 10-0, only France abstaining. The U.S. and Britain voted for it. Will their governments treat that vote as an empty gesture in an international comedy, or will public opinion in both countries force them to pay some attention to the action pledged? The resolution, wisely considered, offers the West the advantage of putting the Congo up to the Organization of African Unity. It appeals for a cease-fire in accord with the OAU's resolution of last Sept. 10; it requests all States to desist from intervention while the OAU pursues its efforts to achieve a government of national reconciliation and—most important of all, as a token of good faith—it "considers" in accordance with that same OAU resolution "that the mercenaries should as a matter of urgency be withdrawn from the Congo."

Just A Fine Bunch of Fellows

"One may also hope he has heard the last slurring reference in the UN and elsewhere to the 'white mercenaries.' Without them, God help the Congo."

—Editorial in the Washington Star, Jan. 3.

ABC's Moloney: There are a lot of allegations made against the mercenaries. I've heard stories about some of them having committed atrocities . . .

Major Hoare (leader of those who took Stanleyville): No, completely untrue . . .

Moloney: Well, one last night told me that he had burned two villages because two of his men had been killed in an attack. How would you defend this?

Major Hoare: Yes. Well, now it's a question of how we define atrocities. . . . The burning of villages, this is punishment, and I'm entirely in favor, when it is required of punishing the rebels in this manner. . . .

ABC's Peters: Wally, how do you feel when you're out there fighting? How do you feel about killing anyone?

Harper (a South African mercenary): The first time I felt a bit squeamish, but after that it was like, well I'd done a lot of cattle farming you know, and killing a lot of beasts, it's just like, you know, cattle farming, and just seeing dead beasts all over the place. It didn't worry me at all."

—ABC-TV show on mercenaries, Dec. 9.

This is the neuralgic point. These white hired killers, mostly from South Africa and Rhodesia, have sown a terrible bitterness in Africa by their racist brutality in support of the Kasavubu-Tshombe regime. That Tshombe, in Leopoldville, as earlier in the Katanga, has to depend upon such whites for his maintenance of power robs him of all legitimacy in African eyes. The blacks feel about these mercenaries exactly as Jews feel about the Nazis at Auschwitz. It is essential that this be understood if a peaceful way out is to be found.

The obverse is that without these mercenaries the Kasavubu-Tshombe regime cannot maintain itself in power. Tshombe and Kasavubu have already declared that they will not accept the UN resolution. Their defiance is only possible as long as they have U.S., British and Belgian support. What

Brazil Provides An Ironic Footnote on Wars of National Liberation

Joint U.S.-Latin American war games were held last month in Peru. The Chilean government declined to let its army participate. Chile, with one eye on Brazil, fears a fresh rise of militarism in the hemisphere. The purpose of the maneuvers was to teach Latin regimes how to deal with "wars of national liberation." Unfortunately such wars are rarely suppressed by military means. A wiser policy is not to provoke them.

Brazil threatens to become a pilot model in how to brew a future uprising. There the military dictatorship has just given the Hanna Mining Company and Bethlehem Steel concessions they had sought in vain from the predecessor democratic regimes. For five years both the moderate Left and the Nationalist right (including Lacerda, the favorite Brazilian of Readers Digest) opposed the efforts of the Hanna Company's George H. Humphrey to obtain control of rich iron ore deposits.

A week before Castelo Branco, the new Brazilian military dictator, signed the decree Humphrey wanted, the Alliance for Progress announced it would make available $450 million to Brazil in 1965. Humphrey was Ike's Secretary of the Treasury and Goldwater's most influential supporter. Yet he seems to do better under the Democrats. The "give-away" policies his candidate deplored have bought Humphrey concessions in Brazil its own Congress had refused to grant. Such are the wonders which foreign aid, it its mysterious ways, can perform.

In April we will hold the Second Special Inter-American Conference in Brazil. It is to deal with "human rights and measures to strengthen democracy in the hemisphere." The site would seem to be well chosen, since many of Brazil's leading statesmen and intellectuals have been proscribed, jailed or exiled by its military, were it not that the purpose is to deal with Cuba not Brazil. Its Foreign Minister (Reuters in Washington Post, Dec. 29) looks favorably on allowing a Cuban government in exile to establish itself on Brazilian soil. The military who destroyed democracy in Brazil would then, by an exquisite turn of fate, provide the base for restoring democracy in Cuba, or if not democracy at least United Fruit.

. . . Will We Abide By It or Go On Playing Cloak-and-Dagger Games In Africa?

happens will be determined not in Leopoldville but in Washington.

Even with mercenaries the Kasavubu-Tshombe regime cannot maintain itself; there just are not enough killers for hire on the market to hold down an area as large as Western Europe. They can take cities but they cannot control the countryside. Neither Tshombe's Kantanga gendarmes nor Kasavubu's NATO-trained army has proved capable of fighting. Either the U.S. goes in with its own forces, or it disengages. "Only by choosing to disengage from the internal affairs of the Congo," says an editorial in Africa Today (Dec. '64), organ of the American Committee on Africa, "can the U.S. emerge from this crisis with honor and continue to act as an influence for progress and development in Africa." We agree.

U. S. Now The Senior Partner

But it would be naive to expect so sharp a turn in national policy to be easily achieved. In four years the Congo, with its riches and its strategic importance, has been converted under cover of a UN operation from a Belgian to an American sphere of influence. U.S. capital was junior partner before to Belgian and British interests; we are the senior partner today.

The murder of Lumumba, the one leader who might have held the Congo together; the substitution of a scarcely veiled military dictatorship in Leopoldville for parliamentary rule; the transformation of that frightened and insipid clown, Mobutu, into a synthetic military strong man; the long delay in driving Tshombe out of the Katanga and his reappearance as the head of the whole Congo—all this can be traced back to the wire-pullings of Washington, London and Brussels. The CIA regards the Congo as one of its major successes, as may be seen from the boastful account given in Andrew Tully's CIA: The Inside Story (pages 219-29), which hails the Leopoldville operation as a triumph of U.S. operatives.

The pro-Western Indian newspaperman, Frank Moraes, whose Report on Mao's China several years ago delighted Western propagandists, interviewed Lumumba a few weeks before his murder. "The real problem," Moraes quotes Lumumba in his new book The Importance of Being Black: An Asian Looks at Africa (Macmillan), "is the problem of the great powers, who do not want a united and neutral Congo. The West does not want leaders like me, who want to be neutral. The West only wants a Chief of State 100 percent under its guidance." Moraes' own first-rate summary of the tangled Congolese story concludes that "Tshombe's return to the Congo, with the support and connivance of his Western friends, must intensify the cold war in that territory."

If U.S. policy continues along these lines, the Congo may yet forge a sense of nationhood in years of guerrilla struggle against the puppet governments we try to impose. These confused, ill-armed and primitive bands may learn the hard way the facts of modern life, and the new guises that imperialism may assume. Inevitably they will turn for help to China, as the country with kindred views of the Western powers. These and wider war are the risks ahead if we do not disengage now. The heart of Africa is a dangerous place to play cloak-and-danger games.

Remember How Solomon Picked The True Mother?

"Vinh Long, South Vietnam, Jan. 2 — The Communist Viet Cong have extended blanket immunity to American civilians, especially those engaged in cultural and economic activities in South Vietnam. Intercepted instructions to guerrilla units in the Mekong Delta say that whenever American civilians are captured, they are to be released with an explanation it was all a mistake and that the Communists have no quarrel with them or their work in South Vietnam.

"The Communists in the past have shown a decided unwillingness to damage or destroy this country's physical assets. For example, whenever they attack the railroad running from Saigon north to the demarcation line, they are careful not to blow bridges or otherwise damage the roadbed beyond repair."

—Jim Lucas in Washington Daily News, Jan. 2.

A War of Liberation in Which The Liberators Are Not Accustomed to Be Welcomed

There were rewarding insights to be found in press coverage of the battle which raged for several days recently around the village of Binh Ghia in South Vietnam. One sentence, in an AP dispatch (Washington Star, Dec. 30), lit up the truth about this war as if in a lightning flash. It said that when the village was retaken by government forces, "The marines, used to sullen receptions from villagers in Viet Cong-controlled areas, looked puzzled by the enthusiastic welcome."

This village was different because settled by Catholic refugees from the North.* "We are friendly because we hate the Communists," the same dispatch quotes one villager as shouting. A headline over the Washington Post account (Jan. 2) said, "Little Catholic Town of Binh Ghia Still Paying Dearly For Its Faith." It doesn't seem to have done too badly.

This was the fourth Viet Cong incursion into this village since the war began. In counter guerrilla action, as in Vietnam and the Congo, villages thought to be hostile are wiped out. We bombard first and ask questions afterward. But as one of the anti-Communist villagers related in the same AP story in the Star Dec. 30, "All Monday night we argued with the Viet Cong commander to leave us alone . . . we were so furious we fought the man with our fists and feet. . . . They just laughed and ridiculed us." Ridicule hurts, but not as much as napalm.

As a Catholic anti-Communist village, Binh Ghia was given favored treatment by our side. "Much less heavy firepower than usual was used in the attacks on Viet Cong emplacements," the AP reported in the Baltimore Sun Dec. 31, because of the danger to the anti-Communist villagers." The Washington Post story Jan. 2 said, "The Vietnamese Air Force skyraiders carefully limited their attack to Viet Cong positions outside the town." We are not usually so tender with villages held by the Viet Cong.

* Few Americans realize the extent to which the war in South Vietnam has depended on such Catholic villages of refugees from the North. This minority was the main support of the Diem regime. For those who would understand this more fully we recommend an article by Robert Scheer "Hang Down Your Head, Tom Dooley" in the progressive Catholic magazine Ramparts for Jan.-Feb. (1182 Chestnut St., Menlo Park, Calif., 75¢) which deals with a story no other American publication has had the courage to tell fully—the extent to which this from the beginning has been Cardinal Spellman's war.

The Inaugural Failed to Make An Appeal Against Racism

nothing "relentless" about the magnitude of his war on poverty. Even doubled, as promised, it will hardly mean a billion dollars a year in new money. This is the program of a moderate conservative Democrat, offering fringe benefits to the less privileged sectors of society. In the politics of consensus a little for the poor makes it easier to go on giving a lot to the rich.

The Old Tory Coalition Now A Minority

The most important promise here is the beginnings of medicare. The huge Democratic majority now makes this possible. The vote in the House against shelving the rules reform showed that the coalition of Republicans and Southern Democrats has lost control. Though only 16 Republicans voted for the new rules, and the South was solid for the old, the vote was 224 to 201 for the change. This vote is the true index to the shift of power, and clears the way for the President's moderate social reform program. The rules changes themselves were in keeping with this program; the reform was minimal. It gave the Speaker power, through the 21-day rule and two lesser changes, to override recalcitrant committee chairmen, especially in the Rules committee. But it does not give greater power to the hoi polloi on the floor. It is the Speaker and the party leadership which decides when to utilize these devices.

That there is a potential for more drastic action in the rank-and-file membership was indicated when two dozen rose with Congressman Wm. Fitts Ryan of New York to challenge the election of the Mississippi delegation and 148 voted not to seat them, an extraordinary vote for the Negro and the Mississippi Freedom Party. This should stimulate the taking of depositions on how white supremacy procedures prevent honest elections in the deep South, and the size of the vote will make it harder for the privileges and elections committee to bury the challenge. For the first time since Reconstruction, the Negro from the deep South made his appearance on Capitol Hill, still outside the door but definitely on his way in.

Alexander Meiklejohn

We record with sorrow the death at 92 of Alexander Meiklejohn, one of the great Americans of our time. As an educator, his influence was not limited to Brown, Amherst and Wisconsin. He taught us all by his presence and example. Few men have combined such deep conviction with such courtesy towards opposing points of view, such foreboding about man's fate with so sweet a serenity and so ever-fresh a joy. He was a philosopher in the ancient sense; his concerns were the good life and the good society. For him as an American, the First Amendment was the essence of all that is best in our country and he spoke up for it when many were afraid to speak. Fittingly, his last message was a letter protesting the contempt action brought by the House Un-American Activities Committee against Dagmar Wilson, Donna Allen and Russ Nixon. His was never "a fugitive and cloistered virtue." We will always remember him with love.

To watch the Mississippi Negroes arrive in their rickety buses, chilled but eager, in the darkness before a downtown church the night before was to see an oppressed people pressing at last for justice. The most disappointing thing in the Inaugural was the absence of any appeal against the spirit of racism; the few meager words about the right to vote were no substitute. In such great challenges lie the birth of great societies, and Mr. Johnson's failure to give this the lofty word it deserved made his own vision of a Great Society seem little more than a middle class suburbanite dream. The whole world would have applauded if America had opened the doors of Congress, at least for opening day, to the three women from Mississippi. An ugly Nazi clown, insulting the Negro, was able to get through the strict security, but not the three women challengers. Of all that was said on opening day, history may best remember Mrs. Fannie Hamer's bitter words outside the door. "Mississippi Negroes are excluded from everything except hanging," she said as she was turned away. "Someday we want to be able to teach our children that this really is a democracy." Here is the real blueprint for that greater society.

The No. 1 Business of Mankind

The Cost of Empire

The decline in U.S. gold holdings and weakened confidence in the dollar are due largely to our far-flung military commitments abroad. Foreign aid has little to do with the gold crisis. It is largely a disguised subsidy for U.S. business, agriculture and arms manufacturers. All the military aid we send abroad, and more than 80% of the non-military, is purchased here. The dollar outflow is due to our foreign bases, our troops in Germany and Korea and wars like Vietnam. These eat up our huge surplus of exports over imports. In 1963 our export surplus was $5 billion but we had a balance of payments deficit of $2.6 billion. If it were not for our $2.9 billion military expenditure abroad that year, we could have had a $300 million surplus. Similarly in 1964, despite a $2 billion rise in our export surplus, the payments deficit will be at least $2.3 billion. Without $2.9 billion in military expenditure abroad, we would have had a net gain of $600 million. The dollar has been weakened by two decades of trying to impose our will on much of the world; this is the cost of empire. The French economy on the other hand has been so strengthened by the "loss" of Indochina, Algeria and once-French Africa that De Gaulle can shift his reserves from the unsteady dollar to the revived franc, exchanging his huge dollar holdings for gold and thus adding to U.S. money troubles.

There is a poem of Robinson Jeffers in which he likens the struggles of nations to the waves and tides of the sea, and sees in them as little meaning. This comes to mind as one watches the new crisis shaping up in Southeast Asia over Indonesia and Malaysia. It is a mistake to view it through the stereotyped spectacles of either the cold war or anti-colonialism. It is better seen as another example of the endless anarchy to which the world will be subject as long as clashing national aspirations are left to be determined by organized murder. In this area Western imperialism is ebbing and far older forms of imperialism, Chinese and Malay, are reviving. No sooner is one clash resolved when another takes its place, as in waves breaking upon a beach. In perspective, the area is one in which the Malay peoples were conquered by Spain in the Philippines, by Holland in the Indonesian archipelago and by Britain in the Malay peninsula. We pushed the Spaniards out of the first and took over from the Dutch in the second, though in a much weaker form, and are now being asked for military aid to maintain the British in Malaysia.

Why The U.S. Plays It Cool

From Sukarno's point of view Malaysia is a neo-colonialist device to maintain British bases in Southeast Asia, and to prevent the reunion of the Malay peoples. From the standpoint of the Malays in Malaysia, this Federation is a way to assure Malay predominance over Singapore, which is one of the great Chinese communities of the world. From the standpoint of Singapore, where the majority party is moderate, Socialist and Chinese, Malaysia is preferable to rule by Indonesia where some 2,000,000 Chinese have been exposed to mob violence, legal discrimination and loss of property because they dominate the economic life of 100,000,000 Malays. For England, Malaysia, to which she transferred Singapore, Sarawak and North Borneo only 18 months ago, is a device for keeping this area rich in rubber, tin and oil in the sterling bloc, and maintaining the last lifeline of its empire East of Suez from Singapore to Hongkong. The U.S. is as cool about Britain's troubles with Sukarno as it was about Holland's. For we emerged from Sukarno's struggle against the Dutch with the major share of $1 billion in Western oil investments in Indonesia and in the quarter billion annual trade in Indonesian oil. America's greatest oil interests (Stanvac, Caltex) are fearful of offending Sukarno lest he expropriate their properties. We have also become Indonesia's No. 1 supplier; in trade with the archipelago, we rank ahead of Japan, Communist China and West Germany, in that order. From the standpoint of the cold war, both Washington and Moscow have been swindled; they bid against each other in offering Sukarno foreign aid; we played for the army, Moscow for the Indonesian Communist Party. The latter has turned up in Peking's corner, and the Army likes the war against Malaysia. (In Malaysia, too, the war threat, in the immemorial bloody comedy of international relations, has strengthened "unity"). Our nightmare has been the fear that Sukarno would seize our oil companies and sell the oil to Communist China. That seems to be coming closer. Peking is winning out over both the U.S. and the U.S.S.R., though Sukarno has always talked of his great role in "containing" China. Once Western imperialism is out of the area, the next clash will be between Malay and Chinese. This endless vista, which began in the era of bow-and-arrow, looks less and less attractive in the era of the atom bomb.

Never was a world order more urgent. Yet this is the moment at which Indonesia becomes the first nation to resign from the United Nations. Sukarno's walkout and our exclusion of China means that three quarters of a billion human beings are now outside the community of nations in the Far East. Its authority survives there only on the fringes. Indonesia's withdrawal recalls its analogue 32 years ago when Japan, condemned for aggression in Manchuria, became the first nation to walk out of the League of Nations, setting an example Hitler Germany was soon to follow. We know the consequences. The recollection should make the preservation of the UN the No. 1 business of mankind.

WSP-ers Can Go to Jail for A Year But A Nazi Need Only Forfeit $20 Deposit

When Contempt of the House of Representatives Is Treated As A Peccadillo

If a Negro had broken into the House on opening day and launched a tirade before he could be ejected, you may be sure that there would have been a major outcry, an exhaustive inquiry into how security was breached, and a severe penalty imposed on the interloper. But the Nazi who broke into the House on opening day in blackface, with a fur loincloth around his leotards, to insult the Negro people during the Mississippi challenge, was allowed to go free after forfeiting a $20 deposit for disorderly conduct. The intrusion was treated as a peccadillo.

Since this Nazi was pandering to white supremacist sentiment, we are not surprised that dominant Southern elements in the House took the affair lightly. But we are surprised that not one of the five Negro Representatives rose to protest.

One of 20 Such Incidents

It was left to Congressman Charles S. Joelson, D., N.J., to urge action. In a letter to the District of Columbia Corporation Counsel he called attention to the fact this was only one in a series of some 20 incidents in which Rockwell's Nazis have caused disorder at public meetings but have gone unscathed except for a $10 disorderly conduct fine. Joelson's letter called for prosecution. Joelson also introduced a resolution asking the House to punish the intrusion for contempt.

The resolution has about as much chance of getting out of committee as Howard Smith has of being decorated by the NAACP. The indifference of the House to so plain a breach of decorum and security came forcibly to mind when we watched the arraignment later in the week of Dagmar Wilson, Donna Allen and Russell Nixon for contempt of the House Un-American Committee. Here a mere refusal to testify in secret, though not in public, was treated as if it were a major crime. The three were set down for trial respectively on March 1, 8 and 15; and taken down to the cell blocks to be finger-printed.

Even if they win, the victory will cost months of anguish and heavy legal fees. Win or lose, these two members of Women's Strike for Peace and the general manager of the National Guardian will be punished—all because they refused to answer questions in secret about a visit to the State Department where they requested a visa for a distinguished Japanese professor and crusader against nuclear war. The net effect is to make people wary of taking part in peace activity.

Civilization's Defenders in The Congo

"Stanleyville, the Congo, Jan. 6—A cold war has broken out here between the United Nations and Premier Moise Tshombe's mercenary fighters. . . . The first [incident] came just 48 hours after the mercenaries drove into town following the Belgian paratroop attack Nov. 24. 'They burst into the PX in our headquarters at the Hotel Wacenia and walked off with $24,000 worth of food, whiskey, clothing and other goods,' Mr. [Fernand] Scheller ["the Swiss UN representative here"] said. 'You know that the rebels never touched the PX during the four months they were here, but the mercenaries grabbed the stuff within two days. . . . They've looted everywhere they can,' he declared, 'they've broken open every safe in town except two, and stolen millions of francs. They've looted stores, taken refrigerators, typewriters and every piece of equipment they could get their hands on.'"

—J. Anthony Lukas in New York Times, Jan. 7.

Their "contempt" of the House was theoretical. The contempt shown by the Nazi interloper was immediate and real He gets off by forfeiting $20 deposit for disorderly conduct; they could go to jail for a year and be fined as much as $1,000.*

One way to express a sense of outrage is to write your Congressman (1) to support the bill submitted on opening day by Edwards (D. Cal.) with the support of Ryan (D. N.Y.) and Moorhead (D. Pa.) for abolition of the Un-American committee and transfer of any legitimate function to House Judiciary and (2) to vote against the committee's appropriation when it comes before the House. The vote will be the measure of the country's concern for political freedom.

 At press time we learned that D. of C. Corp. Counsel Chester Gray had written Rep. Joelson agreeing with him and ordering the forfeiture set aside and the Nazi tried.

Conflicting U.S. and British Views of Castro's Cuba on Its 6th Birthday

"Fidel Castro has begun his 7th year, but there is no joy in this for anybody. . . . He holds on because he runs a police state."

—"Cuba's Six Year Nightmare", editorial, Washington Daily News (and other Scripps-Howard papers) Jan. 6.

"What's life like in Cuba? It resembles Europe in 1945. There is no bomb damage but thanks to the American blockade . . . there are all the other symptoms—food rationing, clothes rationing, empty shop windows . . . shabby offices. . . . Wages are comparatively high, and far more fairly apportioned than 'before', but there is little that is off ration and available to buy with them. . . .

"How do people think? In spite of all this austerity and the feeling that there is no real prospect of a change, the Americans delude themselves in believing the population is ripe for revolt. The Cubans are a proud people and while regretting the material benefits of the old days (in the case of those who profited from them), they would not want to return to their former dependence. Of course, they are dependent on what they call the Socialist countries, but materially only, not psychologically. They feel it is their revolution. . . .

"There is surprisingly little unthinking anti-Americanism. . . . Radio Miami and the Voice of America are regularly listened to (though rather in the spirit that Britons listened to Lord Haw Haw). . . . The permanent circumnavigation of the island by an electronically-equipped U.S. warship and the regular reconnaissance flights of a U-2 are subjects for humor. . . . What do they think about Castro? He is still extremely popular, though far from being beyond criticism, except in print. Everyone, including government officials, refers to him as Fidel. . . . Does the country seem like a military dictatorship? Not in the least. . . . They need Fidel, who is to Cubans what Churchill and the monarchy combined were for Britain in the Second World War. It is frightening to contemplate what might happen to Cuba if anything happened to Fidel. One thing is certain, though: it could not be a return to the days 'before'."

—J. Halcro Ferguson, Latin American expert of the London Observer, writing from Havana to that paper, Jan. 3.

LBJ Quit Smoking After Heart Attack But Won't Tell Public It's Hazardous

Health Message Recommends Medical Aid for Young As Well As Old

Amidst the dazzling array of health proposals which the President sent Congress last week there was one that promises a wiser direction in health policy. The Kennedy health program focused almost exclusively on health care for the aged. President Johnson has added a new dimension by recommending the expansion of the Kerr-Mills program for the aged to include medical and dental care for children in medically needy families. A more liberal federal-state formula for participation would overcome the major weakness of the present Kerr-Mills. The proposal still falls far short of President Truman's goal of comprehensive health care for every American, but it is a long-delayed step in that direction.

It takes on added significance because of the influential role that Wilbur Cohen, Assistant Secretary of HEW, played in drafting the health proposals. Cohen is known to favor the expansion of Kerr-Mills to all ages and all but the highest income levels. This route to universal health care would have at least two advantages over a similar expansion of medicare. Kerr-Mills is more progressive because it is financed out of the general tax fund, not by a flat tax on wages. Its benefits are also more comprehensive; they can cover all medical expenses, whereas medicare is limited to hospital-centered bills. If expansion of Kerr-Mills is President Johnson's long-range goal, he deserves enthusiastic support.

Where Medicare Is Deficient

The President's medicare program is less encouraging. The Democrats' improved position in Congress and especially on the House Ways and Means Committee offered the opportunity for a more comprehensive bill. Benefits to cover the cost of long-term illness might have been added. There are practically none in the present King-Anderson bill, although more than four out of five of the elderly suffer from at least one chronic disease. Benefits covering out-of-hospital drugs, doctor services or even annual check-ups might have been added, but the President did not do so. The one step forward was the elimination of the "dynamic cost sharing plan" which had been added to the Senate-passed bill last August. It would have made the elderly responsible for paying the major part of increased hospital costs, which are rising at the rate of 7% a year. In place of "cost-sharing" there has been substituted a deduction equivalent to the average cost of one day's hospital care. This too will be a substantial burden. One day's care now costs $40 and this will double within ten years.

Landrum and Medicare

The House Ways and Means Committee has dominion over political privilege in the House and economic privilege in the country. It presides over all tax legislation and its Democratic members decide all Democratic committee appointments. The "election" of Phil Landrum (D. Ga.) to this committee, thanks to sly footwork by Speaker McCormack, is a major setback for medicare and every other liberal reform bill that comes before the committee. Landrum is being touted as a liberal, but he's not. Congressional Quarterly last November ranked him more conservative than six other members of the 10-man Georgia delegation. His support of the Poverty Bill last year now looks like the bargain price he paid for his seat on Ways and Means. He has promised not to block medicare in committee but he is not committed to voting for it on the floor or strengthening it in the future. He has seniority over the two new liberal appointments, which means that they will be the first to go when the Democrats lose seats in the House. Medicare will get through because of Republican votes, but when these side with the 7 Dixiecrats, they will still control the Ways and Means Committee.

An even greater disappointment was the President's continued silence on the hazards of cigarette smoking. (He has not smoked since his heart attack.) In its recent report the President's Commission on Heart Disease, Cancer and Stroke noted that "reduction of cigarette smoking offers great possibilities for the prevention of illness, disability and premature death, with regard to both cancer and cardiovascular disease." The Commission recommended a three-year, $10 million program of public education and a network of smoking control clinics to assist those who wish to give up smoking. There was no word of this in the President's message. It did contain recommendations for the protection of consumers' health, including a provision for more adequate labeling of hazardous substances. A White House aide, when asked whether this applied to cigarette packages and advertising, could give only an embarrassed "No."

Ex-Madison Ave. Ad Man Advises Tobacco Companies to "Taper Off" on Cigarettes

Less than a week after the President's health message appeared minus any allusion to the dangers of cigarette smoking, the National Interagency Council on Smoking and Health issued its own health report at a meeting in Washington. The Council is made up of the nation's leading health agencies including the U.S. Public Health Service. "The emerging medical opinion," said Emerson Foote, the Council's chairman, "is not that cigarette smoking seriously damages the health of some people who practice it, but that [it] damages the health of most people who continue to smoke." It kills at least 125,000 Americans every year, he said, and perhaps as many as 300,000. Foote, an ex-Madison Ave. magnate, then offered the tobacco companies some expert advice: Abandon all cigarette advertising and use this $200 million a year to develop non-tobacco products.

Cigarette makers ought to see the wisdom in this. They have been trying to convince consumers and stock market investors that cigarette consumption is back to normal, but it isn't. If it were, cigarette sales would have to be 3% to 4% ahead of 1963 because of the increase in the smoking-age population. Instead sales are still below their 1963 level. The Surgeon General told the Council that one out of every 4 men smokers has quit in the last ten years. So did 1.2 million women last year.

Remember the Cigarette Advertising Code by which the industry was going to eliminate the more perverse appeals in its ads? Sen. Neuberger (D. Or) told the Council that the Code's supervisors have ordered an end to all tar and nicotine statements on cigarette packages. These were a major incentive to the development of safer cigarettes.

Clark's Attack on Southern Oligarchy Voted Down Even In A Secret Ballot

The Senate Establishment Makes A Strategic Retreat, But Retains Control

Senator Clark's long campaign against the Senate Establishment began to pay off this year. He has aimed at its heart, the Southern oligarchy's control of the Democratic steering committee which determines the size and ratio of committees and assignments to them. This year, for the first time, the oligarchy no longer felt secure enough to hold up the assignments until after the biennial assault on the filibuster. In the past, freshmen Democratic Senators have been put on notice that they would only get the choice assignments they wanted if they voted right. This time committee assignments were handed out in advance of the filibuster fight, which has been put off until March.

Three Powerful Northern Chairmen

What happened is that three powerful Northern chairmen, McNamara of Public Works, Magnuson of Commerce and Jackson of Interior, in effect joined forces with Clark by sending out a letter in December to Democratic Senators declaring the steering committee unrepresentative of the party. They asked that four new members be added, one each for the East and the Far West, two for the Middle West, enlarging it from 15 to 19 members. Pastore later joined in this call, which would have given the North 10-to-9 control of the committee.

But pressure from Majority Whip Mansfield, as always for compromise, and the election of Russell Long as whip seems to have frightened these chairmen into retreat. In caucus they asked for only two new members, leaving the South in control 9-to-8.* Clark's motion for four new members was voted down 34 to 22—in a secret ballot, without fear of reprisal from the oligarchs. This vote is the real index of how few Democratic Senators really want a democratic Senate.

Troubles We Must Talk About

There used to be a series of advertisements which used the tag line, "troubles people don't talk about." One of the political troubles Americans don't talk about, lest this seem like bigotry, is the power of the Roman Catholic hierarchy to block action on birth control and public education. President Johnson touched the sensitive nerve of the birth control issue when he became the first President who dared to refer to it in his State of the Union message. Though the reference was vague—"I will seek new ways," the President said, "to use our knowledge to deal with the explosion in world population and the growing scarcity in world resources"—it has already brought an alarmed protest from the Family Life Bureau of the National Catholic Welfare Conference and a reminder that the U.S. hierarchy opposed any public aid for birth control in 1959. This, and the hierarchy's stand on aid to education, will have to be fought out in the open. And one thing which needs to be said loud and clear is that Catholic education in the parochial schools and universities is generally inferior education, on a low cultural level and politically reactionary.

As in the House, where the Rules committee often provides a convenient graveyard for measures on which supposed liberals want to evade a vote, so it is handy in the Senate to let conservative control of key committees remain the excuse for burying militant liberal proposals.

It is indicative that Long—highly overrated as a "Populist"—had his way on the powerful Finance committe on which he is nominally No. 2 man but chairman in all but name. On his insistence, Finance was the only committee on which the ratio of Democrats to Republicans was unchanged. This ensured conservative control over vital money matters from taxes to oil and gas depletion allowances.

The caucus and the steering committee were shaken up enough, however, to get stepchild liberals some good committee assignments. Clark and Pell went on Foreign Relations; Yarborough on Appropriations; Mrs. Neuberger on Commerce and Nelson on Labor.

 Actually the Southerners on the steering committee can almost always count on Hayden (Arizona) and Bible (Nev.) and often on Mansfield (Mont.) and Dodd (Conn.). There were only three real liberals on it: Douglas, Clark and Williams (N.J.) to which have now been added McNamara and McCarthy. The committee would have to be enlarged to 25, with 8 more liberals, to be sure of outvoting the conservatives.

Johnson's Education Message, P. 3

The Alliance for Progress Was Not Supposed to Buy Latin American Troops for Vietnam

"It is difficult to understand the legal right which the U.S. professes in extending an invitation to Latin American countries to join us in the fighting in Vietnam. . . . The pressures exerted by the U.S. . . . will seriously retard the Alliance for Progress and cast doubt upon its very objectives. Our neighbors to the south . . . have a long way to go in correcting the social and economic inequalities with which they are beset. . . . We should not be encouraging them to spend additional sums in the empty gestures of 'showing the flag' in a war not of their concern thousands of miles away."

—Gruening (D. Alaska), in the Senate Jan. 15.

VOL. XIII, NO. 3 JANUARY 25, 1965 WASHINGTON, D. C. 15 CENTS

It's Been A Faked Class B Movie From the Beginning

Associated Press correspondent Peter Arnett drove south of Saigon Jan. 14 to check reports of a battle and found U.S. Information Officers staging fake war scenes for a propaganda film. "We don't want to show cruel things like bodies," an information officer in charge explained, "And we will avoid references to tanks, fighter aircraft and artillery. This is a people-to-people film. . . ." When the story broke, the film was, of course, disavowed by USIA Director Carl T. Rowan. Only those with short memories will be taken in by the disavowal. The Vietnamese war, as far as the information given the American people is concerned, has been a faked class B movie from the beginning. The Moss subcommittee of the House two years ago protested the information practices of the State Department on Vietnam. It called attention to a speech by Mr. Rowan in which he spoke of the public's "right not to know in a period of undeclared war." Even this cynical statement misstated the facts. What is involved is not just "the right not to know" but the government's right to deceive. President Kennedy himself (see box on p. 3) tried at one point to get a New York Times man transferred from Vietnam because he was reporting the war too independently for the government's taste.

Doctoring The Record

Every agency of government is drawn into this campaign of deception. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee last week put out what purported to be an objective volume of "Background Information" on the war in Vietnam. It is supposed to be a compilation of the important official statements. But the record is tailored. The fullest official reports to the public on the war were the Blue Book the State Department issued in the Fall of 1961 to explain Kennedy's decision to intervene; Secretary Rusk's speech to the Economic Club in New York April 22, 1963, and Secretary McNamara's speech to the National Security Industrial Association (an arms lobby mouthpiece) on March 26 of last year. All three pictured South Vietnam under Diem as a model of progress and democracy, an "economic miracle" comparable to West Germany (no less!), a land of such contented people (land reform, educational expansion) that the Communists in desperation resorted to invasion as their only hope of reunifying the country. This notion that guerrilla war can successfully be carried on in a prosperous country, amid a happy people, is so preposterous that even a public as doped-up as ours could no longer be expected to take it seriously. In the Foreign Relations handbook not a scrap remains of the two-volume Blue Book. Rusk's speech has disappeared altogether. Discreet editorial scissors have cut out of McNamara's speech the whole opening section with its glowing picture of what McNamara called the Vietnamese "success story." Why should the Foreign Relations Committee, which is supposed to provide some check on the State Department, help to hide this record of deception?

The Wild Far East and The Wild Far West

"Americans in Asia are basically aliens, of a different race, religion and culture. Moreover, the Vietnamese are nationalistic and race-conscious in their outlook. As one on-the-scene observer pointed out, 'If you imagine a Chinese Sheriff speaking Cantonese and trying to keep order in Tombstone, Arizona, in its heyday, you will begin to get the problem.'"

—McGovern (D. S. Dak.) in the Senate Jan. 15.

Even Senators Uninformed

Even members of Congress, who get private briefings, show an extraordinary ignorance of what has been going on. McGovern of South Dakota made a good speech in the Senate Jan. 15. It echoed de Gaulle's suggestion that the war be ended by negotiating the neutralization of the area. McGovern opposed expansion of the war. "Attacks on North Vietnam," he said, "will not seriously weaken guerrilla fighters a thousand miles away, fighters who depend for 80% of their weapons on captured U.S. equipment and for food on a sympathetic local peasantry." But then he went on to make a suggestion which shows how little Senators are told. He said that "the most practical way" to put pressure on North Vietnam was "quietly through infiltration and subversion by South Vietnamese units" into the North with the aim not of "military victory" but of "bringing Ho Chi Minh to the negotiating table."

This is doubly ludicrous. Ho Chi Minh has been trying to get to the bargaining table for two years. The problem is to get the United States to the bargaining table. He has made clear his readiness to accept a neutralized independent South Vietnam in return for peace and resumption of North-South

RR Nationalization: For the First Time in Years A Radical Proposal from U. S. Labor

"I Ain't Got Much Confidence in Mississippi Doing Anything Right"

For years the FBI and the Justice Department have excused slack follow-through on Civil Rights complaints against police brutality in the South on the grounds that indictments and convictions could not be obtained. The arrests in the murder of the Martyred Three in Philadelphia, Miss., show that if enough evidence is mustered, Southern grand juries will sometimes indict. Maybe petit juries will convict. In any case what is happening to the Sheriff of Neshoba county and his deputy puts similar types in the South on notice that the murder and beating of Negroes and civil rights workers may not be quite as safe as it used to be. Still we hold our breath and agree with the redoubtable Mrs. Lillie Jones who keeps a shotgun handy in Philadelphia, Miss. She told Homer Bigart (N.Y. Times Jan. 17), "I ain't got much confidence in Mississippi doing anything right."

Public Ownership Long Overdue

The railroad brotherhoods have let a fresh breath of air in on a stale problem by demanding nationalization of the railroads. The glamorous improvement in service between Boston and Washington, on which the President touched in his State of the Union message, is impossible under present management. The railroads have too long been in the hands of a banker-lawyer bureaucracy devoid of business enterprise. At the end of World War I, the entire labor movement and many farm organizations campaigned for public ownership, under the once famous Plumb Plan. "A low degree of managerial skill," Glenn E. Plumb wrote about his plan in The Nation (Aug. 16, 1919), "cannot be taken into account at a rate-hearing." A great national resource has been plundered and run down by incapable hands.

Congress may soon authorize four new judges for the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals which covers the deep South. These with two vacancies on the present bench will make way for six new appointments, and may change the character of this hitherto liberal court, on which civil rights enforcement so much depends. Negro organizations are petitioning for the nomination of Clifford Durr of Montgomery, Alabama, an outstanding Southern liberal, one-time New Dealer and ex-FCC Commissioner for the Court. Unless pressure is built up, all the new appointments may go to segregationists.

An Echo of McCarthyism

At the end of a first-rate speech in the Senate Jan. 12 on the radical right by Church of Idaho, Morse boasted that in 1954 he co-sponsored a bill to outlaw Communism "which is the law of the land today." This referred to a shameful incident of the McCarthy period. The right-wingers had put in a bill to subject labor unions to the Subversive Activities Control Board. Most of the liberals were afraid to oppose it directly. They offered as substitute a bill to outlaw the Communist party. When this maneuver failed, they accepted both the original bill and their amendments. The purpose, as Morse said on the Senate floor at the time, was "to remove any doubt as to where we stand on the issue of communism." The law was never applied because so loosely written as to be clearly unconstitutional. It defined membership in the Communist Party so broadly that the liberal sponsors could themselves have been outlawed under it. They made it unlawful to indicate "by word, action, conduct, writing or in any other way a willingness to carry out in any manner and in any degree" Communist "plans, designs, objectives or purposes." This is broad enough to label Morse a Communist for advocating withdrawal from Vietnam. Only Kefauver and John Sherman Cooper had the nerve to oppose this cowardly nonsense at the time. We did not expect to hear Morse boast of it.

The appointment of freshman Congressman John Conyers (D. Mich.) to the House Judiciary Committee is auspicious for civil rights. Conyers is a Negro lawyer from Detroit who worked last year in the Mississippi Summer Project. Mrs. Fannie Lou Hamer went to Detroit to campaign for him. . . . The assignment of Maurine Neuberger (D. Ore.) to the Senate Commerce Committee strengthens the hand of its chairman, Magnuson (D. Wash.) in his campaign to put a cigarette labelling bill through Congress. . . . We applaud Dom Bonafede for his story in the New York Herald-Tribune Jan. 14 exposing the close connections between W. Ellis Meehan, chief investigator for the Senate Rules Committee in the Baker inquiry, and Thomas D. Webb, friend of Bobby Baker's and Washington man for the Murchison empire. . . . We mourn the death of our old friend, Fowler Harper of Yale Law School, a lifelong fighter for civil liberties.

Why Is The Supreme Court So Timid When Confronted With The First Amendment?

Mr. Justice Stewart's opinion for a unanimous court in the case of Stanford v. Texas last Monday was disappointingly narrow. Stanford did a mail order book business in San Antonio under the trade name, "All Points of View." His premises were raided and some 2,000 of his books and pamphlets seized. The raid took place under the Texas Communist Control Law of 1951. The search warrant was issued in response to an affidavit by two Assistant Attorneys General of Texas asserting that mailings by Stanford of "pro-Communist material and other information received in the course of investigation" indicated that Stanford "has in his possession the books and records of the Texas Communist Party." A four hour search turned up no such records but the police made off as consolation with the works of suspect authors as diverse as Marx, Sartre, Pope John and Justice Black.

The conviction was attacked on First Amendment grounds as an invasion of political freedom. But the Court chose instead to rule under the Fourth amendment which makes search and seizure under general warrants unconstitutional. This gave Mr. Justice Stewart occasion for much romantic rhetoric about James Otis and John Wilkes and how in Tudor England general writs were used "to suppress and destroy the literature of dissent." But all the Court ruled in ordering Stanford's books returned is that "the constitutional requirement that warrants must particularly describe the 'things to be seized' is to be accorded the most scrupulous exactitude when the 'things' are books." So what if the Texas warrant had asked to seize Marx's Capital or Lenin's Imperialism? Would that have made the seizure constitutional? How pusillanimous to leave the question open.

Almost 40% of the School Funds Will Go to Eleven Southern States

Johnson Combines Political Shrewdness and Humanity in Education Program

The President's education program combines shrewdness and humanity. It is Mr. Johnson at his best, and there is every reason to be grateful. His program aims to improve our education system where it is now most deficient, at the elementary and secondary level. Presidents Truman, Eisenhower and Kennedy all failed at this, although they did win aid for higher and vocational education. President Johnson almost surely will succeed, but not because he is handing out little scraps for everyone. His bill concentrates federal funds in proportion to poverty. Suburbs will generally get less than urban and rural centers; Southern and industrial states will get more than those of the Middle West and West. Perhaps most refreshing is that for once the main theme of a Presidential education message was really education, not national security.

Winning Over Southerners and Catholics

There are compromises in his bill, but these strengthen rather than mar it. In the past, a coalition of Republicans, Dixiecrats and Catholics have blocked federal aid to lower education. The President's program is designed to win support from the latter two. Almost 40% of the funds will go to eleven Southern states. This results from drawing the poverty line at family incomes of $2,000, a level which includes most of the Southern rural poor but excludes many poor Northerners whose incomes tend to group in the $3,000 range. It would be wrong to see this as only a gimmick to win Southern votes. It is also a way to focus aid on the South's poor whites and Negroes. If they can be made to share it together, the education bill will mean a leap forward for both the mind and the spirit of the South. The bill's compromise with Catholics is also to the general good. It permits parochial school students to attend supplementary educational centers along with public school students. Here is an opportunity to let fresh air into minds that all too frequently have been closed and retarded.

If the education bill is encouraging in what it sets out to do, it is depressing in what it reveals about the extent of poverty in America. The bill entitles a school district to federal aid when either 3% or 100 of its school-age children come from families with annual incomes less than $2,000. An information sheet released with the bill explains that school districts in 95% of the counties in the United States will qualify for aid under this formula. This is appalling. It means that poverty is not regional but nationwide; that our economy is fundamentally out-of-joint, and that it, not ignorance, is the taproot of poverty. It means also that unless the President is as imaginative and earnest in creating jobs as in educating children, America may soon be confronted by a generation of poor young people who because they are better educated will be even more frustrated.

The President's higher education bill has not been drafted yet, but his message lacked any indication of a request to broaden the Higher Education Facilities Act of 1963. This permits federal funds for facilities in science, math, engineering and foreign language, but none for the social sciences and humanities.

Inequities of the Wheat Program

Wheat products are among the major food items in the diet of the poor. In a country with as many sources of revenue as this one, there seems to be little excuse for a tax on wheat, especially one that amounts to 50% of the price of every bushel. There is even less excuse for such a tax if most of its proceeds go directly into the pockets of some of the wealthiest farmers in the United States. Yet this is exactly what is happening under the wheat certificate program that passed Congress last year with the help of President Johnson. A farm subsidy like this one is supposed to aid poor farmers producing for glutted markets. In a House speech last week, Rep. Paul Findley (R., Ill.) revealed that the $350 million raised by the wheat tax will be parcelled out so that 1,300 big wheat farmers receive payments averaging $15,000 per farmer while small farmers—over a million of them—receive payments averaging only $58. Still worse, less than one-third of wheat farmers have agreed to participate. Most of the really small farmers, the 15-acre ones, refused because participation would have required taking too much of their already scarce land out of production. The President in his State of the Union message spoke of the need "to direct more of our effort to the small farmer who needs help most." The wheat tax program would be a fine place to start.

How the White House Tried to Discourage Independent Reporting From Vietnam

In the January issue of Commentary, David Halberstam of the New York Times tells how the Kennedy Administration tried to discredit and silence independent reporters in Vietnam. A coordinated attack on Halberstam himself began in September 1963. Here is part of his story:

"In early September, a friend sent me a column from the New York Journal-American in which I was accused of being soft on Communism and of preparing the way for a Vietnamese Fidel Castro. A few days later, Joseph Alsop, after a brief visit to Vietnam, attacked a group of 'young crusaders' in the Saigon press corps. . . . The President's press secretary, Pierre Salinger, and other White House staff members more interested in their chief's political standing at home than in the status of the war in Vietnam, would knowingly inform White House reporters that we in Vietnam never went on operations. At the Pentagon, in the higher reaches where the realities of the war rarely penetrated, the criticism was particularly vehement. 'It's a damn good thing you never belonged to any left-wing groups or anything like that,' a friend of mine high up in the State Department told me after I left Saigon, 'because they were really looking for stuff like that.'

"On October 22, Arthur Ochs Sulzberger, the new publisher of the Times, went by the White House to pay a courtesy call on the President. Almost the first question the President asked Mr. Sulzberger was what he thought of his young man in Saigon. The President suggested that perhaps I was too close to the story, too involved. The President asked if perhaps Mr. Sulzberger had been thinking of transferring me to another assignment. No, said Mr. Sulzberger, the Times was quite satisfied with the present distribution of assignments."

That Bridge at Ban Ban Was No "Bridge Over the River Kwai"

trade (see Bernard Fall's The Two Vietnams). The idea of using commando raids on the North for "infiltration and subversion" which McGovern recommends is not new. There is evidence* that such raiding operations were begun 10 years ago when our leading counter-guerrilla expert, Gen. Lansdale, was Diem's military adviser. These operations represent a major political and military defeat. The infiltrees have never succeeded in sparking local anti-Communist guerrilla uprisings. Richard Dudman of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch reported a year ago (Feb. 26, 1964) that officials were disillusioned about infiltrating the North. "Although it is not generally known," Mr. Dudman wrote, "special South Vietnamese troops already have been parachuted into North Vietnam on missions of espionage and sabotage. They have vanished."

How We Broke The Geneva Pact

These cloak-and-dagger activities, which began five years before fighting broke out in the South, were a violation by the United States of the Geneva agreement of 1954. Though we did not sign the agreement, we pledged ourselves not to upset neutralization of the area by force. The training and supply of those early commando raids violated that pledge. So did our Programs Evaluation Office in Laos, a disguised military mission of U.S. officers in civilian clothes who took over control of the armed forces in Laos in the same period. They twice engineered the overthrow of its neutralist Prime Minister Souvanna Phouma and are still at it.

It is a pity Chairman Fulbright of Senate Foreign Relations does not take time off from retailing safe liberal generalities about easily discernible "myths" and use his committee to give the U.S. public a thorough investigation of what is going on. We went to the conference table in Geneva in 1962 to save Laos from being completely taken over by the Left when our rightist military proteges faced collapse. The price was an agreement to neutralize the country and to establish a coalition government of the three factions under Souvanna Phouma. The aerial bombardment of Laos now coming to public knowledge with the loss of more planes to enemy action was made possible by the overthrow of Souvanna Phouma for the third time last April. Though he was restored, the conditions were such as to make him and the neutralists prisoners of the right. With the coalition destroyed, the way was clear to escalate the war by having the Laotian government invite the U.S. to send its planes into Laos for "reconnaisance." This violated the promises made at Geneva in 1962. Laos offers an ideal way to satisfy the demand for escalation without direct attacks on North Vietnam or China. The recent bombings, notably that on the bridge at Ban Ban, have been overplayed in the U.S. press. Our public, brought up on movies about the bridge across the River Kwai, pictures Ban Ban as a jugular attack. But this bridge is not anywhere near that legendary Ho Chi Minh supply trail to South Vietnam, and bridges are of little importance anyway in small scale guerrilla fighting. This is another phony "movie" about the war.

While We "Blast Supply Lines" 1,000 Miles to The North

Before retreating from Tan Buu, the Viet Cong stole all the weapons from the armory, carried away so much ammunition they could not paddle it all down the river, and even swiped the commander's boots and uniforms. They captured four heavy weapons and enough rifles to equip a new company; three American-supplied radios, which enables them to listen to radio communications of government forces; classified documents, and even a government trooper's hammock. . . . 'The Viet Cong has now the same weapons that we have,' an American adviser lamented after the attack. It appears we are equipping both sides. . . . The attack was made in an area supposedly pacified under the Hop Tac Plan, designed by Gen. Westmoreland, commander of American forces in Vietnam and approved by Secretary of Defense McNamara. The plan, using Saigon as the center of the so-called 'oil spot,' calls for gradual expansion of government authority into the six provinces around Saigon."

—Beverly Deepe, New York Herald-Tribune, Jan. 17, describing an attack made just 10 miles outside Saigon.

The Arms Lobby and LBJ's Great Society

Ours is a muscle-bound society. The job of shaking it loose from the conditioned reflexes imposed by its huge vested interests, and giving it new directions, is terribly difficult. Looked at from within the Budget Bureau, where the pressures converge and the hard decisions are made, Mr. Johnson and the men around him must feel that they have made a start. A poverty program has been launched, education expanded, a beginning of medicare is in sight, the steep rise in military spending since the Eisenhower Administration has been stopped; the arms budget is down a little.

Poverty and War

But this shift in emphasis should not put us off our guard. The new budget shows that the main concern of the government is still war; the main beneficiary of its vast expenditures, still the military bureaucracy and its Siamese twin, the armaments industry. The budget advertises a quadrupled appropriation for the attack on poverty, but the dimensions are still minuscule. The budget enables us to see in cold money terms the prime concerns of our society, and the prime determinants of policy. At one end of the scale, more than $50 billions for the war machine, 50% of the administrative budget. At the other end of the scale, $1.3 billion for that purely metaphorical "war on poverty", 1.3% of the budget. The total budget for space, that breeder of new Houston millionaires, that additional gravy train for missile and electronic makers, will get $5.1 billion in the next fiscal year, or almost four times as much as the poverty program, though "quadrupled". $1.3 billion divided among 35 million living a substandard existence figures out to a little over $30 a year, or $2.50 additional a month, hardly enough for an extra beer a day. If only somehow fat profits could be made out of building men, as they are out of building missiles, the poverty program might be something more than a bone tossed from a well-laden table. The fast buck is still in making and inventing ways to destroy, to kill and to waste.

Many grudge even the bone, and there is already grumbling from the military-industrial complex. Its authentic voice can be heard in David Lawrence's column (Jan. 25). The President in his defense message to Congress looked forward to a levelling-off in military expenditures, so that even "if we continue to spend the same amount of dollars annually" this will become a smaller percentage of a growing national income and release more funds "for other vital needs, both public and private." But who is to judge, Lawrence asked, "whether the defense program is adequate and whether it can be measured primarily by the desire to spend more money on 'The Great Society'? Some of the top men in America's military establishment do not believe that such a rigid rule can be applied to defense expenditures. They do not wish to leave a stone unturned to obtain the most efficient armament that scientific minds can develop." That way lies a sky's-the-limit arms race.

When We Last Saw Churchill

"The huge and garish Presidential room of the Statler was jammed. . . . Sir Winston, with that big cigar, looking more and more like the late W. C. Fields, brought the house down when he appeared, followed by Anthony Eden, who had the pleased and incredulous look of a small boy allowed to go along and watch a gifted grandpa do card tricks. Churchill was magnificent. I never expect in my lifetime to hear and see a greater man. Beyond the puckishness and the hamming, there came through with tremendous sincerity the last, desperate effort of a noble old man to stem the tide toward war. His plea for 'a good hard try' at peace and co-existence could not have been spoken in a more unfavorable context; such talk has long been regarded here as subversive. The atmosphere was vividly indicated for all time when Churchill felt it necessary to assure his audience that he was not a Communist!"

—From our Weekly, July 5, 1954, on the press conference in Washington at which Churchill, at the height of McCarthyism, pleaded unsuccessfully that the death of Stalin called for a reversal of Western policy toward Russia and China. All the obituaries recall that Churchill was the prime architect of the cold war; few, that he was also among the first to propose its end.

Johnson and McNamara, in an effort to appease the military, seem to be resorting to a qualitative arms race. Looked at from the viewpoint of numbers, we have somewhat scaled down our projected strategic forces. Instead of 1200 intercontinental ballistic missiles, we are to have 1,000. This force will be supplemented by 900 long range bombers and 41 Polaris submarines, each with 16 missiles, or 656 in all. This adds up to a strategic striking force of 2,556. Just how stupendous this is may be seen if we realize that there are probably not more than a dozen prime targets in the Soviet Union; if these crucial industrial and urban areas were wiped out, its back would be broken. In terms of numbers, how-

Plans for Three Highways By-Pass Kentucky's Poorest Rural Counties

This Year's Appalachia Bill Even More Disappointing Than Last Year's

It is a pity that the people of Appalachia have come to expect so much of the Appalachia Development Bill. They will be disappointed. The bill as unveiled at Senate hearings last week is about as resourceful as a surgeon who assumes in advance his patient cannot be saved. Administration witnesses spoke of making Appalachia "just like the rest of the Nation" in 20 years, but the bill betrays them. If this is really a long range development program, it is the only one we know of with such short range plans. The life of the Appalachia Commission expires in just six years. The bill is so innocuous that the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and other like groups did not bother to testify against it. It even lacks the usual handouts to big business, which in Appalachia means coal, chemicals and railroads. "We couldn't come up with any solutions that were acceptable to all involved," said John Sweeney, the chief federal planner, "and therefore we had best avoid it." Evasion is the bill's one distinctive trait. (Also see box below.)

A Self-Defeating Standard

This bill is even weaker than the one the Senate passed last summer. A new section has been added which requires federal funds to be concentrated in areas where there is "the greatest potential for future growth, and where the expected return on public dollars will be greatest." Shouldn't the government be as interested in need as in profit? Isn't this just a polite way of saying that the most impoverished areas will receive the least funds? If so, the addition is superfluous for the entire administrative procedure tends to by-pass the poorest areas. The federal government is not permitted to initiate any projects. The purpose of this is to foster local self-help, but the effect is to give unfair advantage to the well-organized, administratively sophisticated urban centers which already have had some experience with government programs. By the time the more backward communities submit development plans, there will be little money left.

This isn't merely cynical speculation. Near the close of its hearings the Senate Public Works Committee heard testimony from two representatives of Jackson County, Kentucky. Jackson has the lowest median family income in the state. This means that 60% of its families earn less than $2,000 a year and 75% earn less than $3,000. About 10% of its homes are graced with hot running water. There is maybe one lawyer in the county to help with development plans. Jackson's spokesmen told the Senate committee that what Jackson and its four surrounding counties need most is a better highway. The present one, U.S. 421, is narrow and winding. It frightens off tourists and makes it hard to market the produce of the area. Highway construction is the central program in the Appalachia Bill and one would think that the Jackson region would be a priority target.

Taking The Sting Out of Antitrust

"The Internal Revenue Service Ruling in TIR-615 is bad law, bad public policy, and bad public administration. It permits an antitrust offender, already convicted of a criminal antitrust violation, to deduct [from his income tax] the treble damages paid to his victims. The legal question before this Committee is whether conduct which constitutes a criminal antitrust violation is conduct that is 'ordinary and necessary . . . in carrying on any trade or business' within the meaning of the statute [governing] income tax deductions. From the standpoint of public policy, the question is whether the 'sting' of treble damages should be lessened by shifting from the shoulders of criminal antitrust offenders to the taxpayers approximately one-half of treble damage awards. From the standpoint of public administration, the question is whether the Internal Revenue Service by an administrative ruling, not subject to judicial review, should in effect amend the antitrust laws by mitigating treble damages. . . . The attitude that a violation of our antitrust laws, even a flagrant criminal price-fixing conspiracy, is no worse than a traffic ticket is the major premise of TIR-615."

—Rep. Celler* (D., N.Y.), *in a statement to the Joint Comm. on Internal Revenue Taxation, Jan. 22 (abr.).

It isn't. When these Jackson men visited the state Appalachian planning office, they were told of tentative plans to build three highways all of which will neatly by-pass the poorest counties in Kentucky. There is no indication that the state will revise its plans, and Jackson is not entitled under the bill to appeal to Washington. All projects, according to another new amendment, must come through the state representative.

Appalachia's planners envision flourishing timber and tourist industries as the foundation of the region. Even if they are successful, the achievement is not an inspiring one. Timber is an uncertain business and some say demand is declining. Tourism is seasonal and low-paying. Surely this is not the best we can do. The bill is a challenge to Congressional liberals. We look to them for strengthening amendments.

Appalachia Gets Sewage Systems But Needs "Just Plain Water"

Sen. COOPER (R., Ky.): . . . Is there a gap in the [Appalachia] bill in that this section would not be available for the provision of just plain water to some community? I know it would provide sewage facilities . . . but there is no provision for water. And I know that there are many communities in my state, several county seats, which do not have any water facilities, they still use wells. In many cases, it is brackish mine water and very very dangerous to the health of the people and to the children in schools even. . . . I think we should correct that.

Mr. SWEENEY (Chairman, Federal Development Planning Committee for Appalachia): Senator, let me explain why it is not in the bill. We are aware of this. There are also no funds for school construction. It was our judgment and the President's judgment that until Congress had resolved this question nationally, we ought not to ask for a special program in Appalachia. When those two questions are resolved and there is a national program for water supply on a grant basis and also for school construction, . . . we [will be] in a position to recommend the needs Appalachia actually has. . . . This whole bill is an extension of existing programs to meet Appalachia's needs."

Behind Drug Magnate Connor's Appointment as Secretary of Commerce

Big Business Under LBJ Won A Privileged Position It Lost Under JFK

The President has done the country a disservice by making John Connor Secretary of Commerce. Connor was vice-chairman of the Business Advisory Council just prior to his appointment. The Council, which is confined to the elite of the business world, enjoyed privileged access to the Commerce Department until Luther Hodges became Secretary under Kennedy. Hodges refused to "consult" with the Council unless the press and small business were represented. Since this meant an end to its monopoly as an adviser the Council deserted both the Department and the Administration. After Mr. Johnson became President, the Council began meeting in the White House. Now one of its own rules the Department from which it was ousted. It is not surprising that Mr. Hodges departed Washington before the Inauguration.

Drugs and Patents

Unfortunately, Secretary Connor is more than the symbol of a new alliance with big business. He is also the just-resigned president of Merck & Co., one of the nation's leading drug firms. The lifeblood of the drug business is patents, and Connor, as Secretary, has jurisdiction over the U.S. Patent Office. At his Senate Commerce Committee hearing, Connor declared he would leave all patent matters involving Merck to the Patent Office. This is doubly misleading. The present Patent Commissioner, Edward Brenner, was persona grata with powerful patent interests. Before President Johnson appointed him last year, Brenner worked for Standard Oil of New Jersey as a relatively obscure patent attorney. Merck is also located in New Jersey. So are a host of other drug companies, including Johnson & Johnson, Olin Mathieson, Schering, Hoffman La-Roche and Ciba. Each has a battery of patent attorneys who together with Esso's make up a large part of the New Jersey Patent Bar. The Bar lobbyed hard for Brenner, while Connor on the Business Council and soon to become co-chairman of a campaign committee for Johnson-Humphrey was in a position of great influence. Leaving Merck's patent problems with Brenner is as risky as Mr. Johnson's policy of leaving oil matters to the former vice-president of Humble Oil, who heads the Oil Office at Interior.

Connor's offer is misleading in a more serious way. The major danger in having him as Secretary is not his ties with Merck but his pro-industry bias on drug patent policy. The drug companies have been taking advantage of the government. No matter how much money it pours into developing a drug—and there is practically no new drug without some federal funds—private industry gets the right to patent it. Often this means that the firm with the patent is the only one to sell the drug, at virtually any price, for 17 years. President Kennedy a month before he died tried to end this giveaway. He issued a memorandum which some officials at HEW interpret to mean that no patent should be given on any drug developed with government funds. They are now in danger of being over-ridden by the drug industry.

The industry, supported by Asst. Commerce Secretary Eaton, is pressing for a Presidential Commission to rewrite patent policy. Secretary Connor would recommend its members and might even become its chairman. It is appalling that Senators did not question him more closely on this. A clue to his attitude may be found in the drug industry's poop sheet (called "The Blue Sheet") for Dec. 23. Connor, it says, has "long suggested that the formula used by the National Cancer Institute in its chemotherapy program could serve as a model for a compromise policy." This was no compromise. The drug companies refused to take a single NCI contract until they were assured practically irrevocable patent rights. If a Presidential Commission is appointed, and it almost surely will be, Congress and not the Patent Office or the Commerce Secretary should set the ground rules.

Dept. of Humanitarianism in the Congo

"News correspondents are being kept out of Government-reoccupied territory in the northeastern Congo. The ban is apparently intended to prevent reporting of the killing of Congolese civilians by army troops and mercenaries. G. McMurtrie Godley, the U.S. Ambassador, has refused to permit correspondents to fly on the U.S. planes that carry mercenaries, ammunition and supplies for the Congolese forces. The transports provide the only available transportation to Paulis, Bunia, Lisala and other northeastern towns liberated from the rebels. Mr. Godley and other embassy officials insist that, although they would like to allow correspondents on the aircraft, the ban is enforced by Gen. Mobutu, the Congolese army commander. . . . One high ranking official said: 'There are so many things we are trying to get the Government here to do, you can hardly expect us to press them very hard on a thing like this'."

—From Leopoldville in the New York Times, Jan. 24.

Connor Hearing Disclosed That Conflict-of-Interest Law Was Weakened in 1962

An intriguing sidelight on Mr. Connor's appointment as Commerce Secretary is the revelation that the conflict of interest law for executive officers was seriously weakened by a 1962 amendment which was generally assumed to have been an improvement. This came to light in a memorandum written by the Chief Counsel for the Commerce Committee and included in the official record of that committee's investigation of Mr. Connor. The conflict of interest statute as amended has so many loopholes, wrote Counsel, that it "raises the question whether stock ownership in a corporation will ever suffice to establish" a violation of the statute (18 U.S.C. 208, 209).

The loopholes are subtle but substantial. The 1962 amendment applies only to action taken with respect to a "particular matter" and thus excludes action on equally profitable matters such as procurement and patent policy. It also fails to apply specifically to indirect financial interests and thus requires the difficult showing that a "particular matter," such as a government contract, has directly influenced the value of the stock held by the executive official. The amendment further fails to apply to action taken by a subordinate even though he may be aware of his boss' financial interests.

These omissions would allow McNamara were he today appointed Secretary of Defense, to do business with Ford Motor Company without selling his $1.5 million holdings in its stock and without violating any law. We may never rid government of corruption, but why invite it?

The New Pied Piper Campaign for the Anti-Ballistic Missile

ever, we can claim that we are "levelling off" in our attacking forces. But to keep the military happy, the new budget unveils an improved missile for the Polaris submarines, the Poseidon, with double the warhead payload and eight times the killing power of the Polaris A-3 missile. At a cost of $2 billion we are planning to begin replacing the A-3 with the Poseidon in 1969. But if some or all of the 656 Polaris missiles are to be replaced with Poseidon, this is the equivalent of a sharp quantitative increase. One Poseidon equals two Polaris missiles in payload and eight in killing power.

Polaris Becomes A First-Strike Weapon

The Poseidon also does something else, which we hope will be explored in Congressional hearings on the budget. Up to now Polaris has been described purely as a second-strike deterrent, a city-killer which could be used only in revenge if and after the Russians struck at us. Polaris was described as putting them on notice that even if they crippled the United States, these hidden watchdogs under the seas would destroy them. But now it is said that with Poseidon, and their increased payload and accuracy, Polaris submarines could strike harder-to-hit buried missile silos and thus become a first-strike weapon. This transformation of the Polaris from deterrent defense to an instrument of potential aggression is calculated to alarm the other side, and to set off the renewed arms race our military want.

The shrewd masters of the military-industrial complex are old hands at this game. Through Senators like Symington and journalists like Joseph Alsop, they built up the bogey first of an imaginary "bomber gap" and then of an equally imaginary "missile gap" with which to heat up the arms race and push up military expenditure. The extent of their triumph in these scare-campaigns can be measured. One measure is the jump in the level of arms spending from $45 billion a year under Eisenhower to more than $50 billion a year under Kennedy. The Democrats, on taking power under Kennedy, learned that there was no missile gap, but nevertheless built up a huge missile program just as if there had been a gap. This was the election pay-off to the aviation and missile lobby.

If We're Looking for Gaps to Fill

"A new review by one of the nation's leading nutrition experts in Postgraduate Medicine, a medical journal, re-emphasizes the food gap between white and Negro. That food gap probably accounts for a large part of the health gap: the Negro has a higher mortality rate in nearly every disease category. What Dr. Jean Mayer, professor of nutrition at the Harvard School of Public Health, found was appalling. One survey of the rural and urban South revealed that 60% of the Negroes and 25% of the whites had 'obviously inadequate' diets. For the North, no figures are available but Dr. Mayer checked hospital records in the North, talked with dieticians and health administrators and decided that Negro slums are a maelstrom of malnutrition. The indicators: anemias, growth failures, skin ailments, accidents of pregnancy—all associated with malnutrition. The worst fed were the Negro migrant workers who followed the crops from Florida to New York. In each group the children bore the brunt of the food gap."

—Earl Ubell in N.Y. Herald-Tribune, Jan. 24 (abr.).

Now the Joint Chiefs of Staff are pressing hard for an anti-missile and shelter program which could easily cost $50 billions. Johnson and McNamara have again turned them down, as Kennedy did before them. But in Alsop's column of January 13, one can read the opening strains of a new Pied Piper chorus building up for an anti-missile program next year. Should this campaign succeed, it would cut off Johnson's welfare program in the bud and subordinate all else to an intensified arms race more costly than anything we have yet seen. To the Russians, the launching of such a program, on top of our enormous first-strike power, would raise the spectre of preventive war. What little has been gained in relaxation of tension would vanish overnight. What this means is that the President cannot hope to hold the arms budget stable very long. He must educate the public to the dangers and take vigorous steps toward arms control and reduction, or sooner or later our military-industrial complex, with its vast propaganda resources, will succeed. That would end all hope of a Great Society.

The Truth About the Vietnamese War in A Dead U.S. Soldier's Pathetic Last Letter Home

"The day before he was killed, Army Sgt.1C Harold E. Strong wrote to his wife in nearby Fairfax County that he was glad to be 'getting out' of Vietnam in April. . . . He also wrote, a friend of the family said, that 'we just don't know what we're doing here.' The letter added, 'these people' (the Vietnamese) 'don't even want us here'."

VOL. XIII, NO. 5 FEBRUARY 8, 1965 WASHINGTON, D. C. 15 CENTS

The Day the CIA's Crystal Ball Cracked Wide Open

Washington, Jan. 26 (UPI)—Sen. J. Wm. Fulbright, D. Ark., said today after a briefing by Central Intelligence Director McCone that there did not appear to be any immediate danger of the South Vietnam government being overthrown.

This item deserves preservation. It came off the United Press-International ticker the afternoon of Tuesday, Jan. 26. Few newspapers published it next day though by 8:30 p.m. that night Washington was officially informed that the South Vietnamese government had again been overthrown. When I was a boy the favorite sport of enterprising newspapers was to catch public officials with their pants down. The new game laws seem to protect CIA Chiefs. Nobody seemed to feel that it was news that our foremost intelligence official had been proven wrong within a few hours of the private briefing he had given the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that day on the situation in Vietnam. Mr. McCone is a hard-driving business man. If a subordinate had so misinformed him on an important business deal, that subordinate would almost certainly been looking for another job.

Coup Already Planned and Announced

The flaccidity of the press is matched by that of the Senators. There was a time when one would have expected the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to recall Mr. McCone and ask him how he came to be so badly informed. There is evidence that the new coup was already in the works at the very time he spoke. For the New York Herald-Tribune reported from Saigon Jan. 28, "Reliable sources said Gen. Khanh and the powerful Armed Forces Council which he heads had originally planned the coup for next Tuesday [i.e. Feb. 2] but moved up the date after General Taylor decided on a 24-hour trip to Thailand and Laos yesterday [Jan. 26]." Indeed one of the Generals seems to have publicly indicated that the coup was coming hours before McCone briefed the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. For in Paris Le Monde, which covers Southeast Asia better than any other paper in the world, reported Jan. 28 that Tuesday afternoon, before flying off to Saigon, Gen. Nguyen Chanh Thi, commander of the first region, told students demonstrating against the government in Hué that a change of regime might well occur next day. The time difference between South Vietnam and Washington is 13 hours. When it's 3 p.m. in South Vietnam, it's only 2 a.m. in Washington. Mr. McCone appeared before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee at 10 a.m. Washington time. By then it was 11 p.m. in South Vietnam. But no agent had caught or sent this bit of news

Auguries For Peace?

We note some auguries for peace in Vietnam. Joseph Alsop is despondent. On Jan. 27 he complained that the President on three separate occasions had overruled recommendations from Gen. Taylor for strikes at North Vietnam. On Jan. 29 Alsop reported that the "domino theory" was now being treated scornfully at the White House. "The President has evidently persuaded himself, or at least three-quarters persuaded himself," Alsop wrote indignantly, "that a great defeat in South Vietnam need not have the grave consequences outside Vietnam predicted by the 'Domino Theorists'." The tone indicated that Alsop's patience was wearing thin, and that any day now he might stage a guerrilla uprising of his own.

On the afternoon of that same day, as if to confirm Alsop's suspicions, the Washington Star appeared with a headline, "Saigon Coup May Be Beneficial" over a column by Joseph Kraft, who also has sources in the White House. The coup, Kraft speculated, "far from being an undoubted setback," could be "a step toward the least bad of all possible settlements." This would be one that was "negotiated between the Saigon government and the Vietnamese Communists, with the U.S. edged obscurely into the background, and the Chinese Communists excluded altogether." This was preferable, Kraft wrote, to a "Geneva type" negotiation with Peking in which the U.S. might come off second-best with "disastrous impact . . . on domestic politics."

Mr. Kraft admitted that "Khanh's new regime has not yet fixed its direction." He could break with the Buddhists and "establish a military dictatorship." But it is possible, Mr. Kraft continued hopefully, "that Khanh will stick with the Buddhists, and initiate local negotiations." It sounded as if someone in the government were trying desperately to send Khanh a message, in a plain unmarked envelope.

Two days later, in the Sunday New York Times (Jan. 31), Seymour Topping reported from Saigon that "if a relatively representative government" asked the U.S. to leave, "officials here feel that there would be no choice but to go." He added that contingency plans were ready "to deal with a situation in which Americans might have to leave South Vietnam hastily." U.S. Marines would be airlifted from Okinawa "to screen the withdrawal of Americans." The only thing missing was an offer to supply "Americans Go Home" signs free of charge, with demonstrators paid by the CIA to wave them as we left.

Like the Bay of Pigs, Another Warning of Incompetent Intelligence to Washington. Could it be there were no American agents around to observe that student demonstration, no informers among them?

$4 Billion A Year on Intelligence

The U.S. spends a fortune on intelligence. David Wise and Thomas B. Ross in their recent book, "The Invisible Government" (Random House) report that Mr. McCone told a private briefing for high ranking military men in the summer of 1963 that U.S. intelligence had 100,000 persons involved in its work and spent $2 billion a year. That is three-quarters of a billion dollars more than the new and quadrupled poverty program. But Wise and Ross point out that this included only conventional forms of intelligence and not the electronic world-wide eavesdropping and aerial reconnaissance operations of the National Security Agency. They figure the total bill at $4 billions. A substantial portion of our intelligence network must be in Vietnam as a crucial war zone. There must be a swarm of U.S. agents and native informers assigned there by CIA and by the Pentagon's DIA, the Defense Intelligence Agency which tries to coordinate the separate, often exasperatingly conflicting intelligence services of Army, Navy and Air Force. Electronic monitoring by NSA must go on all the time from those ships and planes which constantly patrol the shores and skies of both North and South Vietnam. The Vietnamese Armed Forces depend for their payrolls on the United States. Its government would collapse overnight without U.S. support. Yet a new coup can be plotted in opposition to U.S. wishes without our far-flung civilian, military and electronic spy apparatus hearing about it until too late.

The coup was a blow to Gen. Taylor's prestige. No sooner did he leave town than the Huong regime he supported was thrown out and Gen. Khanh, whom Taylor hates, put back into power. Obviously military intelligence was pretty poor. Gen. Taylor wouldn't have left for Laos and Bangkok if he had suspected that this was brewing. The coup must also have hurt Mr. McCone's reputation as an intelligence chieftain with the Senators who heard him that morning. Here he was telling the Foreign Relations Committee in a private briefing that there was no immediate danger of an overthrow just when a change had already been plotted and indeed publicly forecast by one of the Generals. It would hurt Mr. McCone's reputation even more if the newspapers had done their duty and focused public attention on the incident. For he is not only head of CIA but chairman of the U.S. Intelligence Board which coordinates the activities of the government's twelve separate intelligence agencies. As after the Bay of Pigs affair, another glimpse of incompetence on the part of our intelligence, it is time to stop and consider this deeply. It is on such misinformation that American prestige, treasure and lives depend in Vietnam.

North Vietnam's Attitude Toward Peace

A dispatch from Moscow in The Worker (Jan. 31) merits wider attention. Its correspondent interviewed British Laborite MP William Warbey when he passed through the Soviet capital on his way back from North Vietnam. Warbey found Ho Chi Minh still vigorous and well-informed at 74. Warbey said he would report to the Foreign Office on his talks with Ho and with his Premier, Pham Van Dong. According to Art Shields, the Worker correspondent, Warbey reported that the Premier "said his government had no wish to hurry the question of unification" and added, "the people of South Vietnam have autonomy and will establish their own government and carry out their own policies in their own way. The North Vietnamese government, of course," this account continued, "wants to restore economic ties with the South. But it will not pressure South Vietnam to join its planned economy, and the way is open for friendship with the United States after the end of the intervention." This indicates that North Vietnamese policy is still the same as that reported by Dr. Bernard Fall and two other Western correspondents after interviews with Ho and Pham Van Dong in 1962 (see Fall's The Two Vietnams, p. 199), i.e. the acceptance of an independent neutral South in return for resumption of trade and peace between North and South. This provides a favorable atmosphere for Moscow's newly announced mission to Hanoi if (as Washington plainly hopes) it explores the possibilities of peace.

The War's No End of Fun in Saigon, But Not So Jolly in The Villages

"The U.S. military 'advisory' morale remains high, if chiefly because most 'advisers' know that, provided they survive, they will have gained battle experience and service promotion. Approximately 25% of the officers of the American Army's 16 divisions are already engaged in the South Vietnam war.

"With the growing influx of Americans, gracious, tree-lined Saigon at night is reminiscent of Tokyo under U.S. occupation. Crew-cut Americans in civilian clothes, with all the advantages of PX comforts, parade and dine their Vietnamese beauties, who are learning to chew gum, to pet in public and to wear skin-tight slacks.

"There has been a great expansion of bars and cabarets offering striptease. . . . Food and service have sharply deteriorated and prices are soaring. Every night the exhaust roar of crowded taxis and latest model limousines, racing the 1 a.m. curfew, drowns the distant rumble of mortar fire on the outskirts of the city.

"An average full-time investment in a 'good-family' concubine runs to about £25 a month. Any enterprising dance hostess can earn ten times the salary of a Government secretary. A cynical Saigon jest is 'the Vietcong occupy our countryside and seduce the peasants; the Americans occupy our cities and seduce our girls'."

—Richard Hughes, Saigon, to London Sunday Times Jan. 24.

"As an aide shrilly called off names, Major Ly handed each old man and woman a packet of freshly green printed piastre notes. Those who had lost a son or daughter, father or wife, were given the equivalent of $40; a lost cow or razed home brought half that amount. The villagers were very grave and formal and did not speak nor count their money nor acknowledge its receipt. It was like an ancient, unquestioned ritual solemnly undergone as a memorial to the dead. Yet almost every old face registered hate."

—Richard Critchfield from Nghia Hanh Village, South Vietnam, to the Washington Star, Jan. 27, describing the payment of reparations five months late "for the deaths and damage inflicted by the government's troops."

Public Hearings Begin on Enforcement of New Anti-Discrimination Weapon

Civil Rights Commission Panelists on Title VI Termed Too Lily-White

Civil rights and anti-poverty workers had a rare opportunity last week to confront federal bureaucrats en masse with their protests. This at least was the result if not the intention of the U.S. Civil Rights Commission's national conference on the Civil Rights Act. Agency officials were called on to explain how they will administer Title VI, which says that all federal funds must be withdrawn from state and local programs that practice discrimination. This can be a powerful $15 billion a year weapon against segregation.

At the two sessions we attended the audience showed itself in no mood for compromise. Aaron Henry, president of the Mississippi state NAACP, hit the most exposed nerve. "There are no Negro panelists helping direct this program," he declared to a panel on elementary and secondary education. "Why do you expect us to do more down South than you do in Washington?" When Hyman Bookbinder, the special assistant to Sargent Shriver in the poverty program, retorted that this wasn't a "useful" comment, Clarence Mitchell from the Washington Bureau of the NAACP quipped that it wouldn't be very helpful in Mississippi "if the Jackson Daily News came up here and took a picture."

14 Negroes 'Elected' in Miss.

The Agriculture Department has one of the toughest and most important jobs under Title VI. Its services in the rural South have always been administered locally by white men only. Assistant Secretary John Baker announced that special precautions last December resulted in the election of 14 Mississippi Negro farmers to a few of the county committees that administer the farm subsidy program. This was a remarkable first, but it was just a token victory compared to what a fair election would have produced. A young member of the National Lawyers Guild produced a briefcase full of affidavits from Negro farmers telling how they had been deprived of their votes. Many weren't informed of the election; others were directed to the wrong polls, and because the polls were in private stores, several civil rights workers who tried to assist them were arrested for trespassing. The Department had asked the FBI to guard the polls but the agency deferred to the local police.

The executive secretary of the National Sharecropper's Fund told the same panel that integration of the extension service in South Carolina was being used to downgrade the once independent Negro staff members. She said the Department would never find out the truth about its programs unless "someone from the Federal office and not tied to local influence is sent out to talk to the Negro agents away from the whites." The NAACP field director in South Carolina wanted to know why the few Negroes who are appointed to agricultural committees from Washington "in most instances owe allegiance for their jobs to the local power structure and cannot speak for the Negro community." These complaints were themselves indications of progress, but progress so slow that it embitters. The Department, for example, has failed to make any Negro appointments from the list of names that it asked civil rights workers to submit. The list took weeks to compile, and the Negro farmers who agreed to be part of it—some of them even from Neshoba county—did so at great personal risk.

Testimony from a young idealist at the Office of Economic Opportunity shows what can be done. The Office has refused to approve a Community Action Program in Cleveland because its board is not representative of the community; one of the two Negroes chosen for the 22 member board was most widely known for his refusal to take part in civil rights activity. A quarter-million dollar grant to Louisiana has also been held up because the administrator there is an ardent segregationist. In Atlanta, Georgia, a Negro woman active in voter registration has been given the job of neighborhood coordinator for the poverty program. These few isolated actions show what militant administration could do.

The Price Of That Tax Cut

"Sen. CLARK: I congratulate President Johnson on the budget which he sent to Congress yesterday—a budget which calls for a $5.3 billion deficit. In view of the prevailing attitude in Congress toward Federal expenditures, I recognize the political necessity which required him to hold his budget below $100 billion; but I deplore it. . . .

"Sen. GORE: . . . Had Congress not passed the tax reduction bill last year, we would now have a surplus instead of a deficit. . . . Now that we have closed our eyes to the real needs of our people and reduced Government revenue by more than $11 billion, we discover that we have something called poverty, against which we must wage war. We discover that our health facilities are inadequate; that our education is woefully inadequate; that our streams are polluted; our trains too slow; and that America is badly in need of beautification. But now we do not have the money to meet those problems because we gave away the revenue in an unwise, unjustified, political tax cut."

—In the Senate, Jan. 26.

Supreme Court Justices Startled by U.S. Position in Mississippi Voting Rights Case

No less than five Supreme Court justices expressed amazement last week at the government's argument in U.S. v. Mississippi. The case involves the constitutionality of Mississippi's voting laws, under which only 5% of voting-age Negroes in the state have been able to register. A finding of unconstitutionality would eliminate the need to prove county by county that the laws are being unfairly applied. This has been a painfully slow approach. Justices Harlan, Stewart, White, Black and Goldberg indicated readiness to rule on the question of constitutionality. Mr. Justice Harlan said the government's brief as he read it seemed to ask that "the laws be declared unconstitutional on their face by this court," but Mr. Archibald Cox, the Solicitor General, replied that he was not "pressing" for immediate relief. He asked only that the Court remand the case to a three-judge U.S. District Court for trial.

The reason for Mr. Cox's strategy was not made clear. Perhaps he feared defeat, but remanding the case means a two year delay. The three-judge court, with its two Mississippi justices, will almost certainly rule against the government, as it did in the original suit, and this will make necessary a second appeal to the Supreme Court.

Un-American Committee Faces Two Separate Attacks In The House

Attorney General Asked to Suspend HUAC Contempt Citations

Congressman Phillip Burton (D., Cal.) took the first action in Congress last week to overturn the Un-American Activities Committee's contempt citation against two leaders of Women Strike for Peace and the manager of the National Guardian. Dagmar Wilson, Donna Allen and Russell Nixon were cited last December when they refused to testify in an executive session of the committee. In a letter February 1 to Attorney General Katzenbach, Burton noted that he has introduced retroactive legislation which requires House approval for any contempt citation. In the current case, the Speaker of the House certified the contempt citation when Congress was not in session. In his letter, Burton asked the Attorney General for a stay in the contempt proceedings until Congress has acted on his bill.

To Avoid Another Surprise

More than a dozen liberal congressmen are currently planning two broader attacks on HUAC's powers. The first, which should occur in mid-February, seeks to reduce HUAC's funds. This is tricky because committee appropriations are privileged motions: they by-pass the Rules Committee and come directly to the floor from the Committee on House Administration. This happened so swiftly last year that every liberal but one was caught off the floor. To guard against a similar surprise move this year, Rep. Don Edwards (D., Cal.) has asked to testify on the HUAC appropriation. Liberals would then know approximately when it was coming to the floor. This year they will also have an ally inside the Administration Committee in freshman Rep. Jonathan Bingham (D., N.Y.). In the past this has been one of the most conservative committees in Congress. Nine of its fifteen Democrats are Southerners.

A further complication is that many liberals who are anti-HUAC are reluctant to use committee appropriations as a weapon against it. They fear that the precedent, once established, could be used against them easier than against the conservatives. In fact, it already has been. Last year the Administration Committee severely cut the appropriation for Rep. Adam Clayton Powell's Education and Labor Committee. Powell had to turn out anti-poverty, education and fair labor standards legislation with less money for his 30 staff members than HUAC received for its nine.

The second attack on HUAC seeks abolition. Here there are two approaches. One group of congressmen, including Burton, Edwards, Resnick and Hawkins from California, Rosenthal and Farbstein from New York, and Diggs from Michigan, all Democrats, has introduced resolutions to abolish HUAC and give Judiciary authority to investigate sabotage and "overt acts affecting internal security." All HUAC's records would be transferred to the National Archives "not to be opened for official or public inspection." A smaller group of congressmen, so far including only Roosevelt (D., Cal.) and Lindsay (R., N.Y.) has embarked on a bit of flim-flam. Their bills would "abolish" HUAC but only by transferring its existing authority to an Un-American Activities subcommittee of House Judiciary. This would merely shift the evil, not eradicate it.

FBI'S Right To Harass?

After two weeks of 24-hour a day surveillance by Chicago FBI agents, Mr. Sam Giancana sued for an injunction against the head of the Chicago FBI, Mr. Marlin Johnson. With only Mr. Justice Douglas dissenting, the Supreme Court last week refused without explanation to hear the case. The FBI agents, lacking a warrant, had followed Giancana on some 15 or 16 occasions to his golf club, had informed his partners and the club's manager that they were "federal agents," and had pursued Giancana even into the mausoleum where the remains of his wife were interred. The 3 to 5 FBI cars stationed within 10 yards of his home were equipped with telescopic lens cameras for photographing its interior. A U.S. District Court granted Giancana a temporary injunction and found FBI chief Johnson guilty of contempt for refusing to answer any questions concerning the surveillance. A U.S. Court of Appeals confirmed the contempt conviction but vacated the injunction on the ground that a district court has no jurisdiction in suits involving less than $10,000. Giancana had failed to place a dollar value on the damage done to him.

The Supreme Court Upholds Iron Curtains, P. 4

The Prize Remark of the Dominican Crisis

"In reply to a question based on a statement made yesterday by former President Juan Bosch that his government—if it came back—would not be Communist, Mr. Harriman responded: 'The United States takes no part in the political decision of the Dominican people in the selection of their leadership'."

—From Bogota, Colombia, where Harriman, as President Johnson's Ambassador at Large, stopped over on his tour to drum up Latin American support for U.S. intervention in the Dominican Republic, New York Times May 3.

The Fatal Lure of World Dominion

The Department of Commerce publishes a daily bulletin in which the government advertises various wants for bidding. There in the issue of April 29, as our Marines were landing in Santo Domingo, appeared an ad which deserves to be preserved for the historian. Amid requests for bids on tires, spare aircraft parts and survival kits, was this item—

> Service and materials to perform a RESEARCH STUDY ENTITLED 'PAX AMERICANA' [capitals in original] consisting of a phased study of the following: (a) elements of National Power; (b) Ability of selected nations to apply the elements of National Power; (c) A variety of world power configurations to be used as a basis for the U.S. to maintain world hegemony in the future. Quotations and applicable specifications will be available upon request, at the Army Research Office, 3845 Columbia Pike, Arlington, Va., until 1 May 1965.

Military Taking Over The State Dept.

What better time to study the problem of maintaining American world hegemony than the moment when our combat troops were going ashore in Vietnam on the South China sea in one hemisphere and in the Caribbean in the other. Coupled with this ad were three others from the Army. One was a study of the foreign aid programs of the West European nations. The second was "U.S. Involvement in the Emerging Nations," a study "to determine the quality and quantity of total U.S. presence and influence in Latin America, Africa and Asia, to identify salient trends and to project the latter into the 1975-1980 time frame." The third was the most disturbing, "Investigation of the feasibility and desirability in the 1970 time frame, of providing selected U.S. allies a significant nuclear defense capability without necessity for maintaining U.S. controls or custody over weapons systems or their employment." (Our italics). These contracts provide an insight into what is going on within our military bureaucracy, the extent to which it is invading the State Department's province in making foreign policy, and the kind of foreign policy the armed forces project for the future—one in which they play policemen to the world, even handing out nuclear weapons to favored allies in the task! This is a formula which can only end by spilling the blood of our best youth in an endless attempt to dominate the planet. This is in the background of Johnson's increasingly militaristic policy in Asia and Latin America. Like Bismarck, we are resorting to blood and iron.

Glimpses of the Truth

"A U.S. Peace Corps worker, who asked not to be identified, said there seemed to be wide countryside support for the revolution to return Bosch to power. He said the more than 100 U.S. Peace Corps volunteers in the Dominican Republic were safe and in no danger, even in Santo Domingo."

—AP from Santo Domingo in Washington Post May 3

"Diplomatic sources said the rebels promised to do their best to make the cease-fire effective. So far they appear to have done so. There was little shooting here today by either of the opposing forces. Some diplomats point to this as indicating the pro-Bosch but anti-Communist military leaders have greater control of the rebel movement than many observers here had supposed. U.S. officials who claimed the Communists now dominate the rebel movement, declined to explain the ability of the rebel military leaders to achieve a cease-fire, except to say that apparent Communist obedience was simply a matter of Red 'tactics'."

—Dan Kurzman, Washington Post staff man from Santo Domingo in that newspaper same day.

Two of Kennedy's utterances come to mind as one watches the steady degeneration of policy under Johnson. One was in Kennedy's American University speech in June, 1963, "What kind of peace do I mean and what kind of peace do we seek? Not a Pax Americana enforced on the world by American weapons of war." The other was at the University of California that year when Kennedy warned, "We must reject oversimplified theories of international life—the theory that American power is unlimited, or that the American mission is to remake the world in the American image." Such views are now out of fashion. They are stigmatized as neo-isolationist while ultra-nationalist ambition parades as internationalist idealism.

All kinds of excuses could be made for Johnson's Vietnam policy. He inherited the war from Kennedy. He needed a position of strength from which to negotiate. But the Dominican affair and the "Johnson Doctrine" put Vietnam in a different light. For what Johnson is saying is that despite the Charters of the United Nations and of the Organization of American States we arrogate to ourselves the right to intervene whenever and wherever we believe a Communist regime may take over. This doctrine has two deplorable consequences. Like the Vietnamese war it must tend to solidify the Communist bloc just when centrifugal forces had made an appearance within it; American policy in Europe under Eisenhower and Kennedy had begun to encourage independence within the bloc by treating each European (though not Asian) Communist regime differently. Now that different types of Communism have begun to appear, and with them liberalizing trends, we enunciate a doctrine that no longer distinguishes among them. The effect may be to risk a new Stalinist Ice Age in the bloc as its members draw together again in fear of the U.S.

Bosch Accuses The U.S.

Mr. [Robert] PIERPONT (CBS News): Mr. Bosch, do you support the presence of U.S. troops in the Dominican Republic?

Sr. [Juan] BOSCH (deposed President of the Dominican Republic): No, sir. As you or other Americans could not support the presence of foreign troops in your country. . . .

Mr. PIERPONT: Do your people there feel and report to you that American troops are supporting General Wessin y Wessin and opposing your return? . . .

Sr. BOSCH: When infantry landed in San Isidro they found Wessin y Wessin was defeated. . . .

Mr. [Richard] HOTTELET (CBS News): Are you saying, Mr. Bosch, the U.S. has invaded the Dominican Republic and is changing the course of the revolution?

Sr. BOSCH: Of course, of course. . . .

Mr. PIERPONT: Mr. Bosch, you said that you have asked your forces in Santo Domingo not to fire on Americans. Are they following their orders?

Sr. BOSCH: Not absolutely. It was impossible because American Marines have shot Dominicans and they are going into the city, the old city, firing, in the first moment firing into the air and firing into the ground, not exactly at persons but they are going to disarm people who walk in the streets and so they are going to kill people and people are going to kill them.

Mr. PIERPONT: Are you saying the American forces began the killing then?

Sr. BOSCH: Yes, sir. . . .

Mr. PIERPONT: Does this mean, in your opinion, the cease-fire has broken down completely?

Sr. BOSCH: Yes. It was broken by American Marines.

—Juan Bosch on CBS Face The Nation, May 2.

McCarthyism In Foreign Policy

The implications are also serious for the non-Communist world. Social reform movements and anti-military uprisings in Latin America and elsewhere will be at the mercy of American definitions of what constitutes Communism. The Johnson Doctrine is McCarthyism in foreign policy. Like McCarthyism at home, it faces the same basic dilemma and that is to determine who is a Communist. Foreign policy generally tends to be to the right of domestic policy; the familiar accusation of Communism was unable to block the New Deal and the Fair Deal at home when popular feeling and democratic institutions overrode rightist propaganda in the press and communications generally. But in foreign policy, where popular feeling rarely registers, we often tend to regard with suspicion in Latin America regimes which are no more Leftist than was FDR's. This is why countries like Chile, Uruguay, Costa Rica, Venezuela and Mexico—all non-Communist regimes—look with suspicion on our Dominican intervention. The sources on which the government depends in foreign policy decisions are all heavily weighted against the non-Communist reformer. Big business, the military, the intelligence apparatus and the Foreign Service tend to share the views of their opposite numbers in the countries with which we deal, and in Latin America these sectors of society are even further right than in our own. To this influence must be added that of the Catholic Church. Cardinal Spellman—himself a major factor in U.S. foreign policy—was long a pillar of both the Diem regime in South Vietnam and the

How the Anti-Castro Obsession Undercut JKF's Program for Latin Social Reform

"However enthusiastic Kennedy's New Frontiersmen were in behalf of counterinsurgency . . . they did not convince the Latin American military leaders that this was the best way to fight Communism. The Administration's thesis that Castro's success was due to guerrilla-warfare techniques, unbeatable by the use of conventional arms, was not accepted. Instead, the Latin American generals . . . demanded tremendous amounts of new equipment—tanks, jets, destroyers—to defend their own country. The military, particularly those of Brazil and Venezuela, took advantage of the October, 1962, missile crisis to double and triple their demands for heavy military hardware. . . .

"Latin America's armed forces were willing to cooperate with the U.S. anti-guerrilla training missions and to devote a unit or two of their establishments to anti-guerrilla warfare operations but . . . the counter-insurgency units did not always perform as intended. In Peru, the anti-guerrilla commandos spearheaded the ouster of President Manuel Prado. In the Dominican Republic, the U.S. trained police joined the Army in ousting President Bosch, following which both the police and the anti-guerrilla units, trained during 1963 by a 44-man U.S. Army Mission, were used to hunt down Bosch's non-Communist partisans in the name of anti-Communism. In Guatemala and Ecuador, too, there was every indication that the counter-insurgency forces, both the police and Army units, were being used principally to stifle the political thrust of the non-Communist left. . . . which Washington [under Kennedy] believed to be the best defense against Communism. . . .

"The [Kennedy] Administration's policies were not always consistent. Its general policy was to encourage the growth of responsible apolitical military organizations so that democracy might have a better chance to function; yet, when it wanted to isolate Cuba, it did not hesitate to make political use of the military against policies of the civilian governments of Argentina and Ecuador. Also, it compromised democratic principles for the sake of expediency in accepting the coups of Guatemala and Ecuador. Finally, it began to veer toward a watered-down definition of democracy by going along with vetoes issued by the military against majority-supported civilian politicians. . . .

"As military intervention in many countries blocked democratic social revolution, it gave added weight to Castro's oft-repeated assertion that there is no alternative between violent social upheavals and military dictatorship. And it was certainly true that, despite its noble efforts and intentions, the Kennedy Administration accomplished little in furthering the cause of democracy in Latin America."

—Edwin Lieuwen: Generals vs. Presidents—Neo Militarism in Latin America (Praeger, 1964) highly recommended.

Trujillo dictatorship in the Dominican Republic. If such forces decide who is Communist, then social reform in the hemisphere and elsewhere is indeed in trouble.

Kennedy Supported Bosch

Here we come to a sharp difference between the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations. The former was friendly to Bosch but Standard Oil of New Jersey was hostile to him, as was (to its shame) the AFL-CIO. While our Ambassador, John Bartlow Martin, warned the Dominican military against a coup to unseat Bosch, his warnings were undercut by our Military Mission in the island, some of whose members agreed that Bosch was a Communist. The Catholic Church, which had opposed Bosch's election, was angered by the adoption of a secular Constitution. So after seven months, the first freely elected Dominican regime in a generation was overthrown. Bosch was all we claimed we wanted: a truly democratic social reformer absolutely free from any taint of Communism, as his friends Betancourt of Venezuela and Figueres of Costa Rica and our own Norman Thomas were prepared to attest. I was in the Dominican Republic when Bosch was in power, and I was impressed by his inspiring eloquence, his devotion and his uncompromising civil libertarian principles. But for the military and big business and the CIA to be a genuine liberal was by definition to be "soft on Communism." Kennedy, to his credit, shut off all aid to the new military regime after Bosch was overthrown and refused to recognize it. Only the military dictatorships of Spain, Portugal, Formosa and Honduras extended recognition in the month after the coup, while the U.S. held off. But Johnson, soon after Kennedy's assassination, reversed that policy. The reader can see from the box at the bottom of this page that Johnson, with Tom Mann, swung away from the social reform emphasis of the Alliance for Progress and toward military dictatorships submissive to American business interests—like Brazil's which Rusk hailed as a victory for democracy and constitutional government!

Just One Big Plot From One Big Switchboard

Mr. Rowland EVANS: Senator Dodd, you just said you are very sure there is a connection between events in the Dominican Republic and the fighting in Vietnam. Would you document that a little bit? Do you mean there is a central command post somewhere, perhaps in Peking, that is signalling an outbreak of trouble in the Caribbean at a specific time to embarrass President Johnson and the United States?

Senator DODD: Yes, I do. . . . I am satisfied that this situation in the Dominican Republic is tied right into our struggle in Southeast Asia.

—On Meet the Press, May 2.

There is no country for which U.S. intervention has a grimmer meaning than the Dominican Republic. The long and bloody night of the Trujillo dictatorship was ushered in by a similar U.S. Marine occupation. That Caribbean Nero was himself trained by the Marines, later armed by U.S. military aid, and praised by our Eastlands and Ellenders and McCormacks during the terrible years he imposed upon his people. The cry of Communism is familiar to them; for 30 years every opponent of The Benefactor was labelled a Communist. "I beg President Johnson and the American people," Mrs. Juan Bosch, herself a Cuban aristocrat, said at an anguished press conference here, "to understand that we are your friends. We are not 'rebels.' We are democrats fighting to regain the liberties which were stolen from us by Gen. Wessin. We need your help and understanding, not your paratroopers . . . not your bullets." Never was the Red Menace more fraudulently trotted out than against Bosch and his supporters. Every American who knows what such interventions have cost the Latins in the past must blush with shame over Johnson's revival of gunboat diplomacy.

How Johnson and Tom Mann Shifted the Emphasis from Reform to Anti-Communism

"Since his very first days in office, President Johnson has had to deal with the problem of militarism in Latin America. In the last two months of the Kennedy Administration, the U.S. boycott—diplomatic, economic and military—of the Dominican and Honduran regimes, as intended, seriously weakened the position of the military rulers in those two nations. But they soon came up with the magic formula for resisting demands to restore democracy and constitutionalism; it was the cry of Castro-Communism. Though Castro-Communism was never a serious problem when the democratic governments of Bosch and Villeda Morales were in power, the new military rulers repeatedly warned that Washington's ostracism of their regimes had given strength to subversive elements and that a Cuban-type upheaval was in store unless recognition and aid were granted. To this blackmail, the new Johnson Administration succumbed. On Dec. 14, 1963, in exchange for assurances that some kind of elections would be held during 1965, the juntas in the Dominican Republic and Honduras were recognized. During January and February 1964, the economic and military aid programs were resumed.

"During March came further evidence that a basic policy shift was under way in Washington. On March 16, the third anniversary of the Alliance for Progress, President Johnson paid lip service to the U.S. continued devotion to the principles of economic development, social justice and human freedom for Latin America, but he made no mention of the principal internal impediments to freedom and social justice, namely, the military and the oligarchies. Instead he mentioned that the principal threat to the Alliance was from Communism and in unequivocal terms pledged that 'the full power of the U.S. is ready to assist any country where freedom is threatened by forces dictated from beyond the shores of the continent.'

"But two days later, on March 18 [1964], at a meeting of U.S. Ambassadors to Latin America, the new Assistant Secretary for Latin American Affairs, Thomas Mann, reportedly suggested that it was unwise for the U.S. to continue to become involved in internal threats to freedom in Latin America, since Kennedy's policies had demonstrated how fruitless it was for the U.S. to try to impose democracy upon Latin America. Mann urged that greater attention be paid to immediate national-security interests, such as protection of U.S. investments and resistance to Communism. He suggested a less passionate commitment to political freedom and social justice. The emerging 'Mann doctrine' seemed to be that henceforth the U.S. would no longer oppose military coups or rightist dictatorships. Thus, the new and much narrower criteria for recognizing and supporting new governments in Latin America seemed to be anti-Communism and security for foreign investments. Eliminated were the Kennedy foreign-policy dimensions of human freedom and social justice."

—Lieuwen: Generals vs. Presidents (Praeger, 1964)

To Uphold The Cuban Travel Ban Is To Make Police State Law for the Hemisphere

A Supreme Court Decision To Match LBJ's Latin American Policy

It is most disappointing that Chief Justice Warren and Mr. Justice Brennan abandoned their liberal principles and made possible a 6-to-3 victory for reaction in the Zemel case. The issue was the State Department's power to erect Iron Curtains around countries of which it disapproves, in this case Cuba, and forbid travel to them. The Chief Justice's decision breathes the same Metternichian spirit as the Johnson messages on the Dominican Republic and can serve only to set a bad example for the Americas.

The Same Iron Curtain Logic

This is a hemispheric police state decision. "The U.S. and other members of the Organization of American States," the Supreme Court noted, "have determined that travel between Cuba and the other countries of the Western Hemisphere is an important element in the spread of subversion, and many have therefore undertaken measures to discourage such travel." But if conditions in Cuba are as repellent as our government says they are, what better way to expose them than to encourage more people to go and see for themselves? If, on the other hand, progress is being made under Castro, then our Iron Curtain has the same purpose as those of totalitarian regimes—to keep their people from seeing the truth about the outside world and the falsity of their own propaganda.

The Chief Justice recognizes queasily that "the Secretary of State's refusal to validate passports for Cuba renders less than wholly free the flow of information concerning that country." But he and the majority decline to accept the contention that this is an invasion of First Amendment rights. They fall back on the view that "the changeable and explosive nature of contemporary international relations" justify the Executive in wielding greater authority on the world than on the domestic scene.

If travel can facilitate "the spread of subversion" so can the reading of dangerous books and periodicals. If the President can shut off travel to Cuba or China or North Vietnam, as he does under present travel restrictions, can he also shut off publications from those countries? Or publications at home he deems friendly to them? Where do you stop once you decide that First Amendment rights may be restricted for foreign policy reasons? The Communists are not the only ones to use "salami" tactics in cutting away basic rights.

Punished for Going to Cuba

The U.S. seems to think it has the right to control the travel to Cuba not only of its own citizens but of Latin Americans. On April 28 immigration authorities at Kennedy Field in New York took away the residence card of a respected Latin American Washington correspondent, Leopoldo Aragon, on his return from Mexico. He was told the action was taken "on suspicion of having been to Cuba"! Aragon writes for El Dia (Mexico), Ultima Hora (Santiago, Chile), Epoca (Montevideo) and Gestos (Lima). His visit to Cuba was no secret (his last previous visit there was in 1961) and he is to write a series on Cuba for his papers. This means writing with the threat of expulsion hanging over his head. Unless he obtains a new residence card, he and his family must pull up roots and leave the U.S. or face separation. Aragon's wife is a naturalized citizen. They have two American children. He is a Panamanian. We ask other papers to inquire and protest.

Black, Douglas and Goldberg dissented. The views of the dissenters reflect a philosophy suddenly on the wane. If travel is to be barred to shut off Communist ideas, Douglas and Goldberg argued, we have to deal with more than Cuba. There are Communist regimes on every continent "and if we are to know them and understand them, we must mingle with them, as Pope John said." The dissenters pleaded that "keeping alive intellectual intercourse between opposing groups" has "perhaps never been more important than now."

The First Amendment, Douglas and Goldberg declared in words which recall Holmes and Brandeis, "presupposes a mature people, not afraid of ideas." That Amendment, they protest, "leaves no room for the official, whether truculent or benign, to say nay or yea because the ideas offend or please him, or because he believes some political objective is served by keeping the citizen at home or letting him go." The words begin to sound like the echo of a vanishing age.

SURVEY ON GEORGIA CHILDREN AND YOUTH
Made Summer 1961

This survey has been an attempt to bring together factual information on children and youth held in common jails in Georgia during the year June 1, 1960 to June 1, 1961.

The survey was not made in a critical attitude toward anyone. Local people usually do the best they can with facilities at hand. Pertinent information on actual conditions and needs is necessary to enlist many individuals and groups in a "look-see" regarding needs for detention, study and diagnosis, as well as the strengthening of programs dealing with prevention of juvenile delinquency, mental illness, etc. The foundations for adult crime and mental illness is formed in the earlier years.

It is hoped that the information secured by this survey will be used to help Georgia boys and girls soon, and in turn future adult Georgians.

Some Instructions or Suggestions for Completing Survey:

1. Those held in jail include all children confined in the common jail, even if a separate space is provided within the jail for detaining children.
2. If the exact age is unknown or unavailable to you, then estimate as close as possible. Example; if the child is thought to be less than 12, or even 12, then count this child in the first block - if more than 12 count him in the second block, etc.
3. The child may have been neglected and as a result become delinquent, but if the delinquent act brought him to the attention of the law, then the delinquent act is the major cause at the time for being placed in jail. The reason at the time of being detained is needed, not contributing causes.
4. In order to get a true survey in a county, the information on children within the independent school area must be combined with those outside.

What do you think is the significance of the above information?

SOME ITEMS LIFTED FROM SURVEY WITH TABULATED REPLIES

I. Do you have sufficient foster homes in your county or available in near-by counties?

17 replied -- yes

82 replied -- no

Others doubted having a sufficient number, but stated some foster homes were available.

II. With the help of your sheriff, judge or who ever is most concerned and with whom you work closely, estimate how many children in your county need detention and study to determine what would be appropriate handling or treatment to prevent delinquency and/or mental illness, etc.

The tally shows 4,862

Comments when number not given were such as:

1. "about 10% of the children need some help"

2. "cannot estimate number"

3. "large number"

III. If you have detention facilities separate and apart from the jail for detaining children in trouble please describe briefly.

99 counties reported NO facilities

PERTINENT FACTS

The length of time confined in jail by Georgia children ranged from one-half ($\frac{1}{2}$) hour to twelve (12) months.

The majority of those more than 16 were school drop-outs. A significant number 840 had already dropped out of school from the 16 to 18 age group, but were sent back to the local school by the court. This practice creates undue problems in the local school.

The majority of those held for delinquent acts had records of irregular school attendance.

Irregular and non-attendance are symptoms of underlying problems.

Several counties reported that no records on juveniles were kept. These counties are included in the count.

Three counties reported only names were available - local officials attempted to recall ages and offences.

Two counties reported that local officials did not want the information given. Survey coordinator advised workers not to send report, as desires of local officials should be respected.

Children in Georgia's Jails

Crying for Understanding, Child Finds Doors Closed

By PEPPER ROBERTS

Georgians apparently love children—our census reveals that we have many. And we seem interested in their future because we provide them with schools, health centers, and elaborate recreation facilities.

But when the child cries out in the dark for understanding and a protecting arm, our services falter drastically. Somewhere along the line many children become disenchanted with what we have to offer, and many parents, if they are around, are not communicating with them too well.

These are the times when children have problems and children are problems. These are the crucial periods for parents and society. Here are our children by the thousands who are groping for love, affection, compassion, undertaking, guidance, and protection.

But how do we Georgians respond to their desperate needs. The answer comes quick and direct: For years we have slammed the steel door of the common jail in their helpless faces.

FOR THE PAST 12 months in 123 counties in Georgia we have subjected over 5,000 boys and girls to this terrible fate, and they join the inestimable thousands who have shared a similar fate for generations past. Can we still wonder why in 1958 Georgia held the record among states with the most persons behind bars per population —181 per 100,000. And in 1960, after the infamous 1958 record, our prison population jumped to 244 per 100,000.

The appalling fact is that most of the current children were not included in the statistical count. But we can be assured that children of the past who have been subjected to these injustices swell the ranks of the 10,000 persons now in our prison system.

Thousands of our children are jailed each year as delinquents and many times their delinquency is based on who they are, how much they are in the way, and the place where they live. Additional hundreds are jailed because they are neglected and dependant.

ONE DOES NOT need to be an expert in the field of child welfare to recognize the tremendous harm done to these poor unfortunates and even to succeeding generations that they may sire. These children suffer from shame and humiliation. They bear a stigma which will exist with them all their lives. These persons of tender years are often subjected to older criminal offenders and witness many acts and hear many things that would cause any decent adult to pale.

Children having once been jailed find themselves demeaned and the object of ridicule. Many are ostracized and lose their feelings of worthwhileness and self-respect. They are the innocent victims who are made fertile to feed the tremendous crime mill we possess here in Georgia.

If you have begun to wonder whether anyone cares about these children being locked up, then seek out your local sheriff and determine how many children he has harbored in his home rather than using his jail. These acts of humanitarism have been performed by sheriffs hundreds of times. They have pleaded for help years on end.

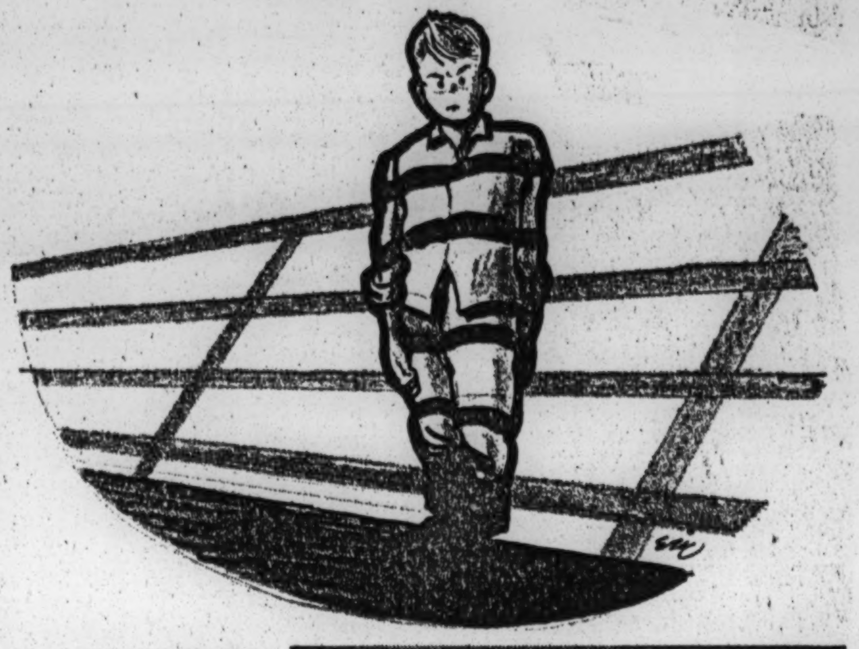
TALK WITH the school authorities and visiting teachers concerning their problems of readjusting these children to their respective schools and communities.

Visit in the home of a distraught mother and father who have a child locked behing bars and are helpless to do anything about it.

Look jailed children in their eyes and try to convince yourself that this is for their welfare.

Perhaps a more realistic shock will develop if you will envision your own children in jail. They aren't immune.

When we Georgians realize and feel the need for a remedy to this grave problem, something will be done. Open your eyes, seek the truth of this awful fact in your community, and you will open your heart.



Money Used to Jail Child Would Help New System

By ADA TOOMBS

"Parens Patriae," a principle of old English Common Law, describes the chancellor as "keeper of the King's conscience" and as such responsible for protecting widows and orphans and correcting wayward children. It means simply the king, through his chancellor, stood in place of "the wise father."

From this ancient principle developed our concept of governmental responsibility for children who become wards of the state through our courts and who are in need of guidance, protection, discipline and correction. Because citizens now hold the power of government then vested in the king, you and I stand in the "parens patriae" relationship to children who for whatever reason are brought to our courts.

How do we fulfill this responsibility to the thousands of children in our courts?

Well, last year we clapped 5,000 of them in our county jails and city lockups because we had no place else to keep them until their cases could be heard. Five hundred were young children. They weren't accused of any mischief. They were abandoned or neglected by their parents and dependent on our cold mercy.

THERE IS only one full-time juvenile court judge in all of Georgia. Only 26 counties have juvenile courts with part-time judges.

Such state children services as we have are divided, fragmented and covered up by the major responsibilities of various state departments. The Welfare Department operates the training schools for delinquent boys and girls. The Board of Corrections operates a prison for young offenders. Pages 56 and 57 of their annual report shows 476 boys and girls up through age 17 sentenced to prison last year. Of these, 452 were first offenders.

Now I don't believe judges enjoy sending youngsters to state prison. Our prison officials aren't happy to have them. There was simply no place else to put them.

THIS ISN'T any new problem. We have talked about this sorry circumstance for years. Meetings about juvenile delinquency and our lack of children services are held regularly from Brasstown Bald to Tybee Light. We've had surveys. Joint House and Senate committees have met, studied and recommended. The question is how to get past the talking and into action.

It's a big problem, a big state and there is no simple [illegible] so many boys and girls behave in ways which cause us pain and cost money. Behavior is a symptom like fever. The fever isn't what's wrong, it's what ails them is the matter. This involves diagnostic counselling and guidance by competent trained people.

WE NEED vocational training to give these boys and girls usable skills. The market for unskilled workers is down and dropping every year.

If they are ever to become economically independent, instead of a charge of the taxpayers, they must be trained to fit our emerging industrial economy—but they cannot be used until they are trained.

We need a diversified system of state facilities equipped with trained staff and geographically located for maximum use of other available private and public services to properly house and care for these youngsters. We must at long last get these children out of Georgia jails.

OF COURSE this will cost money. This cannot be denied. But we are spending our tax dollars now on our archaic and sometimes vicious operation. If we could redirect the money we spend on sending and keeping these boys and girls in prison, we wouldn't have to look for money. We would have saved it.

A bill to establish a Georgia Department of Youth will be before the General Assembly in January. This legislation takes a new direction. It consolidates the responsibility. It contains the beginnings of hopeful, forward looking programs. Many people are giving careful thought to its provisions.

It will be introduced by the representative from Ware County, Tom Parker. It will pass the House and Senate and receive the necessary appropriation only if it receives the full support of Georgia citizens. It's high time for you and me to get into action. It's time for us to act in "parens patriae" for our children.

THE WEST FELICIANA STORY

by Ronnie Moore

West Feliciana is a southeastern Louisiana parish with a 60% Negro population where no Negro had registered since 1902. On October 17, 1963, at approximately 2:30 p.m., Rev. Joseph Carter emerged from the St. Francisville courthouse, smiling and waving his voter registration certificate.

It was just a year since the start of CORE's registration drive in West Feliciana and seven other parishes of Louisiana's 6th Congressional district. In West Feliciana, fear, apathy and ignorance had prevailed. On one occasion in the town of Tunica, Weldon Rougeau, also a CORE field secretary, and I were ordered out of a minister's conference because local Negroes feared for their lives and the safety of their meagre property.

This past summer our efforts were intensified when Rudy Lombard, and Gordon Carey, two national CORE officers, headed a group of some 50 CORE Task Force workers to work in this area and especially in West Feliciana. As a result, on August 10, Rev. Carter and another Negro minister, Rev. Rudolph Davis, attempted to register. They were told that they each would have to be identified by two registered voters—an impossibility, since there were no Negroes registered in the parish. When Rev. Carter approached Registrar Fletcher Harvey to inquire about his qualificaiton, he was promptly arrested by Sheriff W. C. Percy for "disturbing the peace" and jailed overnight.

P.S. TO "THE PLAQUEMINE STORY"

by James Farmer

On October 7, the Negro students of Plaquemine, Louisiana went on strike forcing a four-day shutdown of the high school. In addition to demanding reinstatement of a fired lunchroom worker, they sought reinstatement of 35 of their fellow-students who had been suspended, desegregation of Iberville parish schools by 1964 and equal job opportunities for Negroes.

Police teargassed the striking students, first as they marched in groups of 10 to the white high schools, which they were picketing and again as they assembled in Freedom Rock Baptist Church (the church's name had been changed from "Plymouth Rock" to "Freedom Rock" following our mass demonstrations which I described in the last COREIator).

Police Chief Dennis Songy threatened to destroy the church asserting: "If they want to use that church to serve God, that's OK, but they're not going to use it as a fort." The word "fort" was ill-chosen for the student protest action remained peaceful throughout. Evidently the police chief does not believe the parishioners have the right to use their church as they see fit.

Two of the student leaders—Kenneth Johnson and Willie Mellien—have been committed to the State Industrial Detention House for Juvenile Delinquents for an indefinite period. This means up to five years for Johnson, who is only 16 and was a CORE Task Force member. Attorneys are seeking a habeaus corpus writ to secure their release.

In Clinton, the start of picketing in the downtown business section on October 14 resulted in the arrest of 38 pickets and a CORE field worker. Attempts by the state to enjoin all CORE activity were halted pending a ruling by the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on the validity of the state court hearing.

FREEDOM VOTE DRIVE

CORE was an active participant in the Council of Federated Organizations during its recent Freedom Vote Campaign in Mississippi which netted 90,000 gubernatorial votes for Aaron Henry. CORE Field Secretary Dave Dennis was an executive of the Henry campaign committee.

CORE Task Force Worker George Raymond was run out of Yazoo City three times by local police and was finally arrested by highway patrolmen. Yazoo City is one of the localities where CORE concentrated its campaign efforts. Others were Meridian, Canton and Jackson.

Georgia Insurrection Law Voided—4 Freed

(Editor's Note—Thanks to readers who heeded the appeal in the last CORE-lator to write Attorney General Kennedy and President Kennedy on this case.)

Georgia's 1871 insurrection law and a state law against unlawful assembly were declared "unconstitutional and void" by a special 3-judge federal court on November 1. Reasonable bail was ordered set immediately for a CORE field secretary and three SNCC field workers who since August had been imprisoned in Americus without bail on the grounds that this law carries the death penalty.

Also the court demanded reasonable bail for two other SNCC workers who had ben held on other miscellaneous charges. The six were thereupon released on bail totaling $11,150 and were greeted enthusiastically by a group of over 150 friends and supporters. They want to remain in Americus and continue the civil rights struggle from where they left-off.

The court decision, which was two-to-one, came after a-day-and-a-half hearing marked by testimony of extreme police brutality against civil rights demonstrators last August. Witnesses related how they had been clubbed mercilessly and jabbed with electric prod rods.

Sallie Mae Durham told how, upon requesting medical aid following her arrest, she was thrown into a five-by-five "dungeon." James Williams, a laborer, testified that his leg had been broken by a state trooper wielding a baseball bat.

The state prosecutor, Stephen Pace, Jr., admitted to the court that the main purpose of invoking the insurrection law which he admitted is unconstitutional—was to halt the demonstrations. He reaffirmed the correctness of his statement quoted by UPI that "the basic reason for bringing these charges was to deny the defendants, or to ask the court to deny them bond."

Pointing this out in his argument to the court, Morris Abram, CORE's attorney, said: "Defendant Pace has admitted that prior to the commencement of this action, he did not even intend to call plaintiff's case to trial. He has in fact indicated that if plaintiff would agree to leave the state of Georgia, he would consent to his admission to bail."

The SNCC members were defended by attorneys for the NAACP Legal Defense & Educational Fund.

The defense lawyers pointed out that the court decision marks the first time the federal judiciary has halted a state court civil rights proceeding at the request of private individuals—the imprisoned men. Filed on their behalf, the suit seeks to restrain state and county officials from conspiring to suppress the civil rights movement in Americus. The court gave these officials until January to prepare their defense against this charge.

Rev. Carter thereupon filed a $100,000 damage suit in federal court accusing both the registrar and the sheriff of violating his civil rights. This boosted local morale to the extent that attendance at our voter registration clinics, which had ranged from 5 to 10, increased to as many as 115 by the end of September.

Then, on October 17, 43 prospective registrants, including Rev. Carter, assembled at Masonic Hall and boarded a bus for the courthouse in St. Francisville. Upon arrival, I conferred with the district attorney and the registrar. However, the registrar claimed that 8 whites were ahead of us on the waiting list and we sat across the street from 8:35 a.m. until 2 p.m. before Rev. Carter was called.

As the morning passed, tension mounted. On several occasions, a group of whites tried to block the entranceway. I was shown a knife and was told I would be emasculated. Rev. Carter was likewise threatened. FBI agents and a Justice Department official were stationed around the courthouse. Of five Negroes attempting to register that day, four were rejected. Three of them had attended high school but the fourth had been unable to do so.

That night, two Negro families were threatened. Their landlord, Daniel Lee, accompanied by two other white men, warned that if the two family heads should again attempt to register, their homes would be burned to the ground and they would be killed or injured in the fires. Johnny Hamilton, the first to be threatened, complained to the Justice Department and then decided to leave town. James Payne, the second man threatened, was hit across the face with a rifle butt.

Nevertheless, we returned to the registrar's office next day, 30 strong. Again we were told that a group of whites was ahead of us and we would have to wait. Although on every occasion the registrar has made such a claim, we have never actually seen any of these prospective white registrants. Seven of our people actually gained admission to the office that day, of whom three were registered: Nathaniel Smith and Ernest Morgan—both farmers—and Handy Berry, an unemployed hod carrier. As Smith came out of the office, I pinned on him an "I Am A Registered Voter: Are You?" button.

That night five carloads of whites went to the home of our bus driver, John Brannon, and fired gunshot volleys around his home.

SUSPENSION OF 2 STUDENT CORE LEADERS PROMPTS CAMPUS PROTEST

The suspension of Patricia Stephens Due and Ruben Kenon from Florida A & M University in Tallahasee, Florida, has resulted in several student protest actions and one mass rally on campus.

The two students received the heaviest prison sentences—six months—as a consequence of Tallahasee CORE's mid-September mass demonstrations at the Florida Theater, in which 354 demonstrators were arrested. The cases are presently being appealed.

Following the suspensions, CORE has taken Patricia Due on its staff to lead a voter registration campaign in the Tallahassee area. She is a longtime leader of Tallahassee CORE and was a participant in the first jail-in of the 1960 lunch counter sit-in movement.

The following Monday we returned to the courthouse to find that the registrar had adopted a tactic of demanding extraordinary identification. He asked for identification from two registered voters in each applicant's ward, which was impossible since the four Negroes thus far registered had been from different wards. He agreed to accept a driver's license over a year old, but this proved an impediment since Louisiana's drivers licenses are renewed every two years. All nine of our prospective registrants were thus rejected because of insufficient identification, so a complaint was filed with the Justice Department.

Next day, we canvassed the parish and held a clinic with over 165 participants. On Wednesday, we returned to the registrar's office to check on the identification requirements. Two days later, possibly as a result of our complaint to the Justice Department, an official of the state registration office was supervising the local registrar and two of our five applicants succeeded in registering.

That brought our total of registered Negroes to 6. Since then, 10 more have been registered. This total is small, but extremely significant in a parish where no Negro has registered since 1902.

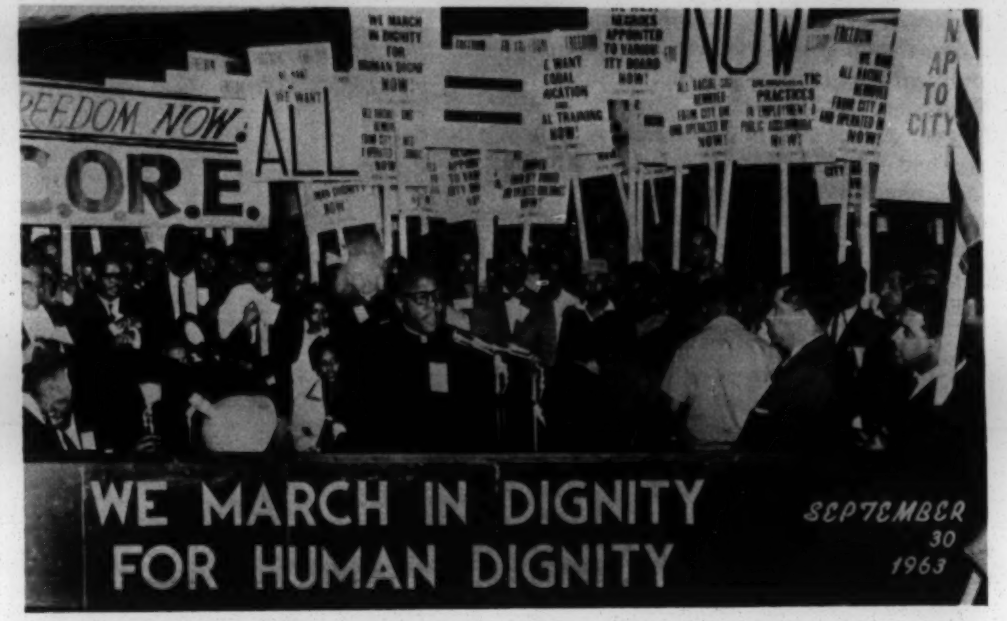
In Iberville parish, which was the initial target of the CORE voter registration drive, a full slate of 12 Negroes qualified for the 1963 Democratic primaries. Among the candidates are Spiver Gordon, a CORE Task Force worker, and Dr. Bertrand Tyson and W. W. Harleaux, both community leaders.

BIGGEST PROTEST MARCH IN SOUTH



The biggest civil rights march to be held in the south took place in New Orleans on September 30 under the sponsorship of the Citizen's Committee, a joint group whose chairman is Lolis Elie, CORE's chief southern counsel.

Over 15,000 Negroes and whites participated. The New Orleans CORE contingent carried a large banner saying "Freedom Now—CORE." CORE National Associate Director Richard Haley and New Orleans CORE Chairman Oretha Castle led the contigent. Over 300 white students were among the marchers.

Another banner in the march said: "We March in Dignity for Human Dignity Now." A banner proclaiming the march's chief objective said: "We Want Equal Employment and Equal Training Now." Another objective of the march was desegregation of those public accommodations which still refuse to serve Negroes and repeal of a local ordinance imposing segregation in public places selling alcoholic beverages.

Speakers included Oretha Castle of CORE, Ernest Morial of NAACP, Rev. Avery Alexander of the Consumers League, Rev. G. L. Hayden of St. James AME Church, A. Horowitz of the Hillel Foundation, Monsignor Clauche and Rev. A. L. Davis.

Follow-Through Action

Two of these speakers—Rev. Davis (at the microphones in above photo) and Rev. Alexander—were among 25 persons arrested a month later—on October 31—while sitting-in in the City Council chamber, the segregated City Hall cafeteria and the Mayor's waiting room.

Rev. Davis, who was ousted from the City Council chamber, had pledged to "stay here and sit for 30 days hence until we get some word" on demands for complete desegregation and equal job opportunities. Rev. Alexander was dragged by the heels by two policemen from the cafeteria.

Five days later eight more sit-inners, including CORE Field Secretary Isaac Reynolds, were arrested in the mayor's waiting room and in the cafeteria. Included in the group were five whites: a Tulane University professor and four Tulane students.

A Mass March in the North

Trenton, the capital of New Jersey, on October 26 was the scene of a Statewide March for Jobs and Freedom in which 12,000 persons from all parts of the state participated. Arriving in special buses and by train, they started marching at City Hall, proceeded to the State House and then to the War Memorial Building where a giant rally was held.

Participating in the March were a large number of unions and religious bodies in addition to the New Jersey chapters of CORE and the New Jersey Conference of NAACP. Directing the March was Robert Gore of CORE. Honorary chairman and director were A. Philip Randolph and Bayard Rustin, who led the August 28th March On Washington.

IN BRIEF

Los Angeles CORE has formed a Mexican-American Committee to concentrate on winning equal housing and employment opportunities for Mexicans. Asked about rumors that Negro gains are being made at the expense of Mexicans, Adolph Villavazo, chairman of the new committee, said: "This is nonsense. We can all achieve our rights together. Let's not fall prey again to that old theme of 'divide and conquer.' "

* * *

Chicago CORE groups played a leading part in the detailed organizational work which made the October 22 Freedom Day school boycott the biggest demonstration against de facto school segregation in the north. On that day, over 225,000 students, nearly half the total enrollment, stayed away from classes, while over 10,000 demonstrators marched on City Hall and the Board of Education. They demanded the resignation of School Superintendent Benjamin Willis, who has been unwilling to make any changes to bring about integration.

Harsh Jail Terms Prompt City Hall Protest

The imposing of prison sentences of up to a year on 19 leaders of St. Louis CORE's fair employment campaign at the Jefferson Bank & Trust Co. resulted in this protest demonstration inside City Hall on October 28. Over 1,000 persons had marched on City Hall.

That evening more than 250 Catholics, many of them priests and nuns, held a protest rally. John Dunsford, associate law professor at St. Louis University, said the rally was "a public confession that we have sinned in the pride of race."

The 19 were sentenced by State Circuit Judge Michael Scott for violating his August 30 injunction against "physical interference" at the Jefferson Bank & Trust Co. Among those sentenced were Charles Oldham, former national chairman of CORE and Alderman William Clay, a long-time leader of St. Louis CORE. Alderman Clay was sentenced to 270 days in jail. Fines ranged from $500 to $1000 against each of the defendants. The cases are being appealed. Trial of 40 demonstrators arrested on "disturbing the peace" charges has been adjourned until November 29. Nonviolent demonstrations have been conducted both inside and outside the bank. Inside, CORE members frequently lined-up at windows to simply seek change or to open new accounts which would be promptly closed.

The bank is still being picketed. Intercession by Mayor Raymond Tucker and a 2-week truce failed to prevail on management to adopt a fair hiring policy. Several other banks have hired 35 Negroes as a result of St. Louis CORE's campaign, but not Jefferson.

WASHINGTON:

Atlanta Group Harms Civil Rights Cause

By BRUCE BOISSAT

The flurry of Negro demonstrations outside restaurants in Atlanta affects the outlook of the contending forces now lining up for the climatic House floor fight on the Kennedy-Johnson civil rights proposals.

Many opponents and some supporters of these measures express vigorous dislike for legislating "under the gun" of recent or current demonstrations.

The Atlanta eruptions can, in fact, puzzle even the most ardent backers of the pending civil rights package.

Until they began in heavy earnest a short time ago, Atlanta was held up as a model of what responsibile white and Negro leadership could achieve in a nonviolent, demonstration - free atmosphere.

Suddenly this widely advertised image has developed gaping cracks. The question is why.

THE PREDOMINANT ANSWER, from some of the key Atlantans involved, is pretty astonishing.

If they can be believed, it is a story of white and Negro leaders arrayed together against a small, militant band of Negroes sparked by the so-called Student Non-Violent Co-ordinating Committee.

James Forman, executive secretary of this Atlanta-based group, says the demonstration drive reflects two things:

—Impatience with the foot-dragging of Atlanta restaurant owners who have failed to desegregate their establishments.

—Annoyance at the alleged disparity between Atlanta's bright image and the continuing evidences of discrimination in schools, jobs, housing, public accommodations.

A TOP WHITE CIVIC FIGURE, long identified with Atlanta's efforts at racial harmony, says flatly that SNCC, commonly called "Snick," "listens to nobody and represents nobody."

He describes the present campaign as a calculated attempt by a hard core of 200 to 300 Negroes —including some "professional demonstrators" from other cities —to "dust up the town."

This week's top level meeting involving Mayor Ivan Allen, white business leaders and the long-established Negro leadership apparently aims at isolating and ultimately "containing" the militant "Snick" forces.

THERE HAS BEEN NO NEGOTIATION between the demonstrators and either city officials or the wider white power structure. SNCC is still part of the Negroes' "summit group" set up last fall to frame urgent requests for new breakthroughs. But virtually all the many participating Negro organizations oppose the militants' course.

The joint white-Negro leadership plea to the "impatient ones" is:

"Why wreck the town that has been for you?"

Mayor Allen and other white leaders insist Atlanta is still moving down the path of racial progress. They are pressing hard against the "segregationist hold-outs" among restaurant owners.

Nearly every government, business and civic agency has outspokenly urged either voluntary desegregation of public accommodations—or a city ordinance to that end.

Thus far, the demonstrating "Snick" cadre is unyielding. Leaders talk of a possible one-day school boycott in mid-February.

The interest for the nation is whether lawmakers here take the demonstrators as the "new face" of Atlanta, or accept the older, shinier image of a city where moderation on both sides proves out.

SCIENCE and the GREAT BOOKS

One of the most critical problems facing our society is that discussed by British author C. P. Snow in his Two Cultures: the deterioration in communication between the two segments of the public whose education has been concentrated respectively in the liberal arts and in science. There is an almost complete breakdown in the link which should carry information about science to the non-scientific community. Information flows in the opposite direction with only slightly less difficulty.

The Great Books program represents one attempt to keep the communication channels open. The scientist who participates is almost certain to encounter many works in philosophy, history, poetry and drama not included in his technically oriented college curriculum. Conversely, and more importantly perhaps, the humanist encounters a sampling of significant works in science.

Approximately 10% of the selections can be classified as scientific works. Their authors include such giants as Aristotle, Galileo, Newton, Galen, Harvey, Darwin, Einstein and Freud. One could register the same complaint about them as is often voiced against the other selections, namely, the work of the twentieth century is almost ignored. It is difficult to justify the exclusion of some representative work from the most exciting era science has known -- the three or four years following 1925 -- particularly since the change which took place then in the philosophy of science, the change from determinism to uncertainty, is the sort of grist the Great Books mill loves to grind. In spite of this shortcoming, by providing at least a glimpse into the world of science the Great Books program serves as one of the few remaining links between the "two cultures".

man , science , and art

"Man is strangely egocentric. He has seen the world around him as a personal relationship. The thunder has hurled its lightning at him personally, the streams have flowed to bathe his dusty feet, the sun has shone to warm him, and the snow fallen to chill his weary bones. Science, as we know it, is a very recent thing in human history. To most humans in the world, even today, science has little meaning. Mankind has been in love with the world, and has found nature to have a special kind of human relationship.

It is from this attitude of being part of nature that art derives. Man, in particular uncivilized man, lives so close to nature that he rarely notices its fullness. He is prone to project his own personality into it, so that it reminds him of much more than what it actually is. Even the hunter felt some relationship between himself and the creatures which he needed for food. He created a ritual to appease their spirits, and to encourage them to reproduce themselves."

-- C. A. Burland in "Man and Art"

Man begins where Nature ends

Man and Nature can never be friends.

-- Thomas Hardy

"Man is at heart a romantic. He believes in thunder, the destruction of worlds, the voice out of the whirlwind. Perhaps the fact that he himself is now in the possession of powers wrenched from the atom's heart has enhanced the appeal of violence in natural events. The human generations are short-lived. We have difficulty in visualizing the age-long processes involved in the upheaval of mountain systems, the advance of continental glaciations or the creation of life."

So goes an olde Englyshe song written about 1225. In spite of the belief in some quarters that summer is a wild time it has proven in the past few years to be a good time for group discussion. Groups organized in the summer have been well attended, have met on a weekly schedule and have remained among the sturdiest groups in the Atlanta program.

A new first year Great Books group will meet on Monday, June 15th at 7:30 PM, under the leadership of Harold and Diana Walbek at the Ida Williams Library, 269 Buckhead Ave.

Rachel Neely Parker's 4th year group will not pause for breath but go on to the 5th year readings this June.

Modern plays will be the subject of a special six session discussion group to begin on June 23rd at the Ida Williams Library. Schnitzler, Yeats and Brecht are among the playwrights to be included. Joe Gross will lead. Registration will be limited. Call CE 7-4361 for details and to register.

Dear Sir:

New York CORE has just undertaken the publication of a new magazine devoted to the civil rights movement, with particular reference to the movement in the North. We believe that this is the first time a civil rights organization has sponsored a magazine that is not devoted exclusively or primarily to the work of that organization.

To be known as RIGHTS & REVIEWS, the magazine will feature articles, essays, poems, short stories, and reviews of books and plays. The target date for the first issue is July.

We should like to keep abreast of the work of your organization, and we request that you kindly place us on your news release mailing list.

Thank you very much for your cooperation.

Sincerely yours,

RHODE ISLAND DROPS COMMISSION ON MORALITY IN YOUTH

The Rhode Island Commission to Encourage Morality in Youth recently recommended its own abolition, bringing to an end a controversial career that had taken it all the way to the U.S. Supreme Court. By a 6 to 2 vote of its own members, the commission informed Governor Chafee that it no longer felt its continued use of state funds was justified in view of the unfavorable decision by the Supreme Court.

On February 18, 1963, the U. S. Supreme Court ruled that the Rhode Island Commission violated the First Amendment of the federal constitution by its practice of sending to dealers and distributors blacklists of books and magazines it found objectionable. According to Justice William O. Douglas, this practice constitutes "censorship in the raw."

The morality commission's decision to disband was also in accordance with a recommendation made by a R.I. Baby Hoover Commission report, which found that the commission "does not appear to perform any function that cannot be more effectively done by other groups in the Rhode Island community." In its 1962 report, the Baby Hoover Commission pointed out that most states enforce their morality laws through the attorney general's offices, and it recommended that the morality commission be transferred to this department as an advisory group. Governor Chaffee had made this same proposal last year and again this year.

The Baby Hoover report stated that the courts can provide the best remedy against obscenity, since they can "engage in detached decision making in this sensitive area," and "the only effective remedy in this area is possessed by the courts -- stiff fines and prison sentences which will deter dealers from risking the handling of materials which are in violation of Rhode Island laws." It further pointed out that it is "not necessary or even judiciously advisable for the state to utilize its facilities in this area," since community organizations, churches and conscientious parents should provide direction for Rhode Island's youth.

Initial court action against the morality commission had been brought by four New York publishers. The U.S. Supreme Court decision upheld a ruling by Superior Court Judge William M. Mackenzie, who found the commission's activities to be unconstitutional in 1961. The federal court opinion reversed the Rhode Island Supreme Court decision which had overruled Judge Mackenzie. Last May, Judge Mackenzie issued a permanent injunction to bar the commission from sending blacklists to distributors and sellers.

The only other state that has a morality commission with a paid staff is Georgia.

ATTACK LOCAL LAWS AIMED AT BARRING MATERIAL FROM COMMUNIST COUNTRIES

A move to fight totalitarianism by resorting to totalitarian tactics is taking hold in a number of grass-roots American communities, and it has the U.S. State and Justice Departments in Washington worried. The men in the capital are troubled by laws inhibiting the local sale of goods produced or processed in Iron Curtain countries. The State Department charges that these laws are hamstringing American foreign policy. Department of Justice experts believe such statutes are unconstitutional. Civil liberties advocates charge these laws restrict a merchant's right to trade, prevent a freer East-West flow of information and ideas, and create several important procedural difficulties.

The movement to block the sale of "Communist" goods in this country is believed to have begun in Florida, and is reported to have spread to more than a score of communities, especially in the South. The laws generally require store-owners wishing to deal in goods imported from Communist bloc countries to buy a license and display a sign, advertising that the store carries "Communist goods." The stigma attached to such a sign, and the prohibitively high license fee -- $5,000 in Birmingham, Alabama, for example -- force many merchants to abandon sales of Communist-made goods -- which is exactly the intended result of these laws.

Constitutionality of the laws is still very much in doubt, as they are new and in most cases have not been tested. Three rulings on the Columbus, Ohio, law by different judges in the city's Municipal Court have split, 2-to-1, against the constitutionality of the ordinance. Officials in Washington are hoping the cases will be appealed to higher courts, so that a more definitive ruling can be obtained.

The first of the Columbus decisions acquitted Alkassam Hasan Miqdadi, arrested last May 29 for selling books from Russia, China and Cuba without the required required $100 permit. With the backing of the Columbus Chapter of the Ohio Civil Liberties Union, Ohio State Law Professor Paul L. Selby, Jr. defended Mr. Miqdadi. Professor Selby charged the Columbus ordinance violates Article I, Section 8, Paragraph 3 of the Constitution, which provides that Congress shall have power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations..." The Supreme Court has interpreted this Congressional power to be "exclusive and plenary." A legal memorandum on the subject contends that at any rate, Congress has by its own actions occupied the field of foreign trade legislation to the exclusion of local ordinances. Prof. Selby agrees that the President alone has the right to make foreign policy, without interference from other sources. "If the Columbus City Council finds that the foreign policy of the United States is not conducted to its satisfaction, the remedies lie within the nation's political structure, and not in the construction of a competing foreign policy to govern the city's foreign trade," he told the Wall St. Journal.

Prof. Selby's constitutional arguments referred not only to rights exclusive to federal authorities but to rights sacred to the individual. He charged the Columbus licensing law violates the "due process" clause of the Fourteenth Amendment by abridging the merchant's freedom of speech and of the press. The $100 license fee charged stores selling Communist-published literature is a discriminatory tax, the memorandum said. With respect to the requirement that the origin of the Communist material be posted, Prof. Selby quoted the U.S. Supreme Court to the effect that "inviolability of privacy in a group association may in many circumstances be indispensable to preservation of freedom of association, particularly where a group espouses dissident beliefs..." Furthermore, the memorandum argued that the requirements were instituted "with the purpose and effect of suppressing distribution of such books and magazines," in violation of due process.

The nuisance value of these hastily-contrived ordinances would be hard to overestimate. At the urging of top Administration officials, Congress has just restricted to most-favored-nation trading status Poland and Yugoslavia, which the State Department is trying to ween away from economic dependence on Mother Russia. But "the ordinances against 'Communist goods,' if they spread widely throughout the country, could undermine the national policy," in the opinion of Pulitzer-Prize-winning New York Times Correspondent Anthony Lewis.

On the local level, these laws interfere with the procuring of Communist literature for serious university study. But Alkassam Hasan Miqdadi, who catered to students of Oriental and Slavic languages at Ohio State University, denied being a Communist or sympathizer himself. "When I was in jail," he said, "I pinched myself to see if this was actually happening to me in America. This happens in Russia, but I did not realize it happened here."

FLORIDA CLU PROTESTS JACKSONVILLE BAN ON RACIAL DEMONSTRATIONS

The Florida Civil Liberties Union has blamed recent racial rioting in Jacksonville on the failure of Mayor Haydon Burns and the city administration "to show any positive leadership in solving the problems of race relations..." and strongly protested the Mayor's effort to meet the situation by the prohibition of demonstrations.

A telegram to the Mayor from the Florida affiliate characterized his ban on peaceful demonstrations as "an affront to the First and Fourteenth Amendments", and stated that it was not within his powers as Jacksonville's mayor to abridge the rights of peaceful assembly and free speech. The FCLU declared its intention to defend the rights of all citizens of Jacksonville to express themselves against racial injustice in the community.

The telegram also called upon Mayor Burns as an announced candidate for Governor of the State to make an immediate statement to the press clearly avowing his belief in constitutional guarantees for all citizens.

The Florida affiliate also took a strong stand recently against an order by State Attorney Richard Gerstein banning the report of the Florida Legislative Investigation Committee on homosexuality. The Johns Committee report was issued as an official state pamphlet entitled "Homosexuality in Florida", and was designed, according to the FCLU, to win favor for the Committee's proposals for homosexual control and registration laws. But the FCLU contends that the pamphlet is not obscene, as claimed by State Attorney Gerstein.

In a release to the press, the FCLU declared that determination of obscenity was a matter for the courts and not for the peace officers of a community. Its stand against banning the Johns Committee pamphlet, it said, was not a stand in favor of the Committee, "whose illegal actions and policies it has long opposed... It opposes the continuing existence of the Committee and would regard its elimination as a progressive move on the part of the legislators. However, two wrongs do not make one right, and the suppression of even the Johns Committee Report is a blow to the First Amendment guarantees of freedom of speech and the press."

NEW YORK STATE COURT OF APPEALS REVERSAL ALLOWS COMMUNIST TO SPEAK ON CAMPUS

"We believe that the tradition of our great society has been to allow our universities in the name of academic freedom to explore and expose their students to controversial issues without government interference." Thus New York State's highest court reversed a lower court decision denying an admitted Communist, Herbert Aptheker, from speaking at state-supported Buffalo University. ACLU had entered an amicus brief favoring Aptheker's right to appear on the grounds of violation of academic freedom and extension of state law beyond legislative intent.

"It is conceded," read the decision written by Justice Walter B. Reynolds, "that there is no legislation directly covering the instant situation. Yet, :'statutes, directed against known and stated evils, are not to be stretched to cover situations having no real or reasonable relation to those evils...'"(Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Durkin). Further, said the court quoting Sweezy v. New Hampshire, "'Teachers and students must always remain free to inquire, to study and to evaluate, to gain new maturity and understanding; otherwise our civilization will stagnate and die.'" Neither does membership in the Communist party automatically entail illegal advocacy (Scales v. United States), "even though the legislature has seen fit in certain instances to make such membership prima facie evidence thereof. Here there is no contention that Dr. Aptheker advocates...or will advocate at the lecture in question the forcible overthrow of our Government as any more than an abstract doctrine. The courts without express legislative action cannot find such abstract advocacy to be against the law of this State."

The statements of the court echoed the arguments of the ACLU amicus brief which stated, "If the legislature has not acted, a state court cannot supply the omission...Public policy is evidenced by the will of the legislature contained in statutory enactments." And "advocating forcible overthrow of our government as an abstract doctrine may not be prohibited."

CIVIL LIBERTIES BRIEFS

The ACLU OF GEORGIA HAS expressed concern to top state officials that proposed new voter registration laws would leave "great discretionary powers" to the county registrar, including the right to decide who can read and write "legibly"... A COURT HAS UPHELD a Long Island man's claim the "World's Fair" inscription on New York license plates is illegal, because it discriminates against businesses not represented at the Fair, and violates the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution. ... THE STATE DEPARTMENT changed its position and granted visas to seven representatives of the Soviet Peace Committee for a visit and speaking tour in the U.S. under the auspices of the Committee for Non-Violent Action. The Rev. A.J. Muste, national chairman of the CNA, had strongly protested the earlier refusal of visas to the Russian group, which includes a surgeon, editor, a trade unionist, and writers...APPLICATION BY THE National Association for the Advance ment of Colored People for a permit to solicit funds in Portland, Oregon was vigorously supported by the ACLU affiliate in that state, which stated that the right to solicit funds for political activity is intimately connected with the rights of free speech and assembly, and should not be restrained by city ordinances, except to protect the public against fraudulent solicitation...ON DECEMBER 15, 1963, THE 172ND BIRTHDAY of the Bill of Rights -- the anniversary of the ratification of the first ten amendments to the Constitution -- the Toledo, Ohio Blade published as its lead editorial an American Bill of Wrongs, consisting of 10 articles which would subvert the Bill of Rights' purpose of protecting individual liberties. The Blade's purpose was to drive home the danger of tampering with the provisions of the Bill of Rights.

NEWS RELEASE FOR RELEASE: ALL PAPERS
THURSDAY, JUNE 11, 1964

Southern Regional Council, Inc.
5 Forsyth Street, N. W.
Atlanta 3, Georgia
Phone: JA-2-8764

"Racial conflict," says Mayor Stan R. Brookshire of Charlotte (N. C.),"can be converted to an opportunity of raising the level of citizenship and building better communities."

Charlotte (N. C.) is one of two southern cities reported on today by the Southern Regional Council, in the first of a series of reports descriptive of southern cities that in recent months have confronted realistically their racial problems and have taken constructive action to resolve them.

The other report released today deals with Louisville (Ky.). Subsequent reports in the series will cover Memphis (Tenn.), Brunswick (Ga.), and one other Deep South city.

The Louisville and Charlotte studies were by Benjamin Muse and Pat Watters, respectively, both of whom are senior staff members of the Southern Regional Council.

In Louisville, Muse observes, "race prejudice may be said to be contained. It is viewed by the community leadership as an evil to be combatted, and it is being combatted steadily and with increasing effectiveness .... Discrimination on account of race is frowned upon in principle -- though still far from being eliminated in practice."

Both Charlotte and Louisville have official, biracial committees which have guided integration progress. The two reports describe the organization and functioning of these in detail. Louisville's Human Relations Commission is one of the very few such southern bodies created by ordinance. Charlotte's Committee on Community Relations was established by executive action.

In both cities, two forces have been chiefly responsible for progress. These have been firm Negro pressure and intelligent, strong business leadership -- the so-called "power structure." Race relations is not, said a leading Charlotte businessman, "a church problem. It has to be solved downtown."

In Louisville, Muse depicts how the community leadership has been expressed increasingly through municipal ordinances and offices. In Charlotte, the same business leadership which has carried through almost complete desegregation of public accommodations and which has cooperated with Negro leaders to make notable gains in employment, has, according to Watters, taken little interest in combatting problems of tokenism in schools and hospitals.

In releasing these two studies, John H. Wheeler of Durham, North Carolina, president of the Southern Regional Council, said:

> These studies of Louisville and Charlotte show how some southern cities have been able to make changes of historic importance, with a minimum of strife. They show also that we have only begun to uncover larger problems which have resulted from racial segregation in the southern states. Most of the progress made in recent years throughout the South may be attributed to the following factors: effective Negro leadership; free, enlightened public discussion; responsible action by the business community; and a political climate which does not frustrate or prevent local initiative. These same factors will be needed in our effort to meet even larger problems which lie ahead.

The Southern Regional Council is an organization of white and Negro Southerners formed in 1944 to advance "equal opportunity for all of the South's people."

ACLU SCORES INACCURATE MILITARY CHAPLAINS ATTACK ON UNION'S CHAPLAINCY POSITION

The American Civil Liberties Union said on June 15 that a resolution adopted by the Military Chaplains Association attacking the ACLU's stand on chaplains in the Armed Forces "wholly misrepresents the facts" and distorts the Union's actual position.

The military chaplains group, at its recent convention, pledged to place all of its resources into a campaign to oppose any effort to curb the military chaplaincy. A key section of its resolution declared that "...it is reported that a chapter of the Civil Liberties Union in Los Angeles and the chapter of Camden,N.J. have joined with the hostile critics to challenge the Secretary of Defense that chaplains are in violation of the Constitution of the United States."

In a letter to Major General (Msgr.) Patrick J. Ryan, president of the UMC, the ACLU's executive director, John de J. Pemberton Jr., said that "we are at a loss to understand this statement for it wholly misrepresents the facts of our affiliates' actions and the interest of the ACLU on this issue."

The ACLU letter declared that the chairman of the South Jersey chapter of the ACLU of New Jersey wrote to the Secretary of Defense protesting the use of chaplains for religious classes of military dependents held in public school buildings. "...No legal action was taken or is contemplated, although much mail to Conress on this subject has erroneously stated that litigation was begun," the ACLU said. The ACLU also pointed out that "at no time did the ACLU of Southern California bring or consider a suit involving the chaplaincy. What your resolutions committee may have had in mind was a suit filed by our Southern California affiliate on behalf of a high school teacher who refused, as a matter of personal conscience, to lead the salute to the flag which included a reference to this nation, 'under God,' The purpose of the suit was not to eliminate this phrase from the flag salute, but to prevent the dismissal of the school teacher. The suit was settled last October when the Los Angeles Board of Education agreed that the teacher was not required to lead his class in a daily recitation of the pledge of allegiance because of his conscientious scruples against doing so. The suit itself was based on the freedom of religion clause of the First Amendment as affecting that school teacher rather than the establishment clause. In spite of the fact the suit ended over eight months ago, it is still being described in letters to Congressmen as a pending action and the purpose of the suit has been grossly distorted."

The civil liberties organization said that its dismay at the widely reported inaccurate resolution of the UMC was compounded "by the fact that the ACLU has never attacked the concept of the chaplaincy program." It said that it agreed wholeheartedly with the distinction made by the U.S. Supreme Court last year in voiding public school religious practices, but not condemning military chaplaincy issues.

Acknowledging that the interest stimulated by its South Jersey chapter has prompted a thorough study of the military chaplaincy programs by the national Church-State Committee, the ACLU letter noted that its committee has come to the opinion that: 1) any discrimination against non-majority religions in the program, and 2) any compulsory services held by the Armed Forces would violate both the establishment and free exercise clauses of the First Amendment. "Neither this position nor the overall record of ACLU's activities merit the characterization attributed to a statement by Rear Admiral (Msgr.) Robert J. White of 'a total conspiracy to destroy the influence of religion in American life.'"

ACLU AFFILIATES ACTIVE IN SCHOOL INTEGRATION FIGHT

American Civil Liberties affiliates have been taking an active part in the fight for school integration.

The New York CLU and the Niagara Frontier Branch of the ACLU recently issued statements calling for equal educational opportunities for children of all races. The Massachusetts CLU gave its support to a Boston school stay-out; and the Cleveland CLU asked for a prompt investigation of what it said appeared to be police discrimination against demonstrating integrationists.

The NYCLU statement, in the form of a resolution, declared that school boards "should adopt policies to counteract segregation and to further integration, including for example, the reformation or abandonment of existing zoning arrangements, site selection, the "Princeton Plan," permissive transfer, and other appropriate techniques..." to the end of wiping out educational inequalities. It said, however, that such measures were not sufficient to offset "existing educational and cultural deficiencies" in slum areas, and recommended that steps be taken to eradicate these deficiencies by allocating greater resources and money to schools in disadvantaged areas.

The NYCLU newsletter of January 1964 carried, as well as the resolution, articles by Nanette Dembitz, NYCLU counsel, and George Backer, member of the NYCLU board, suggesting two different approaches to the school integration problem. Miss Dembitz refers to the Supreme Court's statement, in its 1954 decision against segregated schools, that Negro children received an inferior education because of being sent to all-Negro schools. Pointing out that the Negro child's inferior education resulted not necessarily from tangibles like inferior schools or teachers, but from the fact of being deprived of contact with white children and of preparation for life in a white-dominated society, she stated that boards of education "have an affirmative duty, by the Constitution, to give Negro children living in Negro neighborhoods an opportunity to attend schools with white children." To attain this end, she suggests that zoning for integration does not deprive white children, and that if the neighborhood school policy is abandoned, it is done for the benefit of both races.

Backer, on the other hand, objects to the attempt "to bring equality by bus", that is, to rely on transporting children to schools out of their neighborhoods in order to overcome de facto segregation. The "real danger", he says, is to overlook "the overriding necessity of removing the degrading effects of uneducated poverty." For the Negro, Backer believes, "equal inadequate public education will leave him in the disadvantaged position he now occupies." He suggests special efforts and funds are needed to help Negro and Puerto Rican students.

The statement of the Niagara Frontier Branch declared that the Board of Education of Buffalo had "constitutional obligations" to achieve racial integration in the public schools, and endorsed the program recommended by the newly-formed Coordinating Council of Community and Civil Rights Groups.

In the case of the Boston school stay-out, the Massachusetts CLU, in giving its support, countered the opinion of the Attorney General that it constituted a disrespect for law. The affiliate contended that truancy was not involved, as the stay-out was a "legitimate protest against a serious social evil," and against the refusal of the authorities to deal with it, and that such protest was "squarely within the tradition protected by the Bill of Rights." The MCLU also stated its intention of defending anyone involved in the stay-out who might be accused of violating the school attendance laws.

In Cleveland, the CLU protest followed incidents which arose when integrationists picketed Memorial, Brett, and Murray Hill Schools, and staged a sit-in demonstration at the Board of Education. The CCLU claimed that the police failed to protect the "peaceful" picketers at the schools from the violence of opposing mobs. In the case of the sit-in, the CCLU said that the police, while arresting and removing the demonstrators, allegedly committed unnecessary violence, "seemingly taking punishment into their own hands."

NEWS PHOTOGRAPHERS WIN, LOSE RIGHT TO TAKE PICTURES

News photographers, who are quite likely to be unappreciated by their subjects, have been the subject of three recent rulings which will affect the performance of their jobs.

Photographers covering military air crashes and other catastrophes concerning the armed forces have often found themselves hampered by zealous officers seeking to prevent them from taking pictures of the wreckage. Disavowing the theory that all things military are necessarily secret, the Department of Defense has issued a directive stating that outside of military installations "Military authorities will not prohibit or prevent the taking of photographs...of military personnel, equipment or material if no classified defense information or material is exposed to view."

The directive, praised by Rep. John E. Moss of California as enforcing "a principal basic to a democratic society," provides for several expedients if there is actually classified material exposed. In the harshest of these if the photographer insists on taking pictures, the military man is given the right to "physically restrain" the photographer until the FBI comes on the scene.

In a more complete victory for the photographers, the judicial section of the State Bar of Texas has rejected the American Bar Association's Canon 35 which prohibits photographers and broadcasting from any courtroom in session. The judicial section, which includes all of the state judges, adopted a rule whereby photo coverage and radio or television broadcasting of court room activities are permitted at the discretion of the trial judge. The American Civil Liberties Union backs Canon 35 as a guarantee of fair trial.

A decision against the photographers was made in the Appellate Division of the New York Supreme Court which ruled that pictures could no longer be taken in any part of the courthouses in Manhattan or the Bronx. The ruling was amended to allow pictures to be posed in the courthouse press room, but Editor and Publisher has protested that: "For practical purposes this is no relaxation or concession, and the rule continues to be objectionable. Only a few publicity hounds would go willingly into the press room to be photographed."

MINNESOTA ACLU WINS "RIGHT OF ENTRY" FIGHT

The Minnesota branch of the American Civil Liberties Union has succeeded after a fight of nearly three years in eliminating a "right of entry" provision in a Minneapolis zoning ordinance. The ordinance was passed in September, without the provision, by the Minneapolis City Council.

The zoning ordinance as proposed in December 1960 contained a provision allowing for right of entry to zoning inspectors, without prior permission, to a premise despite any objection that a householder might have.

In a letter to the president of the City Council at that time, the Minnesota ACLU protested this provision, suggesting that it be amended by adding the following sentence: "In cases where right of entry is refused, the zoning administrator or his representative shall not enter until he has obtained a warrant therefor from an appropriate court."

The ACLU branch maintained: "We believe the proposed ordinance fails to protect the right of privacy of the citizens of Minneapolis. A suspected criminal has a right to insist that a judge decide whether there is sufficient reason for a policeman to enter his home; a peaceful, law-abiding householder should have the same right available to him when he thinks an official intrusion is unreasonable. If a zoning inspector is required to request permission to enter, instead of just walking in, occasionally a householder may put him to the inconvenience of obtaining a warrant. This is not too great a price to pay for maintaining an important civil liberty."

Jack Davies, then executive secretary and counsel for the ACLU branch, reported that an ordinance, generally the same as the 1960 ordinance, but without the "right of entry" provision, was recently passed by the City Council. But Mr. Davies said: "Other building regulation ordinances in Minneapolis do, however, contain a right of entry provision."

CIVIL LIBERTIES BRIEFS

"YOUR BELIEF IS YOUR right," Circuit Judge Maupin Cummings told 16 perspective Washington County, Arkansas grand jurors, "but I don't want you as a jury member if you do not believe in God...." THE MINNESOTA CIVIL Liberties Union pronounced itself against the use of public schools to disseminate any religious or anti-religious material, except for academic study, and commended the town of Red Wing, for its policy prohibiting prayers, Bible-reading and religious observances in the public schools....ACLU's GREATER PHILADELPHIA Branch welcomed a decision to discontinue holding public school classes in two churches as supporting the separation of church and state and preventing the perpetuation of de facto segregation. ... THE ACLU, NAACP and American Jewish Congress have filed suit charging the Los Angeles and Southwest Realty Boards with conspiracy to restrict the membership of Negro realtors and their participation in Southwest's exclusive multiple-listing system.

A NEW HISTORY OF THE EARLY A. F. OF L.

A history of the American Federation of Labor during the first decade of this century, based largely on source materials no longer available, will be published by International Publishers next month. "The Policies and Practices of the American Federation of Labor, 1900-1909," by Philip S. Foner is VOLUME III in his full length HISTORY OF THE LABOR MOVEMENT IN THE UNITED STATES.

Dr. Foner had full access to the vast collection of incoming correspondence, leaflets, and pamphlets stored in the basement of the old A.F.of L. building in Washington. Most of this rich material was destroyed before the A. F. of L. moved to a new headquarters.

The period covered in the new work is particularly important because it was then, under the leadership of Samuel Gompers, that the policies were established that remained characteristic of the trade unions as late as the 1930's, when the Congress of Industrial Organizations was formed. In those years also the opposition to the dominant policies arose around issues like industrial versus craft unionism, trade union democracy, organization the Negro, women and foreign-born workers, and independent political action.

Considerable attention is given to the role of the Socialists and to the militants, as exemplified in the Western Federation of Miners and the American Labor Union, precursor of the International Workers of the World.

Dr. Foner's fresh examination of original sources challenges the interpretation of the early labor history of Commons and his associates.

RACE RELATIONS WORKERS MEET IN NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE

Nearly 150 persons concerned with American race relations from more than 30 states and 3 foreign countries are preparing to meet in Nashville from June 29 to July 11 for the 21st Annual Race Relations Institute, to be held at Fisk University. They represent both public and private agencies, ranging from state and local human relations commissions to church groups and other voluntary organizations working for interracial harmony.

In addition to those participants working directly in race relations or human rights organizations, a wide variety of occupations will be represented, including teachers, lawyers, social workers, ministers and foreign missionaries, students, and many others. A special delegation of 25 women from throughout the country is being sent by the United Church Women of the National Council of Churches.

The Institute, sponsored by the United Church of Christ, is the nation's oldest forum for the discussion of racial problems. Throughout its more than 20 years of existence it has provided training for local leaders in intergroup relations to make them better prepared to meet the problems of America's continuing racial crisis in their own communities.

Dr. Herman H. Long, Institute director, has disclosed that the keynote selected for the 1964 meeting is "Race--The New Challenge," in order to stress the necessity that all Americans face today to make new decisions of matters of race which will affect every aspect of their lives.

Dr. Long, now president of Talladega College in Alabama, has served for many years as race relations secretary of the American Missionary Association Division of the United Church of Christ's Board for Homeland Ministries. This division and the Council for Christian Social Action of the same church are the sponsoring agencies for the Institute, assisted by the Department of Racial and Cultural Relations of the National Council of Churches and Fisk University.

The participants will hear speakers from several civil rights organizations, government agencies--both state and federal, religious groups, organized labor, and several university campuses.

These will include the N.A.A.C.P. Legal Defense and Education Fund, the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, the National Voter Registration Project, the Southern Regional Council, the National Conference on Religion and Race and the National Council of Churches.

Governmental agencies to be represented are the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, the Federal Housing Administration and the Kentucky State Commission on Human Rights. The Department of Civil Rights of the AFL-CIO is to be represented as well.

Coming from Harvard, Chicago, Vanderbilt and Fisk Universities will be speakers who will discuss legal, economic, psychological, sociological and anthropological aspects of race relations in the U.S. today.

Other topics will include changing public attitudes on race, desegregation in southern communities, congressional action on civil rights and an analysis of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Negro electorate, school desegregation, and the role of the churches in promoting equality of rights and opportunities. Problems of America's other minority groups will also be discussed.

All of the speeches will form the basis for seminar discussions among the participants, with questions directed to the speakers. In addition there will be clinics concentrating on employment problems of minority groups, community action, and religion and race. Recent films dealing with aspects of intergroup relations will also be shown.

By means of all these techniques, the Institute will realize its purpose, as stated by Dr. Long, "to assess the status of current developments, provide authoritative information on the psychological, sociological, political, economic and religious aspects of intergroup problems, and to evaluate techniques and strategies for dealing with them."

MIGRANT STUDY: SOCIAL RESEARCH II, MAY - JUNE, 1964

On April 22, 1964, the classes of Dr. Joseph Golden (A. U. School of Social Work) and Dr. Eric Lincoln (Clark College), met with Mr. Pat Watters of Southern Regional Council (SRC), to discuss preparations for a study of migrants from rural areas to Atlanta.

The aims of the study had been stated in a letter from Pat Watters. SRC was interested in the situation of such people, simply as a general problem of the South. They wondered just "what goes" with poor people who moved to the city from the farm. Refinement of the general purpose is to be thejob of the combined student team. The following are to be considered in our research:

Hypotheses

1. That the experiences of poor Negro rural migrants to Atlanta are similar to the experiences of poor white rural migrants to Atlanta.
2. That the background of the two groups is similar.
3. That the characteristics of the two groups are similar.
4. That what has happened to the two groups in Atlanta has been similar.

The sample is to include only poor rural farm migrants, and not persons with non-farm rural backgrounds. At this point, the concept "poor" has not been defined. It was agreed that the best way of finding people in the categories we want will be to knock on doors in areas where large numbers of migrants live. If the areas are large enough, area sampling techniques will be used to find respondents. Maps of such areas will aid in our finding of desired migrants.

A schedule will have to be devised to include sections on (1) background, (2) what caused respondents to move, (3) description of who the respondents are, (4) what has happened to them in Atlanta.

The following material comes from class and committee notes.

April 22

The combined student group met with the instructors and Pat Watters of SRC. Dr. Golden stated that this project will not quite offer experience in every phase of the research process in that the problem for research is being chosen for us. In addition, the process of problem identification and formulation must be greatly foreshortened. We should attempt to review the literature on this subject as much as possible in the time available. In response to a question about migrants from a rural area, it was answered that it applie to persons recently moved to Atlanta from a rural area anywhere in the USA. The question was raised whether certain neighborhoods and the sample we select would be representative of the migrant population as a whole. We would have to work out a technique for random selection of a sample of migrants.

On the question of focusing on race as an element that adds further problems to urban adjustment, it was pointed out that economic problems cut across racial lines. The Populist Movement was cited as an example of the alliance of poor Negroes and whites. A student asked if the subject was not too diffuse, too broad. It was agreed that we need closer focus. The difficulty of analysis without tabulating machines is tremendous. We must reduce the number of questions. However, Watters is primarily interested in doing a human relations report; therefore, he can go further with certain families and ask whatever he wants to ask.

WATTERS: Can we afford not to focus on how these people really see themselves in this society? We want to know how these people feel, about money, about life in the city. What other attitudes have influenced them since moving here? By focusing on race as a problem, are we not presupposing what our answer will be? Do we make it more likely that race will emerge as the problem if we form our questions in such a way that we are looking for that? We are interested in finding out about these people as people, yet getting enough about them as a type so that two or three representative families can be chosen and a story gotten on them.

Movement from one culture to another creates problems for them and for society, a compelling human story; the move is a tremendous distance in time. How does it thwart and cripple them? How does it make them grow? Deprivation is discrimination. It is similar to Oscar Lewis' Five Families as nearly as he could describe what he is seeking. Focus: Improving living conditions of people who live in the South. We must befriend them and gain their trust.

GOLDEN: According to the 1960 census material which we will use, a "migrant" is one who was not living in the Atlanta metropolitan area in 1955. In this project, we will be interested in persons who have been here a year or so. So far as locating neighborhoods, we will have to assume that things are pretty much the same now as in 1960, that those tracts showing a high percent of recent migrants will still be where most migrants are located.

May 1

Friday's class had the task of working out a way of finding the poor migrants from rural areas. Dr. Golden brought the manual, U. S. Census of Population and Housing, 1960 - Census Tracts in Atlanta, Ga.

We set up three committees to work on the problem. One will select which census tracts we are going to work in using the manual, a map by census tracts, and a sheet given to them by Dr. Golden. This committee also had to work out an operational definition of the concept "poor".

May 3

1. A committee reported on a technique of area sampling in which certain blocks will be selected and certain households within that block. Select alternate blocks within the tract and get all houses with numbers ending in 3 and 6. If there are apartment houses, choose apartments ending in 3 and 6. For those apartments using letters instead of numbers, use A for 1, B for 2,etc.

Use the same procedure in a rooming house, by numbering the doors beginning with one.

2. Who in the house should be interviewed.

Father or mother; if they are not available, then any relative, then anyone over 18 years of age who moved there as a part of the family group.

3. How to separate the migrants from rural areas and those from urban areas. We did not really solve this, but we defined rural areas from the book Society, by Eli Chinoy, 1961. Rural area - any settlement with a population of 2500 or less.

4. What time should interviews be held?

Up until 8 p. m.

May 8

Exploring teams will go out and find out where Negroes are located. We will take the F-10 census tract for white respondents, and F-72 census tract for Negro respondents. The exploring teams will go to F-72, locate Negroes, type of housing, etc., to get an idea of where the migrants are.

May 9

The following is a report from the exploring team. The tract was bounded by Oxford Ave., Browns Mill, Poole Creek, South River, and Moreland Ave. Two Negro neighborhoods or sections were old with a few older deteriorated homes, the remainder being new or relatively new. The other section was composed of new homes. In both sections it was found that family dwellings, rented homes, and apartment buildings were predominant. It became apparent that we could not rely on the publication Census Tracts to provide us with a guide for selecting areas with large numbers of migrants, since there have been tremendous changes since 1960.

May 14

On the above date the committee for the assignment of various blocks for each team met. The blocks were selected from census tracts 55A and 26. Thirty-six assignments were selected, each consisting roughly of three blocks. Thirteen were taken from 55A, and thirteen from 26, in case no migrants were found in census tract 55A.

May 15

The groups have met and decided on the tracts we will use for interviewing Negroes and whites.

There were volunteers for a committee to work out a method for analyzing the results of the study. Volunteers from the Monday group will be added.

May 16

The committee for completing the schedule met. The schedule was completed, and the general instructions for filling out the schedule were decided upon. Most of the changes consisted of making unstructured questions structured, taking out those words or questions which might influence the respondents' answer, and those irrelevant to the stated purpose of the study.

May 20

The analysis committee met to devise a method for analyzing data. It was decided that we will have two tabulation sheees to compare Negro and white respondents.

For the unstructured questions we attempted to anticipate responses; those we could not anticipate would be considered after the data are collected. The structured questions will be tabulated according to percentage.

Interviews were carried out in the last week of May. As Dr. Lincoln's class had completed the semester, they were not available for interviewing. A total of 31 respondents were interviewed - 21 Negro and 10 white. After committees had tabulated data from the schedules, there was no time remaining for analysis of the tabulated data.

In evaluating the following tables, it should be kept in mind that the 31 respondentents interviewed do not constitute a random or representative sample of the "poor", rural migrants in Atlanta. The data set forth in these tables can be only suggestive for a study using a well-selected sample. Since existing source materials were not useful in sample selection, it is suggested that a more useful source might be found in registrations for utility service.

ACLU URGES FEDERAL GOV'T TO PROTECT SUMMER CIVIL RIGHTS DEMONSTRATORS

The American Civil Liberties Union on June 22 strongly urged the Justice Department to make the federal government increasingly "visible" in several Southern states during this summer of planned civil rights demonstrations and protests. The civil liberties organization recommended that "serious thought be given to the use of federal marshalls to protect those persons who seek to exercise their rights of free speech, press and assembly." The ACLU plea was sent before the disappearance of three civil rights workers in Mississippi.

In a letter to Attorney-General Robert F. Kennedy, the ACLU's executive director, John de J. Pemberton Jr., termed the federal government's physical presence "crucially called for", particularly in Mississippi, large sections of Alabama and Louisiana, southern Georgia and northern Florida and some parts of South Carolina. Pemberton's letter pointed out that in many areas of these states, official refusal to guarantee constitutional liberties to Negro citizens and others who protest racial discrimination is "entrenched in the institutions of government at all levels."

Calling for increased enforcement of federal statutes which would enable persons deprived of their civil rights by hostile police or other public officials to prosecute such officials, the ACLU head wrote that "the gravest problems of the federal constitutional system" can be expected to arise this summer in the south where peaceful, lawful organized demonstrations are planned.

The ACLU letter suggested that the Justice Department, in making its plans to cope with these problems, utilize all means available -- ranging from criminal and civil law suits to the use of marshals -- to see that the demands of the Constitution are enforced.

Increasing concern has been shown by the ACLU and various other civil liberties organizations, as well as by individual lawyers and constitutional law teachers, about test situations that might arise when participants in the civil rights movement make further direct challenges to traditional community patterns of segregation. One outgrowth of this concern has been the formation, with ACLU support, of the Lawyers Constitutional Defense Committee, which has recruited 150 practicing lawyers and 100 law students from schools around the nation to stage a summer campaign to help local lawyers protect the rights of Negroes and other civil rights personnel.

A second evidence of concern has been the ACLU's continuing pressure for more vigorous enforcement of, and also for strengthening amendments to, Section 242 (Section 18) of the U.S. Criminal Code which would allow citizens to take legal action against police brutality or other official misdeeds. At present, a citizen who has been mistreated by police, often as the outgrowth of a civil rights protest, must prove that the officer had specific intent to deprive him of his civil liberties. The question of mistreatment from hatred, malice or other motives is considered relevant. The ACLU had suggested, during testimony it gave last year on behalf of civil rights legislation before Congress, that this statute be amended so that the simple performance of several specific acts of violence or mistreatment could be considered sufficient grounds for prosecution.

Justice Department officials had earlier argued that the inability to prove intent on the part of Southern police officials, especially before southern juries, made this section of the Code so unenforceable as to be of little value in the kinds of situations expected to develop during the upcoming civil rights struggles. The ACLU, in its letter to Attorney-General Kennedy, replied to this point by writing that even though convictions are difficult to obtain under the law's present requirements, "we will continue to believe that it is important to expose to the nation the fact that in some communities in the United States, it is impossible to obtain conictions for the most flagrant violations of the law."

ACLU, JUNIOR CHAMBER OF COMMERCE SHARE VIEWS ON CENSORSHIP

A clarification of the stand taken by the National Junior Chamber of Commerce on book and magazine censorship, disavowing any intent to compile lists or guides of undesirable material, was contained in an exchange of correspondence made public this week between NJCC President Richard H. Headlee and John deJ. Pemberton, Jr., executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union.

The ACLU had urged the Jaycees to recall what had been understood to be a recommendation to their affiliated chapters: the establishment of a "seal of approval" to be given to local druggists who removed "offensive" publications from heir newsstands.

Headlee replied to ACLU Director Pemberton that the Jaycees only intended to confer with local businessmen and seek their personal cooperation in removing "questionable" magazines from the same display areas as those which exhibit material especially aimed at young people, such as "comics," "Popular Mechanics" and similar publications. "Acceptance and recognition of this responsibility would be the only requirement we would seek from such business and professional men. We would rely on their individual concern and judgment as to any censorship implied or otherwise," Headlee wrote. He also included in his letter the statement that "We (the NJCC) have no intentions of preparing a list, a catalog, or anything similar, of magazines which we would deem to be undesirable, distasteful or otherwise."

Information first published in a Maryland Junior Chamber of Commerce newsletter reported that Headlee's plan called for the establishment of a "seal of approval" to drug stores which "don't expose young people to pornography."

Acting on this information and concurring with the NJCC Newsletter editorial opposing the "seal of approval" plan, Director Pemberton wrote in one of his initial letters to Headlee that the ACLU made a clear distinction between the right of organizations to express opinions on publications and the right to serve as censorship agencies.

"A seal of approval for books is particularly obnoxious because it is a weapon that leads to widespread censorship . . . thus the will of a private organization, by means of economic sanctions, is imposed in the highly sensitive field of communication."

Pemberton also pointed out that there can be little doubt that if such a "seal of approval" program were to be activated, the purpose of it would be to deter patrons from buying at stores which do not have the seal. This would "coerce" stores into accepting the Jaycees as a review board for publications sold by the store.

The answering letter from Mr. Headlee did not mention the "seal of approval" plan but said, instead, that the exercise of the personal judgment of each businessman would be sufficient for the National Jaycees group and he wrote that "I do not feel that it is in any way, shape or form infringing upon the rights of anyone within our society, socially or constitutionally."

Mr. Pemberton's most recent letter in the exchange commended the NJCC for its "constructive approach" to the matter of accepting each individual store owner's judgment concerning his own participation in solutions to the problem.

COURT OF MILITARY APPEALS ATTACKS AIR FORCES' VIOLATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS

Six months ago a Court of Military Appeals ruled that methods used by U.S. Air Force investigators in obtaining an espionage conviction against an officer constituted a "massive and deliberate" violation of the defendant's constitutional rights.

So damaging to the Office of Special Investigations (OSI) were the court's findings that it reduced the charges against Captain Joseph P. Kauffman and cut his 20-year prison term in half after a review of the case. Kauffman was sentenced in Weisbaden, Germany in April, 1963 for having conspired with East German agents to deliver U.S. military secrets to them.

The court noted that violations against him included: (1) Searches on four separate occasions of Kauffman's quarters by a three-man team under orders without warrants, and (2) Rigging of recording devices in the hospital room where Kauffman was in custody and confined.

Terming the OSI methods as "massive and deliberate violations of ... constitutional rights," the court declared: "We regret that we cannot call to our command words which can adequately condemn the illegal procedures revealed by this record," the court concluded.

Alarmed and concerned that the Air Force investigators might repeat these illegalities in other cases, the American Civil Liberties Union sought an investigation of the case, hoping for possible action against those responsible.

In general, a persistent effort by director Lawrence Speiser of the Union's Washington office met only with assurances that a repetition of the case was not likely.

"I have taken the matter up with appropriate Air Force officials and, based upon all the factors involved, have concluded that no further action is warranted at this time," wrote Burke Marshall, assistant U.S. Attorney General in the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division. "I understand that the responsible OSI officer ... is retired and that the organization is now under new command. Revisions... were made to provide greater protection for the rights of persons subject to OSI investigations.," he added.

Speiser also wrote to Lt. Gen. John D. Ryan, Inspector General of the Air Force; and to the U.S. Senate's Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights.

Ryan replied that the "national interest" might have been compromised had search warrants been obtained and added that "nothing obtained in the illegal searches or through use of the listening device was, in any manner, used as evidence in any prosecutive action concerning Kauffman. Ryan further said that the listening device was "legally placed" in the hospital to learn whether Kauffman had made contact with espionage agents and that conversations recorded between the defendant and his attorney were "an unintentional by-product.

"No disciplinary action has been taken. . . and it would appear inappropriate to furnish the names of the persons concerned," Ryan concluded.

Replying for the Senate subcommittee was its chief counsel William A.Creech who said that the subcommittee "has not considered it appropriate to press for action against the individuals in the field who were conducting the investigation. It would not appear that the illegality of the instructions given to them were so palpably clear that they obeyed them only at their peril," he said. In a more sympathetic vein, he said Ryan's opinion as to the legality of the listening device "adds little to the solution of the problem" and said that "I think it is fair to state that the legality of this technique is very much in doubt." Creech said that the subcommittee, from time to time, had sought information from the Department of Defense on its investigative techniques. "Frankly, up to the present time, very little significant information has been garnered from the replies to our inquiries," he noted.

CIVIL LIBERTIES BRIEFS

A LETTER from the CLU of Massachusetts to the Boston Police Commissioner expressed shock at the slaying of a police officer a few months ago, but at the same time referred to reports that a suspect captured shortly after the crime, though in good health when arrested, was in need of hospital care ten hours later. The CLU called for an investigation of possible police misconduct. ... THE NATIONAL CAPITAL AREA CLU has attacked as unconstitutional legislation introduced by Rep. John Dowdy of Texas to deny permits to solicit contributions to any group not deemed "beneficial to the health, welfare and morals" of the District, and to revoke the permit of the Mattachine Society, a group which attempts to protect homosexuals from discrimination through public education. ... NCACLU CLAIMS the bill tries to establish a vague "morality" test for District organizations, and denies freedom of expression. ... TESTIFYING AT A SENATE appropriations subcommittee hearing, NCACLU secretary James Heller criticized welfare administration to dependent children -- delays in obtaining a hearing after denial of welfare aid, timing of welfare investigators' calls too early in the morning or too late at night -- and challenged the "man-in-the house" rule which threatens to deny aid to the children if there is "continued presence" of one man in a fatherless home.

NEWS FROM
SOUTHERN CONFERENCE EDUCATIONAL FUND, INC.
822 Perdido Street, New Orleans, La. 70112

July 8, 1964

ENFIELD, N. C. - A huge fiery cross blazed as a calling card of the Ku Klux Klan outside of the Enfield home of a Negro school teacher and civil rights leader. The cross-burning, which occurred on the night of July 4, is the latest incident in what civil rights leaders in the area view as mounting activity in Halifax County - in recent months the scene of an intensive Negro campaign for equal rights.

Two nights before the cross-burning, on July 2, carloads of robed KKK members - several of them masked and carrying guns - staged a motorcade and rally in Enfield and traveled into Negro neighborhoods in that community in an obvious attempt to spread fear and terror.

John R. Salter, Jr. - field secretary for the Southern Conference Educational Fund (SCEF) - said that the cross that burned on July 4 was aimed principally against Mrs. A. Reed Johnson who, with her husband, is one of the active leaders in the county-wide Halifax Voters Movement. Mrs. Johnson, who recently lost her teaching job owing to her civil rights activities, has filed suit in Federal Court, against a number of Halifax County officials, in an effort to regain her teaching position. One of the officials she is suing is Joe Branch of Enfield, attorney for the county school board, who is also the state campaign manager for the Democratic gubernatorial winner and strong segregationist, Dan K. Moore. Moore, who won in the June 27 run-off primary, received open support from the North Carolina Ku Klux Klan.

Other crosses have been burned recently in Halifax County, Salter said, but he indicated that the one of July 4 was the largest. He said it was about 17 feet tall and 8 feet across, had been heavily wrapped in tobacco cloth, and burned about 150 yards from Mrs. Johnson's home. Salter also said that Mrs. Johnson has been receiving many anonymous threatening telephone calls.

"The situation, particularly around Enfield, is growing quite tense," Salter said. "The police in Enfield don't appear at all interested in discovering who is responsible for the cross-burnings and the threats - and they don't appear at all concerned about the insurgent Ku Klux Klan in the area. From the standpoints of poverty, repression, and recalcitrance, Halifax County is very similar to Mississippi. This rising Klan activity could easily have a very inflammatory and negative effect on the whole situation. The use of guns is common all over this area," he added.

Salter said that the FBI had been contacted about the Klan activity and that telegrams "requesting constructive action" had been sent to the Civil Rights Division of the Justice Department and to appropriate state officials. But, he said, "no answers have been received so far." He also charged that the "great majority of newspapers in North Carolina are covering up the KKK upsurge."

Last month, a dozen students from the North were driven out of Elm City in Wilson County, North Carolina, by a mob of over 250 Klan supporters led by top North Carolina KKK leaders. The students, under the sponsorship of the United Presbyterian Church, had been engaged in a work-camp project aimed at repairing Negro churches.

Halifax County is considered one of the most rigid bastions of racism and poverty in the eastern seaboard area. Last summer, Negro demonstrators in Enfield were met by extreme police and vigilante brutality. A large-scale Negro voter registration campaign was waged this spring by the Halifax Voters Movement - an effort which was met by police harassment, slow-down tactics on the part of voter registrars, and economic reprisals. The Voters Movement won a highly significant, precedent-setting Federal court order which prevented county officials and others from interfering with voter registration activities. During that phase of the Halifax County civil rights campaign, over 2,000 new Negro voters were added to the registration books - raising the total in the county to over 3,500. Nearly all of the Negro voters voted in the recent state elections, as did about 10,000 of the county's white people.

The Negro population of Halifax County numbers about 33,000 and the white population totals 26,000.

INTEGRATION COMES TO MACON COUNTY ALABAMA PUBLIC SCHOOL SYSTEM

Court Issues Far-reaching Decree

Montgomery, Ala.--One of the most far-reaching decrees in the history of the struggle for equality in education was issued here last week when a three-judge Federal court ended segregation in Macon County, Ala.

The court order put an end to months of controversy involving Negro and white students at Shorter High, Macon County High in Notasulga, and Macon Academy in Tuskegee.

NAACP Legal Defense Fund attorneys had brought the action in January of 1963.

In February Governor George Wallace had issued an executive decree saying Negroes could not attend previously white schools. The new court order specifically forbids Governor Wallace from interfering with peaceful school integration.

On learning of the decision, Jack Greenberg, Director-Counsel of the Legal Defense Fund, called it "the most sweeping decree in the history of the Fund's school integration campaign."

He further stated: "Although the decision is, for the moment, limited to Macon County, it lays the groundwork for future action to enjoin Alabama school segregation in a single suit.

"This decree stops Governor Wallace and other state officials from 'harassing or punishing' students or teachers attending integrated schools. School officials are now free to move toward integration without pressure from state officials.

"It knocks out tuition grants as a means of perpetuating segregation and declares that state officials may not use their power to thwart integration.

"The decree also enjoined local Macon county officials from: operating jim crow schools; applying different tests, procedures or requirements to Negro applicants.

"The court ordered the Macon county board to file a detailed plan of operating the schools for the 1964-65 year on or before August 3rd. It further ordered that such plans should include desegregation of the 9th, 10th, 11th and 12th grades and at least one of the elementary school grades in each of the schools in Macon County," he concluded.

Approaching 15th Anniversary

WASHINGTON CENTER HAILS 50,000th VISITOR

by Andrew H. Berding, Executive Director of Washington International Center and Treasurer of COSERV

WASHINGTON, D.C.—As the Washington International Center of the Meridian House Foundation approaches the 15th anniversary of its founding, it remains, as it began, "a unique adventure in international education." There is, in fact, no other institution anywhere quite like it, where Government and citizens join hands in a private organization to provide orientation on the whole country for government-sponsored visitors from all over the world.

The Center is located in beautiful Meridian House. Its programs include seminars, films, tours, recreation, and home hospitality. They lay a firm foundation for these foreign guests, after which they can begin their cultural, educational, and training tours equipped with the basic facts to help them understand the United States and its people.

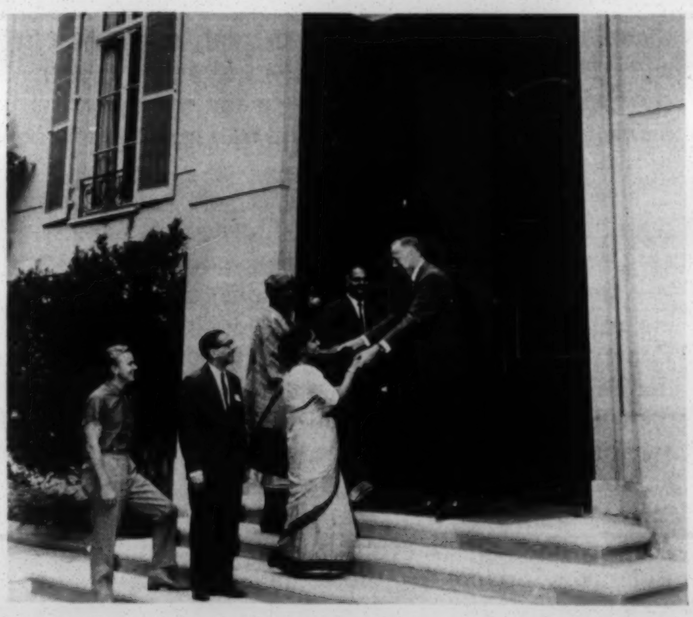
Orientation To U. S. Needed

Nearly 20 years ago, at the conclusion of World War II, the Department of the Army began bringing to this country, government, education and civic leaders from the defeated nations for short visits "to see how democracy works." Very soon it was realized that these visitors needed a preliminary orientation period if they were to understand what they saw as they fanned out across America for stops in the cities and the rural communities.

To avoid any taint of propaganda, the Department of State asked the American Council on Education to work out an orientation program. That done, the Council agreed in 1950 to operate the program as the Washington International Center. As the post-war visits ended and the various exchange and training programs developed, leaders, specialists, and training program participants poured into the welcoming doors of the Center in increasing numbers. They have come from 129 countries and territories in Europe, Asia, the Near and Middle East, Latin America, and Africa.

Greater Numbers Expected

This year the Center received its 50,000th guest. The end of the fiscal year 1964 marked an all-time high in numbers, 5,386 people having registered during the year for all or part of the Center's programs, as compared with the total of 1,047 in the first 15 months of its existence. Now the Center is preparing to greet even larger numbers in the years ahead, with the decision of the Department of the Army to have the Center conduct a seminar on American life for foreign military trainees; the establishment of the International Police Academy in Washington by the Agency for International Development; and the transfer here of the Inter-American Police Academy from the Panama Canal Zone. Other special programs already launched by the Center include the annual spring conference for senior scholars in the Fulbright program, and a Washington Study Tour for industrial interns coming here on programs sponsored by AIESEC-US, The International Association of Students in Economic and Commercial Sciences.



Mr. Berding extends two welcoming hands to visitors at the doorway to Meridian House, the mansion-home of the Washington International Center and COSERV.

The substantive programs at the Center include lecture-discussions on the land and the people, government and politics, the family and community, religious life, trends and problems in the U.S. economy, education, and civil liberties and race relations. These are conducted by speakers expert in their respective fields, drawn from the five universities in the Washington area, from government offices, public and private organizations and institutions. institutions, to such historic spots as Mt. Vernon and Arlington National Cemetery, are combined with the lecture program.

Publications Program

The Center's publications program includes several booklets specifically designed to assist newly arrived visitors from abroad—Overseas Visitors in Washington, in English, French, and Spanish, is a handbook of practical information, from how much to tip a barber to accepted social customs; Doorway to the U.S.A., also in three languages, is a brochure describing WIC programs; Washington, Where to Go, What to See, lists sight-seeing highspots for visitors in the city for only a short time. A quarterly newsletter, the International Exchange News, is sent to all Center alumni and has a circulation now of more than 45,000. For many, this is the only continuing link with the experience of a lifetime; as such, it elicits a wide variety of reports from its readers on their achievements based on the education and training they received in this country.

While the Center has a dedicated staff of 23 professional and secretarial workers, its success unquestionably depends on the wholehearted cooperation of the Washington community which supplies nearly 200 working volunteers who give regular hours of service to the Center in almost all its phases of activity, and more than 800 families offering Center guests hospitality in their homes. About 40 organizations participate in the evening programs, sending groups of their members to be hosts at bi-weekly receptions.

Staff-Volunteer Coordination

The Office of Volunteers has its Staff Coordinator of Volunteer Services, but the volunteers' Executive Committee meets twice a month to help carry out the volunteer program. There are eight volunteer service committees: Airport Reception, Evening and Community Activities, Capitol Hill Tour, Home Hospitality, Hospitality at Meridian House, Reception and Information, Library, and Music. Each service works with a staff officer for a coordinated staff-volunteer approach to all Center operations.

With this kind of help, the Center can earn such appreciation as this, from a Pakistan specialist: "The Center is an agency for happy and lasting international relationships . . . this orientation period was of real help throughout my stay in the U. S. and this made the pursuit of my studies more easily enjoyable."

CHRISTMAS PROGRAMS ON THE WAY

WASHINGTON, D.C.—The Agency for International Development has announced nine major Christmas programs to be conducted for its participants by universities and community centers in all sections of the country. The majority of programs will begin on December 19 or 20 and last through January 1.

Organizations wishing to cooperate in building a program, or those who would like to participate in one, are advised to write to Miss M. Aloyse Doyle, Agency for International Development, Office of International Training, Washington 25, D. C.

Open to A.I.D. participants only, the programs which have been announced will be directed by the following universities and community groups:

1. Colorado State University and International Hospitality Center of the Mile High Chapter of AAUN-UNESCO.
2. Pennsylvania State University and the Philadelphia Center for International Visitors (agriculture participants only).
3. University of California at Berkeley and International Hospitality Center of the Bay Area (agriculture participants only).
4. International House, University of Chicago and International Hospitality Center of Chicago.
5. Michigan State University, Kellogg Center and surrounding communities.
6. University of Michigan historical tour to Williamsburg, Virginia, and Washington, D.C.
7. New York State University College at Plattsburgh and surrounding communities.
8. University of Georgia, Center for Continuing Education, and Athens, Georgia.
9. Washington International Center, Washington, D.C.

Special tours and other festivities have also been announced for international visitors not formally enrolled in A.I.D. programs. These will be held by COSERV organizations in Dallas, Denver, New York City and San Francisco. No fees will be charged.

McPHERSON NEW ASSISTANT SECRETARY

WASHINGTON, D.C.—Harry C. McPherson, Jr. has been appointed Assistant Secretary of State for Educational and Cultural Affairs, succeeding Lucius D. Battle who has assumed the post of U. S. Ambassador to the United Arab Republic.

Mr. McPherson, 34, is an attorney from Tyler, Texas. He joined the staff of the Senate Democratic Policy Committee in 1956 and was named its General Counsel in 1961. In 1963 he was appointed Deputy Under Secretary of the Army for International Affairs. In his new assignment his responsibilities will include the direction of the State Department's Cultural Exchange Program that brings many thousands of visitors to communities throughout the U. S. each year.

A graduate of the University of the South at Sewanee, Tennessee, and the University of Texas Law School, Mr. McPherson is married and the father of a daughter, Courtenay.

THE BLIND LEAD THE BLIND— AROUND THE WORLD

By Russell Kletzing, President
National Federation of the Blind

SACRAMENTO, CALIF.—This summer, leaders of the blind from all over the world converged on Phoenix, Arizona and New York City. The main sponsor of this rally was the National Federation of the Blind, a nationwide organization of blind people in the United States. They invited and, in part, sponsored the trips of eighteen leaders in work for the blind from eight countries.

The occasion for this blind migration was the opportunity to attend the National Convention of the National Federation of the Blind in Phoenix and, a month later, the World Council for the Welfare of the Blind in New York City. In between, the blind visitors traveled to all parts of the country as any other international visitor might do. Some of the ports of call included San Francisco, Los Angeles, Seattle, Denver, Sioux City, New Orleans, Bozeman (Mont.), Philadelphia, Springfield (Mass.), and Boise (Idaho). COSERV organizations were particularly helpful in Sacramento, Sioux City, Denver, Dallas, New Orleans, and Washington, D. C.

"Most Thrilling Experience"

Lester Shaffer of COSERV in Phoenix did a most outstanding job of assistance. In the space of three days, he worked out itineraries, obtained tickets and bookings, and contacted other COSERV organizations for twelve of the visitors—all just before the Fourth of July Holiday. Of this strenuous effort, Mr. Shaffer reports that it was "one of the greatest and most thrilling experiences I have had."

Each of the overseas blind leaders had uniquely interesting experiences during his visit in this country. The group varied from a Korean girl, Hee Yong Yank, of thirty, who is a proof reader and secretary in the Braille library in Seoul, to Hugh Jeffrey, President of the Australian Federation of Organizations of the Blind. The president or other high officers from organizations of the blind in India, Pakistan, Hong Kong, and Ceylon were among the group. The excitement of all is best illustrated by the story of one of our guests.

Lee Ah Kow

Lee Ah Kow is a 24-year-old Malaysian, who lost his sight three years ago while studying mathematics. Since then he has had some basic training to function as a blind person and has learned the occupation of a stenotypist. In his extra time, he has organized and become first president of the Selangor Society of the Blind in Kuala Lumpur. This is the first organization of blind people in the short history of this new nation.

Ah Kow arrived in San Francisco late in June, a week before our Phoenix Convention was due to begin. His first visit was to Sacramento in 100 degree heat, where he was our house guest. He attended a meeting of the Capitol Chapter of the California Council of the Blind where he talked of the status of blind people in Malaysia and learned of our situation here. He also visited a vending stand operated by a blind person, the State Department of Rehabilitation and the State Department of Social Welfare.

California's Blind Programs Visited

Next day, back in San Francisco Ah Kow visited a workshop for the blind and California's orientation center in Oakland; then an hour's flight to Los Angeles, where he met with and spoke at the meeting of the Active Blind, Inc., another affiliate of the California Council of the Blind. He attended a swimming party and learned more about work for the blind.

Ah Kow participated actively in both the social and official life at our National Convention in Phoenix. He had come to this country under the foreign specialist program of the State Department through the auspices of the National Social Welfare Assembly with the National Federation of the Blind responsible for his program. A result of the discussions during the Phoenix Convention was the determination to form an international federation of the blind.

Right State, Wrong City

From Phoenix, Ah Kow journeyed, with two plane changes, on his way to an intended destination at a summer school for the blind in Bozeman, Montana. By error, his ticket had been made to Missoula, home of the University of Montana rather than to Bozeman, home of Montana State College. A long distance phone call to me, and Ah Kow was off the next morning by train to Bozeman with only a little time lost and some interesting experiences. The highlight of the summer school was a trip through Yellowstone Park to see the natural geysers.

Next, on to Sioux City where the COSERV organization had arranged visits to local attractions and surrounding farms. Then southward to Des Moines, where Lee Ah Kow spent the two weeks before leaving for New York at the world-renowned orientation center of the Iowa Commission for the Blind.

In New York, Ah Kow attended meetings of the World Council for the Welfare of the Blind. He and the Selangor Society of the Blind became part of the International Federation of the Blind which was officially formed at the New York meeting. His side trips included visits to Philadelphia for the Pennsylvania Federation of the Blind, and Louisville for the Kentucky Federation of the Blind and the American Printing House for the Blind. In Washington, prior to leaving for home, he met with State Department and Federal Vocational Rehabilitation Administration officials and also visited Mount Vernon and Capitol Hill.

Impact On Blind In U. S.

On leaving, Ah Kow said his trip to the United States had changed his life and will help to change the lives of thousands of blind people in Malaysia. What our international visitors did not fully realize was the tremendous impact they had on the blind people of this country in encouraging them by personal example to renew their efforts to improve conditions for the blind throughout the world.

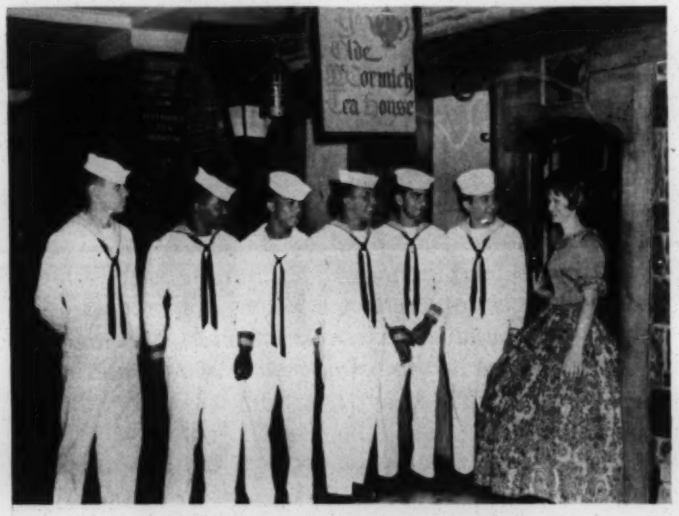
WHEN "LOS MARINEROS" LANDED

BALTIMORE, MD.—Reorganized little over a year ago, the Baltimore Council for International Visitors has experienced no difficulty in keeping its volunteers busy. They have played host to 1200 visitors from 65 countries in a short 15 months.

For three months during the Summer, the Council conducted a round of community and home activities for 300 officers and men aboard two Venezuelan ships undergoing repairs in the Baltimore harbor. Working closely with the ships' commanding officer, Cdr. Manuel Diaz Ugueto, in planning events that would most appeal to the "land-locked" sailors, the Council involved local business and industry as well as host families in the summer venture.

City-Wide Cooperation

In cooperation with the Red Cross, the men recorded greetings that were sent home to their families. During a guided tour of the Baltimore News Post, they were given their names in print as souvenirs. Two tours with interpreters were made to the McCormick Spice Company to see the processing and manufacturing of spices, extracts and tea.



Venezuelan sailors enjoy a guided tour of the McCormick Spice Company in Baltimore.

Dauntless sailors on any waters, 40 of them took to swimming pools of host families despite thundershowers that broke the summer hot spell.

Venezuela's Independence Day—Sunday, July 5, was celebrated in gala fashion by 150 of the men who attended the Baltimore Orioles baseball game. Preceding the opening of the game, an Honor Guard marched into the stadium to play the Venezuelan and U. S. national anthems.

In a harmonious expression of gratitude, "Los Marineros de Venezuela," the seamen's own orchestra, gave an informal concert of Latin American music in Mt. Vernon Square and subsequently taped a half-hour television program that was sent back home for transmission on Venezuela's national network.

U. S. Naval Hero Remembered

As a parting gesture, the men presented a plaque and letter to the Baltimore Council which said, in part, ". . . please let it be known that we shall never forget all that has been done for us by the citizens of Baltimore, origin of one of the naval heroes of Venezuela, The Captain of the Navy, John Daniel Danells, illustrious leader of the independence."

GETTING TO KNOW ABOUT US IN MANY LANGUAGES

WILLIAMSBURG, VA.—In this small village in Southern Virginia, foreign visitors are being given an intimate insight into the ferment and idealism that caused the United States to become the first of the New Nations—the first major colony to break away successfully from colonial rule through revolution.

Now a great tourist center, Colonial Williamsburg has been restored by John D. Rockefeller, Jr. to its pre-revolutionary appearance, and it is maintained today as a symbol of an important period in American history. Depicted as one of the important ideological training grounds for the leaders of American independence, its historic significance is not lost on visitors from the developing countries, many of whose own histories as independent nations are only now beginning.

The story of the United States struggle is brought to life for the non-English speaking visitor in a carefully planned program. As he approaches the Colonial Williamsburg Information Center, signs in a great variety of languages greet him and inform him of special assistance available to him at the main desk.

Continuing along with him in his own tongue, folders in many languages are given him which explain the significant historical aspects of old Williamsburg, the pre-revolutionary capital. He then goes on to a theatre where, seated in a special section, he tunes in through dial-a-language facilities to a film with sound track in French, German, Spanish, Italian, Portuguese, Japanese or Russian.

Nor is he left bewildered as he strolls through the restored workshops and artisans' buildings that line the streets of this authentically reproduced colonial village. Multi-lingual escorts provide a service that has helped visitors from the seventy-four countries represented among visitors so far this year.

Visiting naval and military groups, State Department grantees, and foreign students are all given special interpretive help. In addition, Colonial Williamsburg sponsors two events annually for foreign students in this country.

Overseas Visitors Coordinator Thomas B. Schlesinger feels that Colonial Williamsburg's motto explains its significance: ". . . that the future may learn from the past."

Visitors from abroad use dial-a-language translation device pioneered by Colonial Williamsburg.

THAT WAS THE WEEK THAT WAS THE SAN FRANCISCO CENTER'S TRIUMPH

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.—Rivalling for one spectacular week the glory that was Greece, the International Hospitality Center of San Francisco staged a round of activities that caught up the entire city in the spirit of international friendship, and spotlighted the Center as the place through which it could be channelled.

A Pattern To Copy

Although the City of the Golden Gate is listed as the sixth largest in population in the United States, the "show" put on by the Center could be reproduced in any city, large or small, where the spirit of international interest moved. The fete took untold hours of advance planning, plus the willing commitment of the Center's dedicated volunteers. But, according to Mrs. Allyn G. Smith, Executive Director of the Center,

"We feel this was an event well worth staging. Our week was a tremendous success from the standpoint of making the services of the Center known to the public. We are now reaping the reward with new membership checks and volunteer forms arriving with each mail."

Starting At The Top

Well in advance of the carefully chosen week, the Mayor of San Francisco was approached for cooperation in proclaiming the time as an official city celebration. He set the tone in the following proclamation:

Whereas, the City and County of San Francisco, known throughout the world as an international capital, reflecting gracious charm and hospitality, has every year thousands of visitors from foreign lands; and

Whereas, the citizens of our city, the International Hospitality Center, and other groups and organizations strive to provide a friendly welcome for these visitors, who include foreign government officials, students, educators, professional and business men—visitors from every walk of life; and

Whereas, a special program of extending the hand of international friendship to visitors from overseas has been developed under the sponsorship of the International Hospitality Center, in cooperation with many other organizations in our midst; and

Whereas, the International Hospitality Center is planning the observance of International Hospitality Center Week during the period from June 15 through June 21, 1964:

Now, Therefore, I, John F. Shelley, Mayor of the City and County of San Francisco, do hereby proclaim the period from June 15 to 21, 1964 shall be known and observed in San Francisco as "INTERNATIONAL HOSPITALITY CENTER WEEK," and I urge our citizens to participate fully in the events of this special week and to visit the Center at 55 Grant Avenue in order that they may better acquaint themselves with the objectives and program of this worthwhile civic group.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the City and County of San Francisco to be affixed this fifteenth day of May, nineteen hundred and sixty-four.

John F. Shelley, Mayor

With "The Week" proclaimed officially, the Center set about arranging activities to point up its role in promoting friendship between Bay Area citizens and people from other parts of the world.

Social, Cultural, Commercial Events

A series of three "open houses" were held in the Center's lounge from noon to 6 p.m., with foreign visitors especially invited, and volunteers on hand to explain the Center's operations. The lounge was attractively decorated with flowers and Japanese prints. Red pins on a map of the world marked every country that had sent visitors to the Center in 1963. Ribbons from each continent reached to nearby tables holding sheafs of letters from former guests. Enlarged photos of visitors sightseeing and in homes were hung, and a poster described briefly the Center's activities. Tea was served.

Faye and Dale Schmidt, two of five Oriental daughters adopted by Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Schmidt of San Francisco, perform Chinese Ribbon Dance in Maiden Lane during International Hospitality Center Week.

On June 16, the Maiden Lane shopping section of San Francisco staged "International Hospitality Center Day" from noon to 2 p.m. Display booths erected by consulates of 16 nations lined the lane and representatives in native dress demonstrated their country's songs and dances. Between "the acts," Hospitality Center members mounted a platform and gave a "pitch" for the Center. Brochures, volunteer applications and membership envelopes were distributed to those signifying an interest.

Press, radio and television coverage was extensive, with Center board members interviewed on several morning programs. Spot announcements about the week's activities were taped in advance by 4 board members and then sent to 25 stations. A typical 20-second announcement read: "This is International Hospitality Week proclaimed by Mayor John F. Shelley to make known the work of the International Hospitality Center in promoting friendship between citizens of the Bay Area and people from other parts of the world. Come to 55 Grant Avenue Monday, Wednesday or Friday between noon and six and see what volunteers do at the Center."

The International Hospitality Center of the Bay Area's show was one that others may copy but few surpass.

CONSULAR CORPS IN HOME VISITS

SPRINGFIELD, ILL.—Combining business with unexpected pleasure, a Chicago group of 87 representatives of 38 foreign countries, including 51 consuls general, vice consuls, commercial attaches and their wives arrived in Springfield, Illinois to attend a State-Consular Conference on Agricultural Exports, the first state conference ever held to promote foreign markets for U. S. farm products. The pleasurable surprise arose when the consular representatives learned that after hours at the 2-day conference, they and their wives would be dinner and overnight guests in the homes of Springfield host families. All arrangements were made by the energetic Springfield Commission on International Visitors whose volunteer chairman is Mrs. Donald R. Patton.

The Commission was also one of the sponsors of the Conference, along with the State of Illinois and State agricultural and economic boards. The meeting was called by Governor Otto Kerner to bring together Illinois agriculturists with representatives of overseas consumers in order to discuss ways of expanding Illinois' market for exports of its agricultural products. The conference also focused attention on Illinois as a tourist center because of its historic attractions—the Springfield area is known as "Lincolnland"—and its vacation lures. The consular party attended a reception in the Governor's Mansion, toured Lincoln shrines, held business sessions and visited a typical Illinois farm.

While the men were in conference, their wives were entertained at the Springfield Art Association by the host family wives.

New Reception Center

Largely through the determined efforts of Mrs. Patton and her committee members, the Commission on International Visitors will soon be housed in a reception center adjacent to the former home of Abraham Lincoln. Mrs. Patton cites the new reception center as tangible evidence of what is being done by local groups to promote and welcome the visits of guests from overseas to Illinois.

REMEMBERING THE FUTURE — TODAY

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Historic sites usually having been where they are for a considerable period of time, most people are apt to take them for granted, beer cans and all other signs of neglect notwithstanding.

Now, in an unprecedented attempt at preserving the cultural heritage of the past for the cultural enrichment of the future, UNESCO (United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization) has launched a drive called the International Campaign for Monuments. The purpose of the campaign is "to encourage member states to develop and improve measures for the protection, preservation and restoration of cultural property, and for the protection of the beauty and character of the landscape and of sites. . ." Over 60 nations have agreed to join in promoting the goals of the International Campaign.

Alerting the Public

The United States' participation is called the American Landmarks Celebration. COSERV has been invited to help in the effort to awaken public opinion to the acute need for safeguarding America's architectural, historical and natural heritage as living history—a vital record, source of inspiration and frame of reference for future generations.

Communities throughout the nation are being asked by the National Trust for Historic Preservation to look to their own landmarks and would-be historic sites with an eye to their preservation. Community organizations serving international visitors have become particularly aware of the desecration of many local landmarks as volunteers escort visitors about on sightseeing trips. Experts in preservation and conservation have declared that only through deliberate and concerted efforts can we ensure "that the affluent society does not erase the national memory."

Program Assistance

Community organizations can be helped in setting up a local program by writing for a kit of materials giving more information about the American Landmarks Celebration. It is free and may be obtained from the Coordinator, American Landmarks Celebration, 815 17th Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. Included in the kit is a 9-page folder of suggested ideas for community action. It contains special recommendations for activities that may be undertaken by organizations wishing to emphasize the international aspects of the Landmarks celebration. There is also a list of free and rental films that portray the background of historic sites in many of the 48 states, as well as much of Americana that is less well-known.

As a prick to your conscience and guaranteed to make you wince, the kit-makers have included a reprint of a report that appeared in the Kiplinger magazine Changing Times. Called, "America the Beautiful, Heritage or Honky-Tonk?" the article complains that "Of course, everyone is entitled to his own taste and should pursue it freely. But the public landscape, which all of us must live with, deserves farsighted care. And our national monuments should be more than an opportunity for promoters to make a fast buck."

CONFERENCE IN COLORADO

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLO.—Colorado College in Colorado Springs will be the meeting place for a conference to be held Friday and Saturday, November 20-21, with the theme, "Interpreting the West (Great Plains and Rocky Mountain Region) to the Foreign Visitor." Co-sponsors of the sessions are COSERV, NAFSA (National Association for Foreign Student Affairs), and IIE (Institute of International Education.

Special interest workshops will be featured, and emphasis placed on solutions to problems faced by those who work in international exchange programs. John F. Reichard, Chairman of COSERV's Executive Committee, will attend as will government officials and professionals in the field. Volunteers and others interested in further information should write to the Conference Committee, c/o Institute of International Education, 1600 Sherman Street, Denver, Colorado 90203.

SELECTED READING

Improving the Teaching of World Affairs—The Glens Falls Story by Harold M. Long and Robert N. King. National Council for the Social Studies Bulletin Number 35. National Education Association. Washington, D.C. 1964. $2.00.

Here is the story of an exciting idea translated into dynamic action. With mutual agreement, the school system of Glens Falls, New York (pop. 18,000) was selected by a sponsoring foundation to carry out a 3-year pilot study-action program for Improving the Teaching of World Affairs. The goal of ITWA—as the project came to be known—was to stimulate public school teachers, and through them students and citizens in the local community, to enlarge and clarify their perspective of the world around them. The methods used and the gratifying results that followed are the subject of the newly published, highly readable report.

Proof of the success of the pilot study program was the fact that the community decided to continue the program with its own financing after the foundation grant had expired. "The transformation of the community," says the report, "was not an accidental—or, for that matter, even an incidental—consequence of the organized effort to develop a keener awareness of and knowledge about world affairs. It was, rather, the product of a deliberate plan to build an educational program into both the schools and the community."

And then: "It is impossible to say which aspect of the rich and varied program did the most to arouse in the community an awareness of the larger world beyond its immediate boundaries. Most obvious, of course, was the impact of visitors from other countries."

And, as a side product, ". . . the teachers discovered that the more students learned about other peoples, cultures, and nations the greater was their desire for a better understanding of our own nation and culture."

This is an exciting story. We recommend it highly for its readability and its applicability to other communities.

Roots of Progress—Report of a series of seminars sponsored by the Washington Chapter, Pan-Pacific and Southeast Asia Women's Association, P.O. Box 9941, Washington, D.C. 20015. 1964. $.50.

This 45-page pamphlet recaptures the highlights of a series of panel-discussions centered around the problem of how societies at various stages of development adjust to progress within and outside of their own communities. Topics range all the way from "What is happening to the family in Asia and in America?" to "Women's dress in a changing world." Experts and laymen from East and West state their case and the discussions follow from there.

This is a useful and provocative stimulant for discussion groups concerned with cultural differences among peoples of the world.

For a comprehensive picture of what business, foundations, and private research institutions are contributing to the betterment of international understanding, the May-June 1964 issue of INTERCOM ($1.00) is indispensable. The theme of this issue of the Foreign Policy Association's publication is "Business and World Affairs." We don't know how the editors manage to accumulate so much information for this bi-monthly magazine, but they produce a fine reference tool in each field they tackle.

Now out in its third revised edition is COSERV's 200-page National Directory of Community Organizations Serving Short-term International Visitors, with a Special Appendix on Private National Programming Agencies (June 1964, $3.00). The authoritative source of information in this field available from COSERV.

UNITED NATIONS DAY OCTOBER 24th

ST. LOUIS, MO.—At the McDonnell Aircraft Corporation in St. Louis, both management and the unions agreed when signing the contract in 1958, to make October 24th, U.N. Day, one of the seven annual paid holidays for McDonnell's 15,000 employees.

"It is appropriate," declared James S. McDonnell, founder of the corporation, "that all people of this planet take off one day each year to celebrate the birthday of the United Nations, and to try to do constructive things concerning the United Nations."

HARTFORD, CONN.—The Service Bureau for Women's Organizations will stage its 14th annual welcome for international visitors and students on the weekend of October 24-25. More than 700 international guests will be invited to spend the two days with Connecticut families. Following luncheon as guests of groups in participating towns, they will come to a reception in Hartford, enjoy informal music and dancing, and then go home with their respective host families.

REPORT ON THE CLEARING HOUSE

NEW YORK, N.Y.—The Clearing House Service of the Council on Student Travel has come of age. Established last Spring at the request of interested agencies, the Service has been a center of information about foreign groups requesting assistance from programming agencies or community organizations in the U.S. It has also helped foreign groups in finding the U.S. organization best able to arrange meaningful trips for them.

As had been anticipated, there were frequent cases in which one foreign group wrote to several American organizations asking each for the same information. Having been forewarned, the American organizations turned the requests over to the Clearing House which handled the replies centrally, thus avoiding the duplication of effort that characterized similar situations in past years.

Many of the foreign groups had unrealistic ideas of program costs and requirements in the U.S. With offices in both New York and Paris, the Clearing House was able to give these groups a more accurate estimate of costs and other problems so that they could plan more realistically for the future. Many inquiries made in 1964 will not develop into visits until 1965.

The Service hopes that as 1965 requests for information are received by American organizations, they will continue to cooperate with and to use the services which the Clearing House provides. Address the Clearing House at 777 United Nations Plaza, New York, N. Y. 10017.

HELP WANTED: MAGAZINES

Within the past year, several popular journals have featured articles on the work of COSERV organizations. As a result, inquiries have poured in to the COSERV office from readers wanting to volunteer for the nearest community organization serving international visitors. All have been properly referred. The request below was of a different nature:

Djl. Tangki Sekolah 26,
Djakarta Kota, Indonesia

Dear Sirs,

I got your name from "Woman's Day" June issue 1964 in an article "Fireside Diplomat." My friend got this magazine from a generous American lady in California.

I agree one hundred percent with that article. You know, why there are many Americans are not welcome in Asia? And why they seem so boast to us? I believe because we do not understand each other well. If we know each other a little closer I am sure there will no foreigner who is not welcome in Asia.

I am 23 year old boy. My interests are: stamp, music, reading, travelling, foreign affairs and photography. I like to read American magazine but I got to tell you now there is no American magazine you can find in any bookshop in Indonesia.

My aim writing this letter is asking you politely to deliver my letter to some one in USA who would send their magazines to me. I believe this project could make something to strengthen the relationship between our two countries. Thank you so much Sirs.

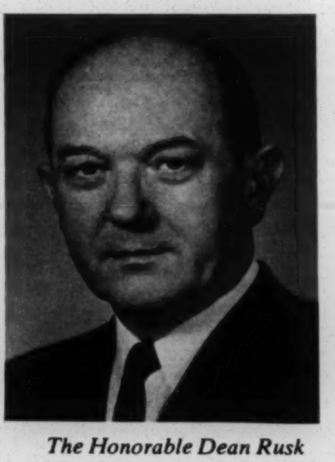
COSERV CONFERENCE MEETS IN WASHINGTON

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Over 300 invited delegates representing community and national private programming organizations, and agencies of the federal government, will convene at the State Department in Washington for three days, March 17-19, to participate in a conference on "SHORT-TERM VISITOR PROGRAMS: DIMENSIONS AND RESOURCES."

This national COSERV Conference is the first ever to be held exclusively on short-term visitor programs in the United States. It is also COSERV's first all-member meeting since its establishment as a membership council. It will bring together representatives of almost all of the 97 member organizations, of which 69 are in local communities.

In arranging the three-day program, two basic aims have been kept in mind by the Conference planners: (1) to bring together those who are principally responsible for short-term visitor programs and services in the United States so that they may review the objectives of the programs and increase the effectiveness of the services which support them; and (2) to provide an opportunity for COSERV member organizations to participate in the development of COSERV policies and future program priorities.

Dr. Homer D. Babbidge, Jr.



The Honorable Dean Rusk

Leading the assemblage of national experts who will participate in the Conference will be two major speakers whose interest in international exchange and training programs is evidence of the importance these programs have in our foreign policy objectives. The keynote address at the opening banquet, to be held in the Diplomatic Functions area of the State Department, will be given by Dr. Homer D. Babbidge, Jr., President of the University of Connecticut. Dr. Babbidge is also newly appointed Chairman of the U. S. Advisory Commission on International Educational and Cultural Affairs. The gala luncheon marking the closing of the Conference will be highlighted by an address by Secretary of State Dean Rusk. Mrs. Rusk will also attend the luncheon. Both the Secretary and his wife have taken an active interest in community services for international visitors.

Evening Reception Scheduled

Midway during the Conference period, an evening reception will be given for delegates by the officers and trustees of Meridian House Foundation, at Meridian House in Washington. The graceful mansion, former residence of a United States diplomat, is headquarters for COSERV and for the Washington International Center.

At the opening plenary session on Thursday morning, delegates will be welcomed by Assistant Secretary of State for Educational and Cultural Affairs Harry C. McPherson, and by David E. Bell, Administrator of the Agency for International Development.

To gain perspective on short-term visitor programs, delegates will be given a glimpse of them as seen from three vantage points: that of a new volunteer, that of experienced workers in community organizations and programming agencies, and that of the diplomat in an overseas post. The presentations will include a few unannounced and dramatic surprises geared to enliven the proceedings.

Thursday afternoon and Friday morning will see the assemblage divided into group workshop sessions where background information will be presented by nationally known experts. Discussion will relate to effective programming at the community level.

The first workshops, on "Understanding a Changing World," will consider emerging political, economic and cultural patterns in six geographic areas of the world from which visitors come who are on exchange and training programs. H. Philip Mettger, President of the Governmental Affairs Institute, is General Chairman for these panels.

The second series of workshops, on "Interpreting a Changing U. S. A.," will focus on four aspects of our society which require informed interpretation to the visitor: civil rights, our expanding economy, urbanization and public opinion. Thomas B. Schlesinger, Jr., Overseas Coordinator of Colonial Williamsburg, is General Chairman for these workshops.

Time has also been allotted for area meetings of representatives of community organizations to plan for future area and regional conferences proposed as a follow-up of the COSERV National Conference. Mrs. Clyde Emery, General Chairman of the Dallas Committee for Foreign Visitors, and Alan Bartholemy of the Sacramento People-to-People Council, are jointly serving as Chairmen of these sessions.

At the conclusion of the Conference, staff members of government and private programming agencies will be available for consultation with delegates from community organizations.

Help From Many Sources

Conference Chairman J. Benjamin Schmoker, Executive Director of the International Student Service, has been assisted by a special Conference Planning Committee appointed by COSERV's Chairman, John F. Reichard. Mrs. Jeanne Witman, Executive Secretary of the Pittsburgh Council for International Visitors has also given special assistance to Miss Helen H. Ringe, Executive Secretary of COSERV, in Conference planning.

Officials of the Department of State's Bureau of Educational and Cultural Affairs and of the Agency for International Development have cooperated in every stage of the planning, and their assistance has been a vital factor in making the meeting possible.

Volunteers from three Washington organizations will provide information and other services while the Conference is in session. They will be drawn from the Washington International Center, the Greater Washington Council of Organizations Serving International Visitors, and the Girl Scout Council of the Nation's Capital. The latter group are Senior Scouts who are International Aides representing their counterparts throughout the United States.

THE WORLD AT HOUSTON'S DOOR

HOUSTON, TEX.—A Chinese legislator on a good will mission, a young German banker looking for new trade ties with the southern United States, and an Australian port official on a world-wide tour "to see what other ports are doing" all found what they were seeking at one spot in Houston, Texas.

They came within a few weeks of each other to the World Trade Center, a unique grouping of separate organizations housed in neighboring offices in Houston's World Trade Building.

Although each his its own special interests, all the organizations work together to serve international visitors in Houston, because all are engaged in activities that have international aspects.

Recently, Tung-min Shieh, speaker of the Taiwan Provincial Assembly in Tapei, visited Houston, Tapei's Sister City. The Chairman of Houston's International Hospitality Committee, which is sponsored by the Institute of International Education's Southern Regional Office, found it easy to arrange a Sister-City Committee luncheon with the Director of the World Trade Center as master of ceremonies. He is "across the hall" from the Hospitality Committee's office in the Trade Center building. Other world-trade groups in the building were also available for consultation, as were consulate staffs, housed in various offices in the same building. The job of arranging programs for many foreign visitors is enormously simplified because transportation between appointments is cut to a minimum.

In the patio of the World Trade Center: Mrs. Alice Pratt, Southern Regional Director of IIE, Vaughn M. Bryant, International Relations Director of Port of Houston; and Edward J. Fay, Director of World Trade Center.

Recently, at IIE's request, the port of Houston's International Relations Department shared responsibility for the visit of an Australian marine engineer. The Department arranged a tour of the Port of Houston, and IIE's Hospitality Committee members invited the visitor and his wife to cultural events and to their homes.

The World Trade Club on the building's fourth floor often plays host to IIE-sponsored visitors and students. And the World Trade Center Library is available to all visitors for temporary use.

The World Trade Building is a focal point that leaves the 500 international visitors who come to the city each year under IIE auspices with a feeling of having enjoyed a special brand of Texas hospitality.

Dinner celebrants marked the occasion of El Paso Council's becoming a member of COSERV: from left, Fred Hervey; Mrs. Fred Hervey, President of El Paso Council; John F. Reichard, Chairman of COSERV Executive Committee; Mrs. Joseph Goodell; Mr. Goodell; Mrs. Russell Harding, past President and Dinner Chairman; and Kurt Spier.

EL PASO COUNCIL FOR INTERNATIONAL VISITORS JOINS COSERV

EL PASO, TEX.—The El Paso Council for International Visitors, recently accepted as a member of COSERV, now joins community organizations in four other Texas cities (Austin, Dallas, Forth Worth and Houston) who became members over a year ago.

The Council held its first annual dinner on November 17 at the El Paso Country Club to mark the occasion. John F. Reichard, Chairman of COSERV's Executive Committee, was an honored guest and speaker. Two hundred volunteer workers present at the festivities cheered as he officially proclaimed the Council a member of COSERV. Mr. Reichard, in turn, was made an honorary citizen by the Mayor of El Paso, photographed for the press, interviewed on television, and given a taste of Texas hospitality that is customarily extended to international visitors to this border city just across the river from Juarez, Mexico.

The Council has been in operation for only 2 1/2 years but, observed Mr. Reichard, it "has more people involved—and in an increasingly purposeful way—than many older, well established major city councils. Its leadership is evaluating most thoughtfully the purposes and procedures of the Council."

He continued: "El Paso, I must admit, fascinated me—its exciting geographic setting with rugged mountains ringing the city, the Spanish influence—especially the proximity to Juarez—the booming downtown with a set of genuine skyscrapers, the beautiful architecture of Texas Western College, the importance of Fort Bliss as the major air defense training center in the western world. . . . . .Everyone I met had a strong international point of view and wished to be genuinely friendly to visitors."

Serve Military Trainees

187 Council families carry out a major program of services and hospitality to allied trainees from 13 nations who are stationed at Fort Bliss for from three to thirty months. Carefully planned "sponsor-family assignments" are worked out with military representatives on the Post, and every effort is made to fulfill the program's goal of a well-rounded community experience for each military trainee who participates. Host families, in turn, receive from the Army information sheets on the countries of origin of their "adopted" trainees in order to ensure at least a basic knowledge of the guest's background. The Council provides "Hospitality Hints for Host Families" which for the most part give clues to local resources that should not be overlooked in giving the visitor a full experience.

FINANCIAL SUPPORT POLICY

by Mrs. Karl T. Compton, Vice-Chairman of COSERV and President, Boston Council for Int'l. Visitors

BOSTON, MASS.—The question has come from some local community organizations concerning the possibility of their receiving financial support from the federal government for their services. In answer to this question the Executive Committee of COSERV at its October meeting adopted the following statement of policy unanimously and with conviction:

"It is COSERV's belief that local community organizations serving international visitors should be financed locally and not by federal funds. The cogent reason for this is the fact that they are essentially volunteer organizations whose strength in their relationship with their guests is that they are composed of freely voluntary private citizens personally concerned with greater mutuality of understanding among the nations and cannot possibly be considered subsidized governmental agents. Surprise, augmented confidence, and pleasure in this fact have been expressed often by international visitors.

"However, the moral support and clearly expressed and publicized recognition of COSERV and its member organizations by the State Department and other governmental agencies is indispensable if they are to have the financial support and recognition they need from their local communities."

We were not unmindful of the financial requirements and difficulties of local councils. However, we believe, on the basis of experience, that federal subsidy of our offered friendship would undercut its effectiveness; indeed, that a community's assumption of financial as well as hosting responsibility is a valid test of the depth of its commitment to this program of "citizen" diplomacy.

ANNUAL AWARDS ANNOUNCED

NEW YORK, N. Y.—For distinguished service to international education, five award winners received citations from the Institute of International Education-Reader's Digest Foundation, during cerymonies held at the new IIE headquarters in New York, January 18. Of the five, three have a COSERV affiliation. They are:

Mr. and Mrs. T. J. Trogdon, Jr., of the Paris (Illinois) International Thanksgiving Fellowship, "for their untiring and effective efforts to provide hospitality to foreign students and visitors and to broaden the horizons of their fellow Americans." The Paris organization, founded by the Trogdons, is a member of COSERV.

Harry C. McPherson, Jr., Assistant Secretary of State, presents IIE-Reader's Digest Foundation citation and $1,000 check to Mr. and Mrs. T. J. Trogdon, Jr.

The International Student Service, formerly the Committee on Friendly Relations Among Foreign Students, "for its dedication to serving foreign students and promoting friendship between them and the American people." The organization, a COSERV member, accepted the award through its Executive Director, J. Benjamin Schmoker who is on the Executive Committee of COSERV.

The City of Louisville, Kentucky, "for its inspiring example of civic interest in international affairs and the civic hospitality to visitors from abroad." The International Center of the University of Louisville, a COSERV member, was singled out for its "dynamic community program. . .(which) makes it possible for every foreign short-term visitor of whom there were nearly 250 last year to live with a local family during his stay in the city."

The two other recipients of honors were Western College for Women in Oxford, Ohio, "for the originality and quality of its international program" and the Marcona Mining Company, a U. S. corporation which promoted effective educational programs in Peru.

Nominations for the 1965 awards were submitted by individuals, organizations and educational institutions in all parts of the country. The presentations were made by Assistant Secretary of State for Educational and Cultural Affairs Harry C. McPherson, Jr. Except for the corporation award, $1,000 checks accompanied the citations.

Mr. and Mrs. Trogdon—he is a former Mayor of their small midwestern town—proved themselves pioneers in leading their community in service to international visitors. The text of their citation includes some historical notes:

"For the foreign student or visitor, the opportunity to know and understand the America which extends beyond the campus or the special facility he is visiting is one of the most rewarding aspects of his exchange experience. Since 1956, Mr. and Mrs. Trogdon have provided this opportunity to hundreds of visitors from abroad. In that year they organized, in their home town of Paris, Illinois, the Thanksgiving Fellowships which have made it possible ever since then for more than one hundred foreign students attending nearby colleges and universities to spend the four-day Thanksgiving holiday in local homes. So rewarding was this program to the students and to the host families that the Trogdons undertook to develop Thanksgiving Four-day Fellowships in other communities. Today their idea flourishes in seven Illinois towns and cities.

"The original venture in international understanding launched by Mr. and Mrs. Trogdon in Paris is now but a part of the year-round community program, which includes regular visits to this American community by Allied airmen at Chanute Field during the summer, and year-round visits of special guests sent by the State Department and other public and private agencies. Many of these visitors have enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. Trogdon who have played a leading role in the expansion of their community hospitality program."

INTERNATIONAL SERVICE

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Paid employment in the broad field of international affairs may be found in such a variety of places and institutions that the editors of INTERCOM, publication of the Foreign Policy Association, have issued a new directory, "Careers in World Affairs," for people seeking jobs. It is about as complete an inventory as may be found. Order ($1) from INTERCOM, 345 E. 46 St., New York, N. Y. 10017.

For those who have jobs and are seeking people, two sources of alumni with overseas backgrounds are:

(1) The Peace Corps, 806 Connecticut Ave., N. W., Washington, D. C. 20525. Dr. Robert Calvert, Jr. directs the career information service for returning Peace Corps volunteers.

(2) The Experiment in International Living, Putney, Vermont. Reed Alvord has a file of well-qualified former leaders of outbound Experiment groups who might fill various positions.

The National Association for Foreign Student Affairs (NAFSA), 809 United Nations Plaza, New York, N. Y. 10017, lists job opportunities in the field of international educational exchange in its Newsletter.

MEMBERS OF COSERV IN MARCH 1965

COSERV

National Council for Community Services to International Visitors

The National Council for Community Services to International Visitors, a non-profit organization, was established in 1961 to assist in the development and coordination of needed services at the community level which contribute to the objectives of international exchange and training programs. COSERV seeks also to encourage effective communication between national agencies that send visitors across the land and local organizations that receive visitors in their communities. In serving as a link between these "sending" and "receiving" groups, COSERV provides opportunities for the mutual exchange of ideas and for consultation on the unmet needs and varying experiences of sponsored visitors.

COSERV's leadership is centered in a Board of Directors whose elected members represent both national agencies and local community organizations, with particular care given to assure broad geographic distribution of Board members.

The Board establishes policies which govern COSERV's objectives, organizational status, programs and activities, including requirements for membership in COSERV. The Board determines whether an organization does in fact meet the basic prescribed standards. Through adherence to these standards it is hoped to safeguard both national interest and local diversity in programs for international visitors, while at the same time keeping in mind the objectives which guide the National Council.

Qualifying organizations which have applied for and been accepted to membership in COSERV are identified as members of COSERV and have met the standards listed below.

Community Organizations (identified as "receiving" organizations) are non-profit, local community organizations concerned with community services to international visitors, and university administered organizations which receive and serve diverse categories of short-term visitors in the absence of an overall community organization, meeting the following standards:

1. Has purpose that is in conformity with the stated objectives of COSERV.
2. Has responsible governing board composed of individuals within the community who have access to those organizations and institutions within the community that represent potential resources for a well-balanced program for visitors.
3. Is in a position to receive visitors without distinction as to race, nationality, or creed.
4. Gives evidence of consultation with major community organizations, of having the confidence and support of such organizations, and conforms to the basic principles of sound coordination.
5. Has a community base for contacts and local operations, personnel necessary for the functioning of the program and the resources essential for sound operation.

National Programming Organizations (identified as "sending" organizations) are national, non-governmental and non-profit, meeting the following standards:

1. Offers the visitors experience that will be significant in their own professional careers.
2. Presents the visitors with a variety of experiences representative of life in the United States.
3. Assures that visitors are adequately covered by health and accident insurance.
4. Assures the fact that the visitors have sufficient resources so that they will not become a financial burden to the local communities.
5. Provides communities with accurate and relevant information, including the overall itineraries, far enough in advance to make possible careful advance planning, and keeps them apprised of changes of plans or pertinent facts concerning the visitor.
6. Screens visitors as to their basic reliability and integrity.
7. Maintains a standard of excellence in programs which it arranges.

As of March 1, 1965, a total of 71 community and 26 national programming organizations were included in the roster of COSERV members. They are listed on the reverse side of this page.

THE GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS INSTITUTE

by Dean B. Mahin
Chief Program Officer, G. A. I.

(This article follows others in the Newsletter series describing national programming agencies that are members of COSERV.)

WASHINGTON, D. C.—The Governmental Affairs Institute, chartered in 1950 as a private, non-profit, professional organization, has undertaken a variety of operational programs and research projects in the broad fields of political science and international affairs.

From the outset, cultural exchange has been one of the primary areas of Institute activity. In fact, the Institute was established as a result of needs arising from U. S. efforts to strengthen the development of democratic ideas and institutions in post-war Germany. After the U. S. Government initiated, on a large scale, visits to the U. S. by German leaders, GAI was set up to arrange their programs and itineraries.

Growth of Responsibility

Over the next several years, as the German program was integrated into the State Department's world-wide Foreign Leader Program, GAI's role was broadened to include responsibility for political leaders, government officials, and journalists invited by the Department from around the world.

Today the Institute is responsible for approximately half of the State Department's leader grantees assigned to a contract agency, and also undertakes projects for foundations and other organizations.

GAI's visitors are policy makers and opinion molders in their home countries. In 1964 GAI assisted almost 600 visitors. Much of GAI's roster of more than 7,000 "alumni" reads like the Statesman's Yearbook. Included are a number of present or former prime ministers and foreign ministers, nearly half of the British and German cabinets, and scores of top officials and other members of the power elite in their homelands. Many already held high positions at the time of their visits, and others later moved into more important positions as the program emphasized young men with promise of greater leadership and influence.

Helped Start COSERV

In its early years the Institute realized that most community visits required the coordinated use of many local resources. GAI strongly encouraged the development of formal or informal community-wide groups to assist visitors. In 1958 GAI provided the interim secretariat for the organization which later became COSERV, and published the first comprehensive directory of local community groups. Today GAI is an active member of COSERV, and its President, H. Philip Mettger, is on the COSERV Executive Committee.

GAI provides each local group with detailed information on the visitor's background, personality, and interests, along with specific programming suggestions, but relies on the community group to decide how its resources can best be used in each case. The Institute thus sees its role as one of partnership with the community groups, working with them toward full effectiveness of an important national program.

GAI's other activities within the broad framework of political science and international affairs include research studies in intergovernmental relations, metropolitan area problems, elections analysis, and overseas manpower, management, and labor problems. Since 1959 the Institute has operated a center in New York to provide information and briefings for American travelers to the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe.

SHORE LEAVE WELCOME STAGED

SAN DIEGO, CALIF.—Walking down the gangplank of the British passenger liner Orsova to the rhythms of, consecutively, "Hail Britannia" and "California Here I Come," 381 round-the-world passengers received a memorable welcome from 184 host families of the San Diego International Visitors Center during a 12-hour stop-over in that city.

San Diego volunteers Mr. and Mrs. W. F. MacDonald (second from left and extreme right) greet their Australian dinner guests at the pier where the S. S. Orsova docked.

Three months of planning went into the massive hosting effort which was masterminded by Mrs. Herbert G. Rudge, a Center volunteer. But until eight days before the ship's arrival, "We didn't know whether to expect 40 or 400 visitors," Mrs. Rudge said.

"Norway has its know the Norwegians program and Finland has its Find the Finns, so why not us?" she asked. "I love my city and I want everyone to know it."

The San Diegans, calling their project "Ambassadors At Home," invited their guests—mostly British—to their homes for dinner and the evening. Elaborate menus were shunned, and although the visitors were due back at their ship within 5 hours, many had time to sandwich in an evening tour of local supermarkets, shops and residential areas which gave them a capsule picture of living conditions in San Diego.

A grateful guest wrote, after the visit, "I do feel, through this thoughtful gesture we have not only enjoyed American hospitality but have made friends with whom we shall correspond and hope to induce to come to Australia and accept our welcome in return."

CONNECTICUT BUREAU WINS PLAUDITS

by Mrs. Chase Going Woodhouse, Director
Service Bureau for Women's Organizations

HARTFORD, CONN.—"In fully cooperating with the University of Connecticut and its Foreign Administrators Training Program, you have provided a vital service to our nation in its foreign policy goals."

With these words, and a commemorative plaque, the Agency for International Development gave official recognition to the contribution of Connecticut's Service Bureau for Women's Organizations supported by the Beatrice Auerbach Foundation. The presentation, made in Hartford last December, saluted cooperation with the University of Connecticut's Institute of Public Service which inaugurated a program in 1961 under contract with A. I. D.

Director of Service Bureau of Women's Organizations, Mrs. Chase Going Woodhouse, accepts plaque for her organization from Agency for International Development representative, James Stockard.

The University sought, in its training efforts, to develop "The Complete Man." As its Program Coordinator explained: "We believe that greater stress must be given to introducing these trainees to our society and our culture instead of concentrating solely on their technical education. A man can return to his country trained in a skill area and hate the United States and all that it represents."

The University Coordinator works out a program for each trainee directed toward his specific needs and his role in the development of his country—a combination of specially devised academic courses and on-the-job training in state and municipal government agencies, public utilities, home office of insurance companies and banks, plus visits to industrial plants.

Equal importance is given to the social and cultural aspects of the program. The Service Bureau, working in close cooperation with the Coordinator, is given complete information on each trainee, his background, role at home, his training program, and personal interests so that a "home hospitality" program can be devised that he will enjoy and that will give him a picture of American family and community life.

Differ on Methods

While agreeing on the goal, the Coordinator and the Service Bureau initially differed as to means. The Coordinator placed the great majority of the first group of trainees as full time dwellers in private homes, providing a modest remuneration for the host family to cover the approximately three months stay.

While assisting in locating such families, the Service Bureau did not approve the plan, pointing out that while the home stay program had proven most effective for young visitors, notably students, the situation for mature trainees, most of them married men accustomed to being head of their own households, was very different. Trainees work under great pressure in a strange environment. There are problems of dietary regulations, unknown social customs, the strain of speaking a foreign language. There is a need to be alone, to choose one's own sleeping and meal hours. All these and other factors may well make it difficult for both the visitor and the host family over a period of several months.

The Service Bureau's fears proved well grounded. Some trainees treated the host family as a boarding house. Others were exhausted and hampered in their work by the overwhelming kindness of the family.

The lesson learned was that "home hospitality" cannot be simply defined as a "home stay." The visitor's work program, personality and wishes all must be considered in determining hospitality that best suits a specific visitor and situation.

A Friend When Needed

Thus, out of experience, the Service Bureau developed an "adoption" system. Trainees in Connecticut live in pleasant apartments for which the University makes the business arrangements. The Service Bureau tries to match each trainee to an "adopting family" where there should be mutual compatibility. This home is always open to the trainee as to a close family friend. He shares their recreation and meets their friends. It is a place to which to bring personal problems. and to bring his friends.

The "adopting families" are selected so as to provide a real cross section of interests. The Service Bureau keeps in touch with each family and, where desirable, supplements their resources with country weekends and invitations with specific contacts in mind.

Success Measured

That the plan is working is evident from the growing number of families who wish "to join," and also by the spontaneously expressed desire of the trainees at the end of their stay to say "Thank you."

A group leaving last Spring, most of whom were Pakistanis, asked the Service Bureau to help with a farewell afternoon social for their host families and their supervisors. They obtained a film on Pakistan, arranged a short program with a spokesman to express their thanks. Over eighty people came to the party and many others sent messages of regret.

The Service Bureau estimates that six hours of staff time go into the preparation of the program for each "adopted" trainee, but can only guess at the hundreds of volunteer and staff hours which go into its implementation. This is a small price to pay for the understanding and friendship of men and women who will play a vital role in the future of their countries.

CONFERENCE IN CANNES

by Gordon Boyce
President, Experiment in Int'l. Living and Member, COSERV Executive Committee

(Mr. Boyce recently returned from Cannes, France, where he attended an international conference of the Council on Student Travel. He reports here on the Workshop on Short-term Programs in the U. S. and Europe. Over 300 conference participants represented national organizations from 25 countries interested in international student travel.)

PUTNEY, VT.—The European-North American Conference on Educational Travel and Exchange Programs in Cannes was an interesting hors d'oeuvre of purposeful travel. It offered a table with something appealing for everyone. Most of it was digestible. The Council on Student Travel, which collected, prepared and presented these international delicacies with a flourish, is to be commended for its shrewd assessment of appetites. Certainly, it demonstrated its courage and competence in conceiving and pulling off a broad-gauged gathering of this nature.

Although the Cannes Conference (surely destined to be known as the Cannes-Con) was far too diverse and is much too recent to permit reliable over-all evaluation, those of us who attended may speak with some degree of confidence on the panels and discussions which we frequented. Of course, none of us could get to all of them.

Advance Briefing Needed

It is perhaps too early, for instance, to determine whether candid U. S. community messages to our European friends struck home and, if so, whether they will have any effect. But no bones were made about the fact that from the U. S. community point of view, arriving students must be better briefed, recognize their responsibilities as guests and do something about it, and not consider community hospitality an inalienable (and inexpensive) right. Indeed, the point was made that the increasing number of European students coming here under the guise of educational travel, equipped with neither motivation, adequate advance programming nor sufficient money, was reaching scandalous proportions.

Even so, we may have been engaging in a dialogue of the deaf; frequently we seemed merely to be cataloguing mutual difficulties. There was also a tendency—as there always is on occasions of this sort—to talk about problems rather than address ourselves to them. And there were, of course, instances when groups became involved in describing how their exchange worked rather than discussing whether it ought to be working that way at all.

Despite this, one had a sense that things were under way. There was a healthy, lively and, I suspect, productive exchange of information—an exchange in which, incidentally, the delegates from Eastern European countries took an active part. There emerged a general appreciation, I think, that there is a growing proliferation of types of travel enterprises, notably in the professional, semi-professional and business areas. Both senders and receivers were exhorted to distinguish among them, adjusting expectations accordingly. The deliberations likewise evoked an awareness, if not a consensus, that there is ample room for more organizations (rather than less) in this field and that each of us should stick to his own muttons, not endeavoring hastily to take on program responsibility for something he is really neither equipped nor experienced to handle.

Travel in U. S. Expensive

Then there is the other side of the coin. Europeans have been withstanding the American student horde for years. Not only have they become inured to it, they cope with it. Thus, it was only with a slight tongue-in-cheek that they referred to America as an "underdeveloped country" as far as our ability to handle equivalent numbers of foreign students is concerned. It was pointed out, and with some validity, that unlike most of the major European cities, few of our metropolitan centers have adequate facilities for meeting the needs of the foreign student traveler. Sympathetic though they may be to our problem—some even understand it—they abjure the failure of a country as farseeing as ours to provide sufficient low-cost living accommodations in keeping with the pace of the time.

Tidal Wave to Continue

One thing became abundantly clear at Cannes. We will see no abatement in this tide. Foreign students, and especially Europeans, are going to continue to come to our shores, and in ever increasing numbers. There will be no dissuading them. There is no turning them off. If we are going to continue to serve them, it is incumbent upon us to employ all possible means to grapple with, perhaps confine, a problem which is destined to reach even greater proportions before we discover its solution.

NATION-WIDE SURVEY LAUNCHED

WASHINGTON, D. C.—The U. S. Advisory Commission on International Educational and Cultural Affairs is undertaking a nation-wide survey to measure the extent and nature of organized volunteer services which support international exchange and training programs. COSERV and other national organizations were consulted in the planning of the survey. The results will probably constitute a special report of the Commission to Congress and the public. The facts are being sought through questionnaires currently being mailed to approximately 300-500 communities in every state and Puerto Rico. In addition, six communities, each representing a major geographic area of the country, will be visited to study in greater depth community involvement in foreign visitor programs.

HELP WANTED: MEN

by J. Lester Shaffer
Member of COSERV Executive Committee

(Mr. Shaffer, an experienced volunteer, was asked to comment on recruitment of men for volunteer service.)

PHOENIX, ARIZ.—After fifteen years of service in arranging local programs for short-term visitors, we are convinced that one of the most important elements in successful programming is the involvement of many male volunteers. This has become particularly apparent to us since the arrival of visitors from the Middle East, Africa, and Latin America.

Our first step in involving male volunteers in our efforts was to make any family unacceptable for hosting, except in special situations, if the male member of the family was not in complete agreement with the program or was not enthusiastic about the program. In order to emphasize this, our covering letter of application to host families read something like this: "Enclosed is a questionnaire, one copy to be filled out by you and one copy to be filled out by your wife. Two completed questionnaires are requested so that we can more effectively match hosts with guests. If you are interested in helping us, please complete both forms and return them to us." We found that in about 80% of the cases both forms were completed and returned. When only the wife's form was returned, we rejected the application for host family situations; we frequently accepted it, however, for daytime driving or for some other phase of the program.

Our main challenge was to recruit more male participation for daytime driving chores. We therefore concentrated on recruiting through: (1) Service clubs such as Rotary, Kiwanis, Lions. (2) Special interest groups, ethnic groups, and retirement villages. (3) Newspaper articles about the program publicizing the fact that men interested in the exchange of people program were needed for daytime service, inserting in the articles the telephone and address contact.

Through these channels we were able to recruit men who were either retired or semi-retired, business men who because of the nature of their business could devote time during the day to the program, and men interested in specific areas who were willing to devote time because of their special interest.

Now we have almost as many men volunteers as women for daytime driving. We prefer to use male volunteers for the professional aspects of visitors' programs because men seem to be much better informed on specific professional programs.

We hope that this information will be useful to communities who need men to participate in their programs during the daytime. Many predominantly male groups will leap at the opportunity to participate in community services to international visitors because the work is interesting and ever-changing.

OTHER PLACES, OTHER IDEAS

(from January 1965 Newsletter of International Hospitality Center of Chicago)

CHICAGO, ILL.—ANOTHER FORWARD STEP: On January 21st, the first step was taken toward building a Women's Committee for the Hospitality Center. It is obvious that many projects have been left undone because the staff simply does not have time to launch them and carry them through. With an active women's group, and with committees within the committee, it will be possible to do many stimulating and interesting things, e.g. arranging informal gatherings so that new members can meet old members; setting up more training courses for new drivers; planning and implementing discussion groups to further understanding of the Center's program, our own country and the back-grounds of our guests. When a benefit is in the offing, we will have a tightly knit group that has worked together on various projects and can easily turn to whatever is at hand. We hope for all this and Heaven too from this committee and know that it will add greatly to our prestige and accomplishments.

WHAT SCHOOL NEXT FALL?

by Elizabeth Henry

Last Fall, 1964, the Americus School Board totally desegregated the white schools. Fortunately none of the various "grade-a-year" plans were established.

However only four students could be found la last fall, all juniors in high school, who would be the first to make this move. The three students who now attend Americus High have shown that they have survived the school term, although there have been a few rough times from the white students. They feel that they are receiving a much better education in less croweded classrooms and in a much better equipped school. The wider range of courses and stiffer requirements prepare them for better college educations.

What do you as aparent plan to do about your child's education next Fall? If you live on the "Seaboard side" and have elementary school children, had you thought about sending them to Furlow School? Why should your children walk across town when the closer school has superior facilities? By integrating the schools in the lower grades, the attitudes of young white children can more easily be changed.

This week, consider transferring your child, or if you are in high school, think about it and go down to the Superintendent's office in the Health Department building. There may be a deadline, so think about it and then DO SOMETHING ABOUT IT!

FIRST AID COURSE INTEGRATED

At Sumter High School recently, two white women were among those attending First Aid Classes. One of the two received both Basic and Advanced certificates, although the Americus TIMES-RECORDER Made no mention of the fact in a story.

An Instructor's Course in First Aid will be held in May at the Health Department. About fifteen of those taking the Sumter Courses have applied for the Instructor's Course, which will also be integrated.

IMPORTANT SCHOOL MEETING

Monday night, April 19, at 8:00 p.m. there will be an important meeting to discuss the issue of transferring children to formerly all-white schools. The schools have been officially desegregated since last fall, but many parents are not aware that they cann send children of all ages to these superior schools.

If you are a parent or student interested in this issue, or want to form a committee to inform others about transferring, be sure and come to the meeting which will be held in the chapel in Barnum's Funeral Home Monday night.

MOULTRIE NEGROES FORCED FROM COURT

by Herman Kitchens, Moultrie SNCC.

On April 5th, at 10:00 a.m. the Colquitt County Superior Court was opened by district judge George Lillie. He told the Colquitt County Sherriff D.H. Alderman to make seats for the jurymen who didn't have seats, referring to some thirty or forty white people standing along the walls without seats. The sheriff came over to where several of us were sitting and said to one, "Get up boy, damn it".

Haulking todl the sheriff that he had a subpoena to appear in court and that he had a right to a seat. The sheriff then dragged him from his seat, shoved him down the aisle and into the hall. The same was done to West and me.

After this he went back into the courtroom and made all the Negroes sitting in the rear leave until all the whites were seated. Ten Negroes were then readmitted to the room.

I was out in the hall looking through the window trying to see what was happening inside. The sheriff came over and pushed me against the wall, bumped my head against it and said, "I'm tired of your darn goadbeard self trying to run everything around here!"

SCHOOL TRANSFERS

....Personal opinion by S. Mahone

Starting next Fall school term the city and county boards of education are going to juggle Negro high school students from one school system to another. Although not official as yet, it is expected that all students attending Sumter High School and living in the city will have to attend Staley Junior High School which will be converted to a full hgih school. The county students will remain at Sumter High.

The Board of Education has already made plans and has started adding additions to Staley to make it "bigger and better." The problem remains, however, that Staley is not accredited and probably will not be for about three years.

I feel that this agreement between the City and County boards is in effect creating a "separate but equal" school system instead of building one good high school to accomodate both Negro and white students.

In 1954 the idea of "separate but equal" was declared unconstitutional. Ten years later the Civil Rights Bill in essence stated the same thing. But the Boards of Education continue with this.

It seems to me that you as parents should decide right now whether or not you want your child to have a first class education so he can compete with others when he finishes high school. Why send your children to an unaccredited hgih school when he can go to Americus High next Fall? Why deprive your child of what is rightfully his by sending him back to a segregated, inadequate school?

SCHOOL DROPOUTS

by Inez Leverette

Why do students drop out of school? There are several reasons, but I will discuss only the two I feel are chiefly responsible.

Some dropouts are caused by problems existing in the home. Sometimes this seems to be a necessity for financial reasons and they feel they must get a job to help support the family. This is a family problem which must be solved by the family and the parents should take the greatest role in solving it. Interest must be maintained in education for the child's future. Some arrangements can usually be made, such as part-time jobs for all the children, because a high school dropout has a very poor chance of ever acquiring a decent standard of living. A dollar and hour may seem good pay for a young person who drops out, but remember that he will probably never get much more during his whole lifetime.

Loss of interest is another reason for dropouts. When a student is given several courses which do not interest him, he gets bored and perhaps quits. Part of the problem could be with the student himself, but I do feel that a student should have more choice in selecting his courses. I'm sure a student would do better in courses that he himself had chosen. Naturally, a student must take some required courses, but this is primarily a problem to be solved in the school. The parents can be helpful in keeping the student interested by being interested in his work themselves.

FREEDOM WEEK IN AMERICUS

April 4 to April 9 was Freedom Week in Americus. A group of local students got together after school and began picketing and canvassing last Monday to encourage more people to register to vote.

Monday throughThrusday was devoted to picketing in residentioal areas but Friday and Saturday the action was downtown.

Students from Moultrie in town for the second S.W. Georgia Student Union meeting helped picket on Friday.

Harassment was slight by whites who cursed and harrassed some of the students on the picket line.

Don't let these students down. The whole nation is encouraging you. Register to Vote----NOW! Freedom is up to you.

NEGRO WORSHIPPER TURNED BACK

by Lena Turner

On April third I attempted to worship at the First Methodist Church on South Lee St. Upon arrival I was stopped outside by some of the Male members of the church who were conversing on the steps. One stated, "You can't go in there." He paused for a moemnt, then added, "The people are worshipping peacefully in there; if you enter there will be a disturbance."

I asked why I could not enter and was told that "Americus just isn't ready for anything like this yet."

During this time other male onlookers formed a line on the steps as a barrier to halt me if I made further attempts to enter. I turned away deeply hurt to think that this is Americus, our city, where segregation is enforced in a place where He teaches, "Love ye one another," and "As you do to the least of these your brethren, you have done also to me."

Possibly there are people who upon reading this article may say, "She didn't really want to worship; she was only seeking publicity." This is not true, and if only the members of the church will fight with me, we can make our city a place of peace and human equality.

FREEDOM SCHOOL WORKSHOP

by Elizabeth Henry

A beautiful Knoxville home, enthusiastic SNCC staff, and good ideas all contributed to a very successful workshop on Freedom Schools. The location was Highlander Center in Tennessee and lasted from March27 to April 7.

High school students, SNCC staff, and two women from the states of Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Arkansas, were present.

Much of the time was spent intensively discussing economic, social, and political forces in our communities and the federal government's role also. We discussed how people of the lower economic levels must be given a voice in changes that occur, and that the usual conception of who is qualified to be active in government does not need to be only those of education and money.

We discussed what Freedom Schools can offer that is lacking in Negro schools and can be effective in developing local leadership.

Sessions were held on practical matters also, such as literacy teaching and the use of tape recorders in teaching.

Women interested in our nursery problem (See column two) are asked to contact Elizabeth Henry at 924-6828. A committee has been formed already and your ideas and help are needed.

RIGHTS TO THE TREE OF LIFE

by Bonnie Floyd

On Easter morning Christ rose from the dead,
Christ died for our sins,
As many have died for our rights.

Jesus Christ gave His life for you and me.
And He shed his precious blood that we may Live and have rights to the Tree of Life.

Here in this time, people have been scorned, harassed and killed.
As we strive hard for rights among men,
Let's shut out resentment, self-pity, and Hate toward the offenders and prove
That Sacrifice is not in vain.

Of all the trials and tribulations,
We have gone through,
As Jesus said during his Resurrection,
"Forgive them, for they know not what They do."

Be ye not afraid, for we shall overcome.

NEED FOR NURSERIES

Would any woman in the Negro community of Americus deny that they have practically no place to put their pre-school age children during the day except with a friend or relative?

The Sumter County Youth Center has one fine nursery for forty children, but it obviously cannot take care of the hundreds of children in the city and county who have mothers working during the day.

There are two kindergartens in the Negro community which educate sixty or seventy children for the first grade in the Fall, and enable mothers to have a place for their children to go for half a day. What happens to the child the other half day while the mother is working?

We need nurseries for several important reasons:

1) Children can learn a great deal from being in a group situation with children to play with, interesting games and other organized activities. It is an important experience to their lives and is preparation for school.

2) Many mothers cannot afford to pay the fee of the existing nursery and kindergartens, so inexpensive nurseries, informal as they may be, need to be formed, and the mothers paying what they can afford.

3) Manywomen cannot work, or must work only part time because they can find no reliable pladce to put their children.

4) New nurseries would provide employmentopportunities for more women.

JOB OPPORTUNITIES

If you desire to serve on the Americus Police Force, see a need for Negro policemne on the force and can meet these qualifications you should consider applying. You must be at least 25 years old, weigh at least 150 lbs. with a height of over 5'7" and have a high school education. Albany has been hiring Negro policemen for some time now; it's time Americus started.

We have heard there are openings at Phillips Industries. Apply at the Georgia State Employment Service.

YOUTH CENTER PROGRAMS

Monday, April 19, at 7:30 at the Youth Center a "Post-Easter Parade Dance" will be held for all students. Attire will be your Easter outfit.

April 21 will be the big Roller Skating Derby . Sign up with Mr. Church in the office.

Little League baseball for 8-12 year olds and Pony League baseball for 13=14 year old boys will be held at McCoy Hill after school, starting April 20.

The Teen Society will have its third meeting April 27th to plan a social for graduating seniors. This active group has 32 members and plans recreation, games, and dances for the youth center. Bobby Kaigler is President and Milton Gooch is Vice-president. Both urge new members to join.

The Youth Center now has seventy-six members. all of whom are entitled to discounts on dances, a free monthly dance for members, preferences on equipment, and can get into any sponsored event free.

FREEDOM NIGHT PROGRAM

by Annie Ruth Brown

To climax Freedom Week there was a student Freedom night program on Friday, April 9. The most distinguished guest speaker was Miss Nancy Cooper of Atlanta, who plans to work in Southwest Georgia this summer.

The Program was enjoyed by all who attended, especially the latter portion, a dramatization of "Nobody knows the trouble I've Seen".

We were proud of our guests and fellow workers who participated in the activiteis.

We plan to have more activities centered around the problems that confront our progressing city and county. It is the duty of each of us to see that the problems are discussed and given immediate attention.

News From Sumter High

....by Lue Eddie Baldwin

The Juniors and Seniors are very excited about the Prom to be held at Sumter High on May 7.

The baseball team captured their first victory by defeating Monroe High of Albany by a score of 9-1. Their second game was also at home against J.W. Holley High of Sylvester.

The Sumter High family was very proud to have one of our former faculty members Mrs. B.L. Griggs visit us Monday. She is now living in Macon.

The Junior class and the Dramatics Guild are preparing their plays to be presented later in May.

REDBIRDS

At lunch the other day, a colleague noted that the sugar packets at the restaurant all bore two-color pictures of birds, red and black. Among them were the Redwing Blackbird, Rosy-Breasted Grosbeak, Red-headed Woodpecker, Redhead Duck and American Redstart.

"What gives," asked my friend? "Is this a Communist restaurant? All the birds have to be red?

"Look at the other side," I suggested. There was the seal of the company, also in red and black. "It costs extra money," I explained, "to use additional colors. Conspiracy it ain't. Economy it is."

Down the drain went a promising new John Birch Society crusade.

MONTGOMERY -- HOPE AND HATE

A dozen years ago, when I worked for the Voice of America, I flew from Frankfurt to Berlin at a time when the Russians were buzzing many commercial flights. We were not reassured when the pilot cheerily said to us over the intercom, "Let us hope that we have an uneventful flight." After landing safely in West Berlin, I went to the headquarters of the Investigating League of Freedom-Loving Jurists, whose chairman had been kidnapped a few days earlier by Communist agents. The place was swarming with guards cradling sub-machine guns.

I have never been in as tense an atmosphere since, until I came to Montgomery for Martin Luther King's epochal march. True, the most dangerous part of the march -- the trek through dismal, swamp-filled, bitterly segregationist Lowndes County -- was over. When 30,000 black and white Americans paraded from St. Jude's Catholic Center through the poorly-paved Negro section of Montgomery, we were hailed as a peaceful army of liberation by clapping and waving men, women and children. But when we crossed the invisible line into white Montgomery visages were grim, tongues foul and "invitations" to get out of the line of march and fight frequent. The only American flags we saw were those the marchers brought with them. Even the federalized Alabama National Guards had Confederate flags sewn on their uniforms.

AMERICAN FLAG

Why doesn't the John Birch Society launch a campaign to place an American flag atop the Alabama State Capitol in Montgomery, instead of the flag of the Confederacy now flying there?

BUILDING BROTHERHOOD

Two quiet, middle-aged English spinsters have just received Israel's official thanks for smuggling 29 Jews out of Hitler, Germany. The sisters, Louise and Ida Cook, made repeated trips to Germany and Austria in the guise of rich and eccentric opera lovers. But, in addition to attending operas, they transferred documents, arranged passage and smuggled out valuables.

Walter Steifel, now a lecturer in modern literature at Manchester University, was one of those rescued by the Cooks. He described their exploits as "right out of James Bond. They got away with it because they just didn't look the type. Every time they entered Germany there was a chain reaction over the underground grapevine. Finally some English friends directed the sisters to my mother and me."

At the same time, in the industrial city of Villeurbanne, France, the 110,000 residents are proud of the new synagogue built for the handful of Jews living there. The synagogue was designed by a Roman Catholic architect and built and paid for by Christian volunteers -- German youths -- to atone for their fathers' guilt. The group, Action Atonement, was created in 1958 by a Protestant clergyman, Dr. Lothar Kreyssig, and has built such projects as a children's home in the Netherlands, irrigation works in Greece, a mental hospital in Norway and a brotherhood church in France.

THE BEATLES

Beatle music is being used by "psycho-politicians," charges the ultra-rightist Christian Crusade in its pamphlet, Communism, Hypnotism and the Beatles, "to hypnotize American youth and prepare them for submission to subversive control."

Yeah, Yeah, Yeah.

SUBVERSIVE POETRY

Trying to prove that South Africa, Alabama and Mississippi have no monopoly on racism, Rhodesia has just arrested the Rev. Lester Keith Weiner, an American missionary of the United Church of Christ, for writing a subversive document. The words of his subversive sonnet follow:

Why must man suffer at another's hand
Police dogs (well trained to hate the smell of black;
The dispossessed, the people of the land)
By nature gifted, swift and gentle on the track
Of wayward lambs who trust their guiding bark,
As does that sightless man, who at one's leathered neck
Finds light and peace within a world of dark?
Good God, Creator, why must men so wreck
The image of they goodness planted there
Instinctively within a beast so wise?
Why must man warp and twist and tear
The nature of both men and dog with lies?
May man yet taste and know this bitter gall:
Perverting one is thus perverting all.

RESEARCH

A group of social scientists did a study recently to discover the relationship between what Vassar and Princeton graduates were doing ten years after leaving college and what their major field of study at college had been. Among the information gathered was the fact that the Vassar graduates had 1.7 children and Princeton men, 2.4 children.

The scientists asked a colleague of mine, Ed Lukas, how he would explain this disparity. "Simple," replied Ed. "First, Vassar girls don't marry Princeton men. And second, men have more children than women."

SCHOOL TRANSFERS THIS WEEK

by Elizabeth Henry

This coming week, May 17 to 21, the School Board has designated as the period to transfer schools. On Friday, children received transfer forms from the school they are now attending, and brought them home to be filled out by parents. When parents and children decide what school they feel would be best to enroll in, the form is then returned to the school principal at the child's own school.

The "freedom of choice" system means that you can go to any school you wish. If you feel that Furlow is best because it is closer, than that is your privilege, and to your advantage to take this opportunity for your children. If you are sick and tired of the conditons at Sumter, and believe even Staley (a newly accredited high school) cannot meet up to the advantages of Americus High (in one summer!?) then you are free to enroll there.

City high school students now attending Sumter may remain there, or may change to Staley or Americus High. County students can go to any white county school or Negro county school, and apply the same week.

Give your child a break for a first class education and send him to the best school that Americus has to offer for your age child.

DEMOCRATIC CLUB SELECTS STREET CAPTAINS

Six women volunteered at the meeting Monday night, May 10, of the New Democratic Voters Club, following a suggestion for some kind of definite plan to be launched to register voters. The streets these women will cover to canvass to register to vote are McCoy, Jefferson, Academy, Dismuke, Jackson, Wild, and also the Projects, and "Seaboard Side."

One person urged all people who go down to the court house to take a witness with them in case of discrimination against their right to vote. It can then be reported to the Justice Department, and action will be taken aginst local registrars.

MEETINGS FOR PLANNING NURSERIES

Monday night, May 24, will be the first meeting for interested persons in the community who desire to plan the organization of several nursery schools for the summer. Liz Henry, 532 E. Jefferson St.(924-6828) will be host. Those who have time to volunteer for part-time work in nurseries this summer are urged to attend, especially.

These nurseries will not conflict with the Head-Start Program nurseries, which are for five-year-olds only. These nurseries could serve the 2, 3, and 4 year old children of working mothers, primarily.

ENROLLING FIRST GRADERS FOR FALL

Parents of entering first graders must go to the school of their choice next week, from 8:30 to 3:00, to enroll their child. The child does not need to be present. You must take the child's birth certificate.

You will be given a health card which must be filled out with required shots by fall.

NAACP SELECTS NEW OFFICERS

Monday evening at 9:00 the newly formed NAACP, following the monthly Democratic Voters Club, selected officers for the year. President is Rev. Paul Jones; Vice-president is Rev. Campbell; Secretary is Miss Lelia Barlowe, Treasurer is Mr. Sam Weston. Membership cards were distributed reflecting a membership of over 100.

THE CHARITY SHOP

Clothing for families and individuals of definite need, is available in the Sumter County Youth Center Charity Shop under the direction of Mrs. Pascal. The shop is open every week day from 4:00 to 7:30, but not on weekends.

Clothing comes from all over the country the National Sharecroppers Association. Persons in need from both the city and county are welcome to come.

CONGRATULATIONS SENIORS!

ECHOS OF INEQUALITY

By Elma Broner

There are many factors that lead to the creation of frustration.

The two main or vital factors that lead to form or prepare the foundation for frustration are poverty and inferiority.

As one observes the city of Americus, focusing on the black community, the shadow of a vast amount of frustration has infiltrated upon the faces of every black American living here in this city.

Due to the fact that the lack of physical elements are not elgible to the Negro, he begins to worry about how he will take care of his family.

How will he obtain food for his hungry family, where will he get money to pay his rent? He has shut-off notices for the electricity and water.

The kids have to stay out of school because they have no shoes and proper clothes.

How can a man support his family properly on $30.00 a week? He'll always be knowing he will never have any chance for improvements or promotions.

Do you want your children to fall in the same pit-fall you are in?

Your child is counting on you; he deserves to have a better chance. Let him get out of the slums and ghettos.

Enroll them in a school where they will have the chance to grow up and live decently, with a decent education.

"The future of your child is now at stake, it is up to you whether or not he'll stand or fall."

"Education is the key to the future."

HOW I FEEL ABOUT JOBS, by

Mrs. Rosa B. Thomas

I feel that it is unfair to the people in this community. We have to work for such small salaries, and the cost of living is so high. I think we should get better pay for our work. I think any worker should get the minimum wages for his work.

Some of these factories discriminate, such as the Brass and Pin Co., and several other places. Also cooks are discriminated against.

I suggest equal opportunities should be provided for workers in this community.

ATTENTION:

DON'T GET DRUNK, IN A FIGHT, AND GET PUT IN JAIL, AND THEN HAVE TO PAY THAT MONSTROUS FINE MONDAY MORNING TO THE CITY!! DON'T LET THE CITY KEEP TAKING YOUR MONEY, KEEP IT FOR YOUR OWN NEEDS.

YOUTH AND EDUCATION

By Major Wise

Millinos of Americans, boys and girls, young men and women, are about to end a year of their education in the schools, colleges, and universities of the nation.

Some of these students have been seriously impressed with the troubles that beset the world. Others have reached the conclusion that there are more important things in their lives than the pursuit of education.

The young people will do well to make their plans to continue the development of their personalities by seeking to acquire more knowledge. After all, character-building is largely the work of youth. By the time the average man or woman reaches maturity, principles have been accepted which later influence the activities of life.

I trust that students, now wondering whether to continue their scholastic work, will not lose interest in their studies under the false impression that they are not important. Proper preparation for life itself is the most serious business that can confront youth.

JOIN THE VOICE STAFF THIS SUMMER

Applications are now being taken for persons who wish to work on the Voice of Americus this summer. Students who are out of school this summer should consider this opportunity to learn newspaper work, and they will find it also an enjoyable way of spending their vacation time. Adults are urged to volunteer to write for the paper, for it serves primarily an adult audience, and they should express their opinions.

Call Liz Henry at 924-6828.

YOUTH CENTER LIBRARIAN NEEDED

If you enjoy working with books, helping students find books for their classes, and working with children, you might enjoy being Librarian of the Youth Center Library. Elizabeth Henry set up the library, with assistance, this year, but plans to have a local woman take over operation of the library by early June.

The library is for the citizens of Americus and they should take advantage of this opportunity to run a library.

This library is an important addition to the community because it provides students and adults with a fine collection of books to help them in their studies. It has encouraged more young people to read, especially children, and hopefully has made their education more meaningful.

Any woman who sees the importance of this library continuing for these students, please call Liz Henry at 924-6828. This person should have free time after school hours, and for several hours each day during the afternoons in the summer.

In recent school transfer periods, Albany had 200 students sign up to change to white schools, and most of them were elementary.

Moultrie, follwoing the school boycott, had 30 elementary and 40 high school students transfer to white schools.

OUT-OF-STATE FIELD JOBS AVAILABLE

Do you need a job very much, and desire to leave the state to find a good job? Apply for harvesting cucumbers in Missouri for three months, or for cutting sugar cane in Florida for six months.

Formerly jobs such as these were given to Mexicans, and they were hired for cheap labor. Now the government does not allow the Mexicans to come in, so these jobs are open at standard wages to Americans.

$36 per week has been guaranteed at both locations, with workers in Florida receiving $1.15 per hour, and those in Missouri receiving $1.25 per hour.

The federal government has guaranteed the jobs to be satisfactory, so troubles that occurred with unfair conditions will no longer prevail. The housing has been inspected. Housing at the locations will be free, and so will round trip transportation. If a person leaves before the season is over he will lose his free return transportation.

For this excellents opportunity, contact Rev. Campbell at 924-5972. There will be a meeting Thursday, May 20, for persons interested.

MANHATTAN's HAS JOB OPENINGS NOW

The Manhattan Shirt Factory is now hiring women for the work on sewing machines. Take advantage of this fine offer and good pay by going in person to the factory, and taking th qualifying test.

TECHNICAL AND VOCATIONAL SCHOOL APPLICATIONS

Persons desiring to enroll for the coming year in the Georgia Technical and Vocational Training School in Americus may apply now at the school through the principal, Mr. Odom. It is understood that applications are now being taken without regard to race.

Young people who have already applied at the school say they first file an application form, get an appointment for an interview, and later take an aptitude test.

SUMMER FREEDOM SCHOOLS

Students and adults can look forward to Freedom schools beginning about mid-June, with local SNCC staff and volunteers, and hopefully other college students in Americus directing the informal classes. The interest group areas will vary from Negro history to government, from literature, to religion, music, art, and creative dramatics. Literacy will possibly be an additional subject taught adults.

In Freedom Schools, participation and discussion is more important than learning facts.

Contact Liz Henry, 4-6828, for more info.

THE GREAT CONFLICT

by Mary Beatrice Williams

I just would like to take a few minutes of your time to tell you about a dramatic story of Negroes in a book called Worth Fighting For, by Agnes McCarthy and Lawrence Reddick. This book gives a brief history of Negroes in the United States during the Civl War and the Reconstruction Period. Did you know...that in about 200 major engagements, 3,600 Negro soldiers gave their lives for our country. Negroes in the 1800's believed that war was a war of freedom. Negroes were some of the first to volunteer to enter the Civil War, but no Negroes were wanted. Later many entered the war. This book gives you an hour by hour account of how Negroes were treated after they received their freedom following the Civil War. Some of our famous Negroes such as Nat Turner, Harriet Tubman, and Frederick Douglass are mentioned in the story.

If you want to read this book it is at the Youth Cneter Library, where someone is always there to welcome you.

MAY RECREATION AT THE CENTER

The grand highlight for May at the Sumter County Youth Center will be a Variety Show May 26 at 8:00 p.m. A newly formed local band will perform. Guests from Vienna Industrial High have been invited.

Talent is divided into the Junior age and Senior age. Apply with Mr. Church, the director, if you desire to participate. They are looking especially for unusual talents, such as juggling, poetry reading, comedy, or modeling.

The Teen Society is planning to have a social the evening of graduation, June 2

THREE GREEK TRAGEDIES

The first Greed tragedies ever to be performed in Americus will be under the direction of Mr. Church, May 24 and 25 at 8:00 p.m. The Sumter High School Dramatics Guild will perform "The House of Atreus" for a full evening's entertainment consisting of three one-act Greek tragedies. They are "Hecuba," "Agamemnon," and "Elektra."

Lead roles will be played by Lonna Cleveland, Edmond Thomas, and Annie Lou Whitehead. Secondary leading roles will be June Moore, Evelyn Smith, Constell Walton, Willy Boyington, Robert Schley, Lee Ann Mitchell, and Delores Harris.

The costumes will be patterned after the authentic Greek designs, and will be colorful and exquisite.

Admission will be 25¢ and 50¢. The location will be a local school to be announced.

NEWS AROUND SUMTER HIGH

by Lue Eddie Baldwin

The students and faculty members of Sumter High are still sharing excitement from the Junior-Senior Prom. The title, "Shangri-La" was very fitting for the Japanese styled prom. Music was rendered by Tom Rivers and the Nightengales.

The Seniors are trying to calm down for final examinations May 17 and 18. After exams they will prepare for Class Night June 4, Baccalaureate June 6, and Commencement June 7.

Many activities have been given and planned for the end of school The Junior Class presented a three act play May 14. Other activities include a Greek tragedy May 24 and 25, and the Choral Recital May 21.

JAMES W. SILVER DISCUSSES
MISSISSIPPI: THE CLOSED SOCIETY
IN NEW BOOK TO APPEAR JUNE 22

James W. Silver, Professor at the University of Mississippi, former President of the Southern Historical Association, author, and editor, has written a book about an insurrection in modern America, and its social and historical background, MISSISSIPPI: THE CLOSED SOCIETY, which will be published June 22 by Harcourt, Brace & World.

Professor Silver, who witnessed the night of riot on the University of Mississippi campus when U.S. marshals were sent there to protect James H. Meredith, the first known Negro to attend Ole Miss, has divided his book into two parts. In the first part, he describes how the state's commitment to the doctrine of white supremacy has led to its present mood of intransigence and violence.

In the second half of the book, "Some Letters from the Closed Society," he reproduces a series of his letters to friends, family, and critics, in the days and weeks after the insurrection.

Born in Rochester, New York, in 1907, James Wesley Silver has lived in the South since he was twelve years old. He has been on the faculty of the University of Mississippi since 1936. He is married to the former Margaret Thompson of Montgomery, Alabama, and they have three children. The Silvers have lived in Oxford, Mississippi for many years, where the late William Faulkner was among their close friends.

STATEMENT BY SNCC CHAIRMAN-JOHN LEWIS CONCERNING THE PASSAGE OF THE GENOCIDE BILL IN MISSISSIPPI

Americans view with horror the Nazi extermination of the Jews. We comfort ourselves that such things can never happen here. Yet, right now the State of Mississippi is preparing legislation which would exterminate the Negro people.

A month ago the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee called to the attention ofthe nation the Genocide Bill about to be passed by the State Legislature of Mississippi. Here is what happened.

On March 11, the Mississippi House passed a bill making the birth of a second illegitimate child a felony punishable by sterilization or imprisonment.

On April 15, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee published a pamphlet titled "Genocide in Mississippi", charging that the sterilization bill is an attempt by the State of Mississippi either to destroy the Negro people or to drive them from the state.

On May 12, the Judiciary Committee of the Mississippi Senate amended the House bill to remove the sterilization clause and to reduce the possible prison sentences from a maximum of five years to a maximum of six months.

State Senator E.K. Collins told the Senate that the amendments had done away with,"All the bad features that shocked the country." The Jackson Clarion-Ledger stated, "Some civil rights groups charged the state with trying to foster a policy designed to wipe out its Negro population.

The bill, as amended, failed to pass the Senate by a vote of 26 to 22. On May 13, supporters of the bill prepared for a second round by distributing mimeographed copies of the SNCC pamphlet, "Genocide in Mississippi", to all members of the Senate and House. Supporters felt that they could sway votes by demonstrating that SNCC opposed the bill. The Memphis Commercial Appeal stated, "Legislators were unwilling to permit their action to be considered as being influnced by the Negro civil rights group." Supporters of the bill were successful. The amended bill was called up for reconsideration and passed by a vote of 30 to 16. Ten senators who had previously voted against the bill, voted for it on reconsideration. Three who had previously voted against the bill, now abstained.

Because it was amended, the bill now goes back to the House for reconsideration. The House, as it did before, can insist on a penalty of sterilization or maximum prison term of five years.

If Negroes in Mississippi were permitted to register in large numbers and then vote, this bill would never have been considered. Instead, an all-white legislature dominated by the White Citizens' Councils, is in the process of legalizing Genocide against the Negro people.

Negroes comprise 40 percent of the state population, and in the Delta counties nearly two-thirds of the population.

The whites who control Mississippi politics and economics can no longer dictate to Negroes as in former years. Negroes all over the state are organizing through the Council of Federated Organizations, which SNCC supports, to register to vote, to obtain food and clothing, to improve their education, to participate in the political institutions of the State. Right now there are three candidates for Congress and one for the Senate. The Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party will challenge the seating of the regular Racist Democratic Party at the Democratic National Convention.

For Negroes to assert their Constitutional rights is a direct threat to the Mississippi Way of Life. The Mississippi regular Democratic Party, which controls the state, is attempting to defend that Way of Life with the Genocide Bill.

This is why it is imperative to fight for a strong Civil Rights Bill in Congress and free, representative Government in Mississippi.

UNION BACKS RIGHT OF FCC TO REGULATE TV COMMERCIALS

The American Civil Liberties Union said on May 3 that the United States Senate should reject a bill passed by the House of Representatives which would bar the Federal Communications Commission from regulating TV commercials.

The civil liberties organization, in a statement adopted by its Board of Directors, took sharp issue with a bill approved by the House recently by a 317 to 43 vote. Passage of the bill, which would prohibit the FCC from regulating the length or frequency of TV commercials, caused the FCC to drop its hearings on such commercials. The House bill is now before the Senate Commerce Committee.

The ACLU Board statement emphasized that since the FCC was empowered under the 1934 communications law to regulate the broadcasting industry so as to assure that stations operate in the public interest, "anything which might interfere with serving the public interest is potentially a civil liberties problem. Over-commercialization can constitute such a problem."

The ACLU noted that if commercials were to occupy, in one form or another, the major part of a station's programming schedule, they could have a definite effect on the obligation of stations to broadcast in the public interest, since they would take time away from non-commercial programming. Diversity on the air, an extension of the First Amendment's principle of the fullest public discussion of social issues, would thus be limited, the Union's statement said.

The civil liberties group regarded as unjustified the oft-expressed fear of broadcasters that FCC regulation of TV commercials would impinge on their rights of free speech, a fear repeatedly cited in the House debate on the bill.

The ACLU said that nothing the FCC planned to do in the TV commercial field intruded on the First Amendment. "The FCC was not considering dictating the content of any commercial; it was merely proposing to limit the volume of advertising as the broadcasters themselves suggest in their own industry code," the ACLU declared, adding that this is in line with the FCC's other efforts to insure balanced programming, fairness and diversity.

KENNEDY URGED TO GIVE OPEN PLEDGE ENDING MAIL SURVEILLANCE

The American Civil Liberties Union has asked Attorney General Robert Kennedy to make a public pledge that mail checks, "a shocking invasion of privacy," will be discontinued by the federal government. This type of surveillance -- admittedly practiced against some 750 persons per day -- consists of recording all information on the outside of letters. The practice came to light recently with the protest of attorney Thomas J. Bolan that his mail and that of his client, Roy Cohn, was being "covered" in this way. Cohn was being tried for perjury before a grand jury and seeking to obstruct justice. The case ended in a mistrial.

The letter to the Attorney General, signed by executive director John de J. Pemberton, Jr., stated that the public is entitled to this open pledge "to ease public distress and anxiety."

The ACLU letter said that the pledge was needed to calm public concern that the thoughts, ideas and opinions of citizens are being inspected by the government "-- a censorship practice associated with totalitarian governments --..." It also endorsed the statement of the New York Civil Liberties Union of March 4 which stated: "The check is an invasion of the right of privacy and an unwarranted interference with the right to use the mails. Surveillance of mail sent to the attorney of an accused, such as the check ordered by the U.S. Attorney's office of mail directed to Roy Cohn's attorney, is denounced not only for the reasons outlined but because it is also an interference with one's right to counsel and an undue advantage to the prosecution. According to the news reports that have not been denied, an Assistant U.S. Attorney intimated in a statement to the Court that his office had not ordered a check on mail addressed to Roy Cohn or his attorney, Mr. Bolan. In doing so, he misled the Court and was guilty of an inexcusable evasion and lack of candor. The failure of the U.S. Attorney to reprimand his assistant's flagrant violation of the lawyer's ethical duty or to replace him in the prosecution of the case may be construed as condonation."

The ACLU letter also quoted an editorial of the Washington Post-Times Herald of March 3: "A Post Office Department which admits mail watches is not fully believed when it denies opening the mail; and in the same way a Federal Bureau of Investigation which admits tapping a few telephones in violation of the law is not fully believed when it denies tapping many telephones."

A bill to prohibit mail covers has been introduced by Senator Edward Long (D., Mo.). Post Office Chief Counsel Louis Doyle has invoked two Court of Appeals decisions to defend the legality of mail covers. One, U.S. v. Costello (255 Fed 2d 876), held that mail covers do not violate the law forbidding detention and opening of mail. The other U.S. v. Schwartz (283 Fed 2d 107), held that postal regulations are not violated when information from a mail cover is turned over to the Justice Department.

In the Cohn case, Federal Judge Archie Dawson declined to dismiss the indictment on the ground that there was no evidence that the mail itself had been opened.

Dear Fellow Attorney:

We thought you would like to have a copy of the complete reply of Mr. G. Seals Aiken to the attack by Congressman Charles L. Weltner under his cloak of immunity as a Congressman in the U. S. House of Representatives upon Judge Durwood T. Pye of the Atlanta Judicial Circuit. We have therefore had Mr. Aiken's reply printed and enclose herewith a copy of it and are endeavoring to send a copy to every other member of the Bar as a service to the Bar, the Bench, and the Public. You may have read the portion of this article which appeared in a recent issue of the Atlanta Constitution, but we feel that you will be interested in reading it in its entirety in view of its importance.

In our opinion, Judge Pye is entitled to the support of the Bar and the Public in his able, scholarly, courageous, and impartial administration of justice according to law. We consider the attack upon Judge Pye by Congressman Weltner under the circumstances shown by the statement of Mr. Weltner and the reply of Mr. Aiken as an assault upon the judiciary of our State and our constitutional form of government and as tending to encourage the rioters and mobsters who have been creating so much disorder, distress, violence, disruption of business, and danger to the peace, and safety of our law-abiding citizens.

In our opinion, Judge Pye is one of the most able, learned, fearless, and impartial judges in our State. He has shown that he is absolutely incorruptible and dedicated to the fair and impartial administration of justice according to law under all circumstances and at all times without fear or favor.

Judge Pye's recent charge to the Grand Jury relative to the riots and mobs in Atlanta being led and encouraged by outside radicals and troublemakers and aided by a few local brain-washed and deluded followers, so fully and clearly presents the law of our State applicable to such dangerous and destructive conduct, that we have had some of the most important portions of it printed, and are enclosing herewith a copy for your information and consideration as a member of the bar and advocate of law and order.

Lawyers by reason of their training and experience are better qualified than any other group in our society to appreciate the necessity of upholding the judiciary in the fearless and impartial administration of justice according to law and to keep the public properly informed in the premises. We therefore appeal to you to use your valuable influence in this respect for the benefit of our city, county, state, and nation.

Yours for an able, independent, courageous, and impartial

March 24, 1964

Honorable Charles Longstreet Weltner
Congressman from Fifth Georgia District
House Office Building
Washington, D. C.

Dear Mr. Weltner:

COPY

I was shocked and grieved to read in the Atlanta daily papers your attack in the U. S. House of Representatives upon Hon. Durwood T. Pye, Judge of the Superior Court of the Atlanta Judicial Circuit. I was doubly shocked by reason of the fact that you are a prominent Atlanta lawyer and your father is also a noted lawyer, a former Chancellor of the University of Georgia, and was one of my most able and respected instructors in the Atlanta Law School.

As you know, the law of Georgia specifically provides that it is the duty of attorneys at law to maintain the respect due the courts of justice and judicial officers. You must know that your statements about Judge Pye are libelous and contemptuous and that you would be subject to punishment for contempt and to damages for libel if you had not made said statements under your cloak of immunity as a Congressman in the U. S. House of Representatives.

You charged and adjudged Judge Pye guilty of imposing harsh punishments, setting excessive bail, declaring forfeiture of bonds for negligible cause, intimidating defendants on trial, depriving defendants of bail and of a speedy trial, of being unfair, and of being utterly oblivious to the demands of simple justice. You state that "The machinery of the law designed as the servant of justice, has been manipulated" by Judge Pye "so as to become its oppressor," and that "none can speak without jeopardy of contempt." Without attending any of the trials in question before Judge Pye, you use your cloak of immunity as a Congressman to announce to the world that the claims of the defendants that they are unable to obtain a fair trial before Judge Pye are "well founded." You even go so far as to charge Judge Pye with placing the entire city of Atlanta under "an imposed silence" because "none can speak without jeopardy of contempt" and state: "My community must not, by an imposed silence, be charged with the conduct of a single judge. Nor must men of goodwill be without a spokesman when justice has been denied."

I have never read or heard of a more false, unprovoked, and unjustified attack upon a judge, all in his absence, without any jurisdiction whatever over him, without the service of any charge upon him, without any opportunity to him or for anyone in his behalf to be heard. While you falsely accuse him of depriving others of a fair trial, you proceed to charge and adjudge him guilty of despicable acts without any hearing whatever, and accept and present as true, the charges of the persons claiming they cannot get a fair trial before Judge Pye. At the same time, you say you do not argue the innocence of these defendants, that you do not condone their actions, or justify their motives, nor approve of their associations or their political persuasions. Nevertheless, you stated that "The hard truth is that their claim is well founded."

There is no more able, fair, conscientious, learned, dedicated, and courageous judge in Georgia than Judge Pye. He is so known, recognized, and respected not only in Atlanta and Georgia, but throughout the country. He is especially noted for his firm adherence to the letter and spirit of the law and his courage and determination in administering it fairly and justly to every citizen, regardless of his race, creed, previous condition of servitude, or national origin. It was through his prompt and vigorous judicial action according to the law and our State and Federal Constitutions that the violent and destructive riots, sit-ins, lying-ins, kneel-ins, and demonstrations by lawless mobs in Atlanta were brought temporarily to an end some months ago, and upon their renewal recently, have been again stopped by him through his same vigorous, enlightened, and impartial administration of the law.

I have known Judge Pye ever since he started practicing law, and have practiced before him ever since he was elevated to the bench, and I have found him to be temperate, attentive, patient, impartial, studious, and diligent in ascertaining the facts and the applicable principles of law and in applying and upholding the law at all hazards. He recognizes and applies the principle of law laid down by the Supreme Court of Georgia over a hundred years ago that "All courts have power to protect themselves from contempts, and indecency in words or sentiments is a contempt," and that "no court can command from a civilized public that respect which is necessary to an efficient administration of the law, without maintaining in the business of the court, that courtesy, and dignity, and purity, which characterize the intercourse of gentlemen in private life." He also performs his judicial duty in the manner required by the Supreme Court of Georgia in the following language: "It is the duty of the Judge to enforce the laws of the State, made in accordance with the State and Federal Constitutions - the whole law as it applies, in his judgment, to the cases which come before him. He has no right and no power to withhold the application of one single principle of law, to a single case over which he has jurisdiction; he has no dispensation, justifying or excusing an omission to apply the law. Neither conscientious scruples about the morality of the law, nor convictions of its inexpediency - nor what are called the tendencies of the age - nor political biases or party associations - nor fear, nor favor, nor reward, nor the hope of reward, nor all of these combined should be sufficiently potent to induce him, in his judgments to transcend the law, or to fall short of its strict enforcement. If such are his duties, it is wholly immaterial whether a principle of law be brought to his notice by counsel or is suggested by his own knowledge and observation. If a principle grow out of the case, and he believes it to be law, he is bound by the responsibilities of his position - by his official oath - by the very nature of his office - by all the expediencies of judicature, to give it full effect. To that he is called - for that he is clothed with the people's (if I may so speak) judicial sovereignty; and if conscience or aught else suggest a higher law, and conscience cannot yield, let him retire and give place to those who are willing to execute the law." In accordance with the canons of judicial ethics, he refuses to be swayed by partisan demands, public clamor or considerations of personal popularity or notoriety or unjust criticism.

The cases which Judge Pye tried and is now trying involve the most sacred and fundamental provisions of our State and Federal Constitutional system. The defendants in these cases have utterly defied our State laws and have grossly violated the liberty and property rights of our law-abiding citizens. While professing to be non-violent, they have endeavored by force and violence, with public indecency and immorality, to destroy the liberty and property of our loyal and law-abiding citizens. They have been guilty of public indecency and immorality and destruction not only on the premises of law-abiding businesses, but also in the City Jail. Your charges of intimidation, cruelty, and oppression against Judge Pye are baseless and applicable to the rioters and law-breakers for whom you are speaking instead of him. One of your charges against Judge Pye is that "None can speak without jeopardy of contempt." This charge is utterly false. I recently finished a ten week hearing before Judge Pye. I had an associate attorney with me and the opposing parties had three lawyers. We argued for hours every day for ten weeks and Judge Pye was very patient, attentive, courteous, and considerate at all times, and very carefully, studiously, painstakingly, and conscientiously endeavored to follow the law in every particular and with the utmost impartiality toward the parties.

With reference to your statement that "My community must not, by an imposed silence, be charged with the conduct of a single judge," and that "men of goodwill" must not "be without a spokesman when justice has been denied," you are informed that nobody has imposed silence upon Atlanta and the defendants in question have not been deprived of counsel.

Judge Pye would not think of depriving any litigant of counsel or fail or refuse to allow any party his or her right to full representation by counsel under the law and the State and Federal Constitutions. If he did so, he would be subject to reversal by the State Appellate Court having jurisdiction or the U. S. Supreme Court. However, a party on trial in a state court is not entitled to be represented in said trial by a Congressman in the U. S. House of Representatives. He or she is only entitled to a public and speedy trial by an impartial jury of the State Court having jurisdiction of the offense and party according to the state and federal constitutions and laws in accordance therewith. Such a party also has a right to appeal to the highest appellate court of this State if dissatisfied with the verdict of the jury and the judgment of the trial court, and from said appellate court to the U. S. Supreme Court if he or she has been denied a Federal Constitutional right by the State Courts.

The Constitution of Georgia contains ample provisions to protect the rights of all persons in both civil and criminal cases, and your attack upon Judge Pye concerning his handling of cases before him amounts to an attack upon the Judiciary of our State, and is not only very unfair to Judge Pye but is also shocking to the moral sense and a gross and unwarranted reflection upon the purity and fairness of the Georgia Judiciary.

As you well know or should know as a lawyer and Congressman from Georgia, the Constitution of Georgia expressly provides that the people of this State have the inherent, sole, and exclusive right of regulating their internal government and the police thereof, and of altering and abolishing their Constitution whenever it may be necessary to their safety and happiness, and that the Legislative, Judicial, and Executive powers shall forever remain separate and distinct, and no person discharging the duties of one, shall, at the same time, exercise the functions of either of the others, except as provided in said Constitution.

The Georgia Constitution also provides, among many other things:

"Protection to the person and property is the paramount duty of government, and shall be impartial and complete.

"No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, except by due process of law.

"No person shall be deprived of the right to prosecute or defend his own cause in any of the courts of this state, in person, by attorney, or both.

"Every person charged with an offense against the laws of this State shall have the privilege and benefit of counsel; shall be furnished, on demand, with a copy of the accusation, and a list of the witnesses on whose testimony the charge against him is founded; shall have compulsory process to obtain the testimony of his own witnesses; shall be confronted with the witnesses testifying against him; and shall have a public and speedy trial by an impartial jury.

"No person shall be compelled to give testimony tending in any manner to criminate himself.

"Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted; nor shall any person be abused in being arrested, while under arrest, or in prison."

The U. S. Constitution provides that the enumeration therein of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people, and that the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

If Judge Pye or any other Judge of this State deprives any person on trial before him of any of said constitutional rights, such a party is entitled to reversal by the appropriate appellate court of this State, and if not granted by said State Appellate Court, he is entitled to reversal by the U. S. Supreme Court if he has properly raised a Federal constitutional ground.

I was born and reared in Georgia, have lived here all my life, and expect to spend the rest of my life in this State. I resent your attack upon the Judiciary and good name of Atlanta and Georgia. Instead of spending your time and energy in denouncing an able, just, and conscientious Georgia Judge in his efforts to uphold and fairly administer the law of Georgia according to the State and Federal Constitutions, you should be using your ability and influence to prevent the passage of the iniquitous, unconstitutional, and mis-named Civil Rights Bill now pending in the U. S. Senate.

The rioters and law-breakers for whom you are criticising Judge Pye, are demanding the passage of said unconstitutional bill and in the meantime are endeavoring to destroy our constitutional form of government by force and violence in the form of riots and mob demonstrations prior to the passage of said bill. Your attack upon the Judge before whom these rioters and mobsters are being tried is aiding and encouraging them and others of their type to continue their riots and lawless demonstrations, lying-ins, sit-ins, kneel-ins, etc. You certainly must have read of the violence, obscenity, immorality, and destruction of both private and public property, including the City of Atlanta Jail, by these rioters and mobsters.

Judge Pye has rendered a great service to Atlanta and Georgia especially in upholding and administering the laws of Georgia fairly and impartially to these rioters and mobsters, and has set an example which other states being subjected to such riots and mobs would do well to emulate.

The Georgia law provides that "The right of enjoyment of private property being an absolute right of every citizen, every act of another which unlawfully interferes with such enjoyment is a tort for which an action shall lie."

On July 16, 1867, or almost a hundred years ago, the great Ben Hill, U. S. Senator, stated in his famous Davis Hall speech in Atlanta, "I warn you boastful vindictive radicals by the history of your own fathers, by every instinct of manhood, by every right of liberty, by every impulse of justice, that the day is coming when you will feel the power of an outraged and betrayed people  Abrogate state governments; defile your own race, flippantly say the constitution is dead! On, On, with your work of ruin, ye hell-born rioters in sacred things! But remember for all these things the people will call you to judgment. Ah! What an issue you have made for yourselves. Succeed and you destroy the constitution! Fail, and you have covered the land with mourning. Succeed, and you bring ruin on yourselves and all the country! Fail, and you bring infamy upon yourselves and all your deluded followers! Succeed, and you are the perjured assassins of liberty! Fail, and you are defeated, despised traitors forever!" In his famous Notes on the Situation (No. 13) Senator Hill stated "Our constitution - our supreme law, which no congress, nor president, nor earthly power can violate, or authorize to be violated with impunity - is our ruler, our only ruler, and all the highest office-holders - civil and military - are but its servants, and bound, under penalties, to obey its commands  A free man should know no master but the law and bend the knee to no earthly power but the constitution. Sue in damages for every injury; indict for every crime  the time for law's triumph over passion will one day come. If our people now, everywhere, assert these rights, not by again abandoning the Constitution, but by claiming its remedies, that time will come quickly; then we shall demand the criminals wherever found and they will be delivered  We owe it to ourselves, to our children, to free institutions, to teach all, however high or low, who take advantage of degenerate times like these to violate the great guarantees of the law, who trample on the rights of the citizens, that when the political spasm is over they can find no hiding place from the law's avenger or take shelter from its penalties anywhere in the jurisdiction of the constitution."

I do not have to defend the rulings and orders of Judge Pye in the cases in question because they speak for themselves and are strictly in accordance with the law. No authorities have been or can be cited to the contrary.

The U. S. Supreme Court held in 1882 in the case of United States vs Lee:

"No man in this country is so high that he is above the law. No officer of the law may set that law at defiance with impunity. All the officers of the government, from the highest to the lowest, are the creatures of the law and are bound to obey it. It is the only supreme power in our system of government, and every man who by accepting office participates in its functions is only the more strongly bound to submit to that supremacy, and to observe the limitations which it imposes upon the exercise of the authority which it gives."

The U. S. Supreme Court also held many years ago that a decree rendered by a federal court WITHOUT JURISDICTION WAS A MERE ARBITRARY EDICT, CLOTHED IN THE FORM OF A JUDICIAL SENTENCE AND A BLOT UPON OUR JURISPRUDENCE AND CIVILIZATION.

If the lawful orders of Judge Pye can be set aside by a federal court in violation of the U. S. Constitution, then, in the paraphrased language of U. S. Chief Justice Taney in the Merryman case, every citizen of Georgia holds life, liberty, and property at the will and pleasure of any federal court in whose district or circuit he may happen to be found.

Your libelous and defamatory remarks about Judge Pye are comparable to those of Melvin Belli concerning the Ruby trial, in which he referred to Dallas, Texas as the murder capitol of the world. You have used the office of Representative of the Fifth Congressional District of Georgia to libel, slander, and discredit one of the most able, learned, and just State Judges in Georgia. In fact, Judge Pye is recognized by the people of Georgia as one of the finest Judges since the great Judge J. H. Lumpkin, who served upon the same trial court and later upon the Supreme Court of Georgia many years ago. Judge Lumpkin rendered a decision in a celebrated case in the Atlanta Judicial Circuit which was adopted by the Supreme Court of Georgia. In that case Judge Lumpkin upheld and fairly and courageously applied the law to protect one small business from lawless acts of all its competitors. Judge Pye has upheld and fairly and courageously applied the law to protect over a million of our citizens in the Atlanta Judicial Circuit from a comparatively small minority group of lawless rioters, lead by mobsters and law-breakers from other States.

Your remarks have a tendency to present Atlanta as a haven for rioters and the Judge who is fairly trying them according to the law as cruel, unfair, tyrannical, lawless, entirely oblivious to the demands of simple justice, as imposing silence upon a city of over a million people, and as a discredit to your "image" of Atlanta. Your image of Atlanta is entirely different from that of the overwhelming majority of over a million people residing here. They prefer to uphold the laws, customs, and traditions of Atlanta as so ably and correctly presented by the late Henry W. Grady and U.S. Senator Benjamin Harvey Hill, instead of your false image of Atlanta. Your plan for

Atlanta and Georgia and that represented by the mis-named Civil Rights Bill now pending in the U. S. Senate, are utterly obnoxious to the overwhelming majority of our citizens. Their opinion of your program and that of the advocates of the mis-named Civil Rights Bill is best described in the following language of the late Senator Ben Hill: "The complying accept, the resolute reject, none approve, while all despise."

The image of Atlanta of all its true citizens is one of peace, tranquility, morality, safety, happiness, and prosperity raised from the ashes left by Sherman with his fire, sword and rapists, instead of an image of riots, mobs, immorality, indecency, crime, lawlessness, destruction, sorrow, and insecurity.

By your attack upon Judge Pye and thereby our State Judiciary, you have inflicted a blow against State Rights, Local Self Government, Individual Liberty, and Free Enterprise guaranteed by our State and Federal Constitutions. Your attack will also greatly aid the proponents of the assault upon our constitutional system of government in the form of the mis-named Civil Rights Bill now pending in the U. S. Senate.

I challenge you to a debate of this matter either before the people of the Atlanta Judicial Circuit in an open meeting or on the television or radio at the earliest possible date. Our citizens can then decide the issue for themselves from a full presentation of the facts and the law.

As a loyal citizen of Atlanta, Georgia, and of the United States of America, I felt it to be my duty to write this letter to you in defense of the able, just, learned, distinguished and conscientious judge whom you have attacked, and in support of our constitutional form of government. I hope you will realize your mistake in making such an attack and will make a prompt and public retraction and apology. You owe this to Judge Pye as well as the citizens of the Fifth Congressional District of Georgia which you represent in Congress. Such an apology and retraction would help to repair the serious damage you have done to the administration of justice according to law in Atlanta and Georgia in particular and to our Federal constitutional system in general. This letter is not intended in any sense as a personal criticism of you, but as a denunciation of your unwarranted and baseless attack upon Judge Pye under your cloak of immunity as a Congressman in the U. S. House of Representatives.

Yours for the United States of America under the Declaration of Independence and Constitution as conceived, understood and established by the Founding Fathers under the inspiration and guidance of Almighty
God,

PROPERTY RIGHTS VS. INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS

Parts of CHARGE TO THE GRAND JURY by Judge Durwood T. Pye at Fulton County Court House, Atlanta.

Mr. Foreman, Madam and Gentlemen of the Grand Jury, sometimes one reads or hears the statement that "individual rights are superior to property rights", and similar expressions or statements indicating a conflict between what are thus referred to as the "rights of person", on the one hand, and the "rights of property" on the other. These statements rest upon a false premise, are misleading and arise out of a failure to comprehend the subject.

There is no such thing as a right of property or property rights considered separately and apart from the individual owner. Property itself is incapable of the exercise of rights and in the nature of things cannot enjoy and possess them. In the law of land titles an easement may exist appurtenant to the dominent estate in the nature of a covenant running with the land whereby successive owners of the land enjoy the right of such easement over the servient estate, an example of such being a right of way over the adjacent land of another, but obviously such and similar principles are foreign to the distinction sought to be made by those who assert that personal rights are superior to property rights.

The only so-called property right recognized by our system of laws is the right of the private ownership of property, and this right of the individual to own, enjoy, hold and possess in his own name and right is a personal liberty. Its nature and character is the same as that of other personal rights and liberties, as for example, the right of free locomotion and freedom from bodily restraint, freedom of religion, freedom of speech. Indeed, the right of the private ownership of private property is the chief support of the other fundamental liberties of men.

Sir William Blackstone's essay on the origin of property is of such interest and pertinency that we quote it in full, as follows:

In the beginning of the world, we are informed by Holy Writ, the all-bountiful Creator gave to man dominion over all the earth, and "over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth." This is the only true and solid foundation of man's dominion over external things, whatever airy, metaphysical notions may have been started by fanciful writers upon this subject. The earth, therefore, and all things therein, are the general property of all mankind, exclusive of other beings, from the immediate gift of the Creator. And while the earth continued bare of inhabitants, it is reasonable to suppose that all was in common among them, and that everyone took from the public stock, to his own use, such things as his immediate necessities required.

These general notions of property were then sufficient to answer all the purposes of human life; and might, perhaps, still have answered them, had it been possible for mankind to have remained in a state of primeval simplicity, in which "all things were common to him." Not that this communion of goods seems ever to have been applicable, even in the earliest ages, to aught but the substance of the thing; nor could it be extended to the use of it. For, by the law of nature and reason, he who first began to use it, acquired therein a kind of transient property, that lasted so long as he was using it, and no longer. Or, to speak with greater precision, the right of possession continued for the same time, only, that the act of possession lasted.

Thus, the ground was in common, and no part of it was the permanent property of any man in particular; yet, whoever was in the occupation of any determined spot of it, for rest, for shade, or the like, acquired for the time a sort of ownership, from which it would have been unjust and contrary to the law of nature to have driven him by force; but, the instant that he quitted the use or occupation of it, another might seize it without injustice. Thus, also, a vine or other tree might be said to be in common, as all men were equally entitled to its produce; and yet, any private individual might gain the sole property of the fruit which he had gathered for his own repast: a doctrine well illustrated by Cicero, who compares the world to a great theater, which is common to the public, and yet the place which any man has taken is, for the time, his own.

But when mankind increased in number, craft, and ambition, it became necessary to entertain conceptions of a more permanent dominion; and to appropriate to individuals not the immediate use only, but the very substance of the thing to be used. Otherwise, innumerable tumults must have arisen, and the good order of the world been continually broken and disturbed, while a variety of persons were striving who should get the first occupation of the same thing, or disputing which of them had actually gained it. As human life also grew more and more refined, abundance of conveniences were devised to render it more easy, commodious, and agreeable; as habitations for shelter and safety, and raiment for warmth and decency. But no man would be at the trouble to provide either, so long as he had only a usufructuary property in them, which was to cease the instant that he quitted possession; if, as soon as he walked out of his tent or pulled off his garment, the next stranger who came by would have a right to inhabit the one and to wear the other.

In the case of habitations, in particular, it was natural to observe that even the brute creation, to whom everything else was in common, maintained a kind of permanent property in their dwellings, especially for the protection of their young; that the birds of the air had nests, and the beasts of the fields had caverns, the invasion of which they esteemed a very flagrant injustice, and would sacrifice their lives to preserve them. Hence a property was soon established in every man's house and homestead; which seem to have been originally mere temporary huts or movable cabins, suited to the design of Providence for more speedily peopling the earth, and suited to the wandering life of their owners, before any extensive property in the soil or ground was established.

There can be no doubt but that movables of every kind became sooner appropriated than the permanent, substantial soil; partly because they were more susceptible of a long occupancy, which might be continued for months together without any sensible interruption, and at length, by usage, ripen into an established right; but, principally, because few of them could be fit for use till improved and meliorated by the bodily labor of the occupant; which bodily labor, bestowed upon any subject which before lay in common to all men, is universally allowed to give the fairest and most reasonable title to an exclusive property therein.

The article of food was a more immediate call, and therefore a more early consideration. Such as were not contented with the spontaneous product of the earth, sought for a more solid refreshment in the flesh of beasts, which they obtained by hunting. But the frequent disappointments incident to that method of provision, induced them to gather together such animals as were of a more tame and sequacious nature, and to establish a permanent property in their flocks and herds, in order to sustain themselves in a less precarious manner, partly by the milk of the dams, and partly by the flesh of the young.

The support of these their cattle made the article of water also a very important point. And, therefore, the book of Genesis, (the most venerable monument of antiquity, considered merely with a view to history,) will furnish us with frequent instances of violent contentions concerning wells; the exclusive property of which appears to have been established in the first digger or occupant, even in places where the ground and herbage remained yet in common. Thus, we find Abraham, who was but a sojourner, asserting his right to a well in the country of Abimelech, and exacting an oath for his security "because he had digged that well." And Isaac, about ninety years afterwards, reclaimed this his father's property; and, after much contention with the Philistines, was suffered to enjoy it in peace.

All this while, the soil and pasture of the earth remained still in common as before, and open to every occupant; except, perhaps, in the neighborhood of towns, where the necessity of a sole and exclusive property in lands, (for the sake of agriculture,) was earlier felt, and therefore more readily complied with. Otherwise, when the multitude of men and cattle had consumed every convenience on one spot of ground, it was deemed a natural right to seize upon and occupy such other lands as would more easily supply their necessities.

We have a striking example of this in the history of Abraham and his nephew Lot. When their joint substance became so great that pasture and other conveniences grew scarce, the natural consequence was that a strife arose between their servants; so that it was no longer practicable to dwell together. This contention, Abraham thus endeavored to compose: "Let there be no strife, I pray thee, between me and thee. Is not the whole land before thee? Separate thyself, I pray thee, from me. If thou wilt take the left hand, then I will go to the right; or if thou depart to the right hand, then I will go to the left." This plainly implies an acknowledged right in either to occupy whatever ground he pleased that was not preoccupied by other tribes. "And Lot lifted up his eyes, and beheld all the plain of Jordan, that it was well watered everywhere, even as the garden of the Lord. Then Lot chose him all the plain of Jordan, and journeyed east; and Abraham dwelt in the land of Canaan."

As the world by degrees grew more populous, it daily became more difficult to find out new spots to inhabit, without encroaching upon former occupants; and, by constantly occupying the same individual spot, the fruits of the earth were consumed, and its spontaneous products destroyed, without any provision for future supply or succession. It, therefore, became necessary to pursue some regular method of providing a constant subsistence; and this necessity produced, or at least promoted and encouraged the art of agriculture. And the art of agriculture, by a regular connection and consequence, introduced and established the idea of a more permanent property in the soil than had hitherto been received and adopted.

It was clear that the earth would not produce her fruits in sufficient quantities without the assistance of tillage; but who would be at the pains of tilling it, if another might watch an opportunity to seize upon and enjoy the product of his industry, art and labor? Had not, therefore, a separate property in lands, as well as movables, been vested in some individuals, the world must have continued a forest, and men have been mere animals of prey. Whereas, now, (so graciously has Providence interwoven our duty and our happiness together,) the result of this very necessity has been the ennobling of the human species, by giving it opportunities of improving its rational, as well as of exerting its natural faculties.

Necessity begat property; and, in order to insure that property, recourse was had to civil society, which brought along with it a long train of inseparable concomitants: states, government, laws, punishments, and the public exercise of religious duties. Thus connected together, it was found that a part only of society was sufficient to provide, by their manual labor, for the necessary subsistence of all; and leisure was given to others to cultivate the human mind, to invent useful arts, and to lay the foundations of science.

(Parenthetically that extract, or rather that essay, it's not an extract, is contained in McGuffey's Sixth Reader. Those of you who have had opportunity recently to compare the material in McGuffey's Readers with the present readers will have found that McGuffey's Readers compare very favorably.)

The right of the individual to own property has been long recognized. It is recognized in the Ten Commandments given to Moses upon Mount Sinai, "two tables of testimony, tables of stone, written with the finger of God."

Under our system of laws the right of the private ownership of property is regarded as a natural right, not a right handed down by government, but one bestowed by the Almighty upon men, and of which they are of inalienable right entitled to be possessed whenever they have raised themselves to the worthiness of its enjoyment.

Being a right originating in nature and with the Creator, it antedates states, nations and empires, and government is charged with the duty of protecting the individual in the enjoyment thereof. As the Constitution of Georgia states, "Protection to person and property is the paramount duty of government and shall be impartial and complete."

Of the rights of man derived from natural law, as is the right of the private ownership of private property, Cicero said: "Of all these things about which learned men dispute there is none more important than clearly to understand that we are born for justice, and that right is founded not in opinion but in nature: Right reason, agreeing with nature and diffused among all, unchanging, everlasting, which calls to duty by commanding, and deters from wrong by forbidding. It is not allowable to alter this law or deviate from it. Nor can it be abrogated. Nor can we be released from this law either by the Senate or by the people. Nor is it one law at Rome and another at Athens, one law today and another hereafter; but the same law, everlasting and unchangeable, which will bind all nations and all times, and there will be one common lord and ruler of all, even God the framer and proposer of this law."

The same thing is stated on the subject of natural law in Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England.

Few, if any, individual rights are absolute, and the right of the private ownership of private property is not absolute. It is subject to what is called the police power, which, while incapable of precise limitation and definition, is the right of self-preservation possessed inherently and necessarily by every sovereign government. Under police power property may be taken or damaged without payment of compensation, but the exercise of such power is not unlimited. It must bear a substantial relation to the public health, safety, morals and general welfare of the public. It must be reasonable and not arbitrary. What is reasonable is ultimately for the Court to decide. Some examples of the exercise of police power are: (1) ad valorem taxation, and (2) absolute necessity, as in time of war to impede the public enemy, and as when in the great Atlanta fire of years ago, houses were dynamited to prevent the spread of the conflagration.

The State's exercise of the police power, under the principles of the common law which have been carried forward into both the Georgia and the Federal Constitutions, must be consistent with due process of law. Due process of law in each particular case means such an exertion of the powers of government as the settled maxims of the law permit and sanction, and under such safeguards for the protection of individual rights as those maxims prescribe for the class of cases to which the one in question belongs.

For example, due process is satisfied in taxation by an act of the Legislature, and, in the case of destruction during war to impede the enemy or during the great Atlanta fire to prevent the spread of the conflagration, by decision of the authorities in charge.

Under the police power a nuisance per se, or the doing of anything injurious to the public health, safety, morals and so forth of the public, may be prohibited, notwithstanding such prohibition might entail upon the owner or person affected loss and inconvenience, and even if the effect be burdensome. This is so because the right of every man to hold property is coupled with the inherent duty not to injure his neighbors.

By statute the Legislature may provide for limitation of the use of private property if such limitation has a reasonable relation to the public health, safety, morals and general welfare. This principle, however, did not permit the Legislature to authorize zoning regulations, as the Georgia Supreme Court held in Commissioners of Glynn Co. v. Cate. Subsequently, the Constitution was amended to authorize zoning regulations.

Businesses operating under franchises or grants of special privileges, and those exercising monopolies, are, of course, subject to regulation by the General Assembly or its authority.

If a vocation or business or the manner of exercising it is injurious to the rights of others, or is inconsistent with the public welfare, it may be regulated or prohibited altogether by the State or its delegated authorities. The power to regulate, however, does not imply the power to prohibit entirely unless such business comes within a class which may be declared harmful. The regulation imposed upon an ordinary harmless business or vocation must not be unreasonable or arbitrary.

If a vocation or business is affected with a public interest it may be regulated by the Legislature. But this regulation is dependent upon some reasonable necessity for the protection of public health, safety, morality or other phase of the general welfare, and the regulations must be to that end. Examples of vocations are the practice of law or medicine. Examples of businesses are tourist camps, dance halls, hotels and restaurants.

The right to earn a living is fundamental, inherent and natural, and one of the most sacred and valuable rights of the citizen. The right to follow one of the common avocations of life is an inalienable right. Permission or license from the State may not be imposed as a condition precedent to engage in an ordinary common business. What is often referred to as a license is not a license at all but a mere tax, and it may not be in such amount as to be confiscatory or prohibitive.

Restrictions upon the private ownership of property which have no substantial relation to the public health, morals and safety, are forbidden by both the Georgia and Federal Constitutions, and amount to the confiscation of property without due process. The purpose of the guaranty of due process of law is to prevent governmental encroachment against the life, liberty and property of individuals, to secure the individual from the arbitrary exercise of the powers of government unrestrained by the established principles of private right and distributive justice, and to protect property from confiscation by legislative enactment.

Mr. Justice Gilbert, in his opinion in 172 Ga.at 852, 853, in the case of Bowden v. Savannah, wrote: "No one in this day contends that the right of private ownership of property is absolute. If held, it must be so used as not to injure unreasonably the rights of others. The American Courts have very generally approved the constitutionality of governmental destruction of property rights, rights which have, from the beginning of struggling America, been a constant incentive and inspiration to the industrious and frugal to build for the future. Is the breaking down and destruction of that incentive a worthy achievement of the Courts of America? Only time will demonstrate. I am not blind to the apparently overwhelming tendency to weaken and destroy individual enterprise and self reliance, and to more and more magnify the powers of government, and to encourage more and more the citizen to seek whatever he wants from a munificent, generous and all powerful government. It is only human nature for one to believe sincerely in the justness of that which redounds to his own interests or appeals to his desires. For these reasons it is the duty of the Courts, the last palladium of the weak against the strong, the few against the many, to strictly construe these limitations upon individual property, and to administer justice under the law and the evidence. Truth is the object of every legal investigation."

What property is the subject of private ownership? Every species of property, real, personal and mixed, choses in action and contracts. It includes the right to labor and the fruits thereof. It includes lands, chattles, money, bank accounts, contracts of employment, insurance policies, every species of real and personal property, every contract right, and every avocation, profession and employment. And property includes not only title, ownership and possession, but also the right of control, and the use of that which is owned.

The word "property", as stated by American Jurisprudence, signifies not only the physical thing which may be the subject of ownership, but the right of dominion or indefinite right of user and disposition which one may lawfully exercise over particular things or subjects. It signifies not only those tangible things which one may own, but everything he may have of an exchangeable value. It includes every interest anyone may have in any and everything that is the subject of ownership by men, together with the right fully to possess, use, enjoy and dispose of the same.

The Court has said that the right of the private ownership of private property is the chief support of the other fundamental liberties of men. Let us examine this statement by referring to the Bills of Right in the Georgia Constitution and in the First Amendments to the United States Constitution.

Article 1, Section 1, Paragraph 12 of the Constitution of Georgia provides: "All men have the natural and inalienable right to worship God, each according to the dictates of his own conscience, and no human authority should, in any case, control or interfere with such right of conscience." See also Paragraphs 13 and 14.

The first article of amendment of the Federal Constitution provides: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

These provisions of the Constitutions establish freedom of religion. Their effectiveness is, however, in large measure dependent upon the right of the private ownership of property, for if the particular church or congregation could not own and possess its own edifice for worship, its own physical endowment for the maintenance and propogation of the faith, the practical employment and enjoyment of this freedom would be enormously circumscribed.

Paragraph 15 of Section 1, Article 1 of the Constitution of Georgia provides: "No law shall ever be passed to curtail, or restrain the liberty of speech, or of the press; any person may speak, write and publish his sentiments, on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that liberty." The first article of amendment of the Federal Constitution provides that Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press.

Thus, freedom of speech and press is guaranteed as a right personal to each individual. The effectiveness of this guarantee is, however, likewise largely dependent upon the right of the private ownership of property. Particularly is this true as to newspapers, radio and television stations. If these enterprises could not own the plant and equipment necessary to sustain them, freedom of speech and press would be as to them a dead letter.

Paragraph 16, Section 1, Article 1 of the Georgia Constitution provides: "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrant shall issue except upon probable cause, supported by oath, or affirmation, particularly describing the place, or places, to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized." The fourth amendment of the Federal Constitution is in the same language.

The constitutional mandate of this requirement of personal liberty is in large part to the end that the citizen shall be protected in the enjoyment of private property against the arbitrary conduct of the agents of government.

Paragraph 19, Section 1 of Article 1 of the Georgia Bill of Rights provides that no soldier shall in time of peace be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner, and Paragraph 22 provides that the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed, but the General Assembly shall have power to prescribe the manner in which arms may be borne. Similar provisions are in the Federal Constitution, amendments 3 and 2. Article 1, Section 3, Paragraph 1 of the Georgia Constitution provides that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public purposes without just and adequate compensation being paid. The similar provision of the United States Constitution is in amendment 5. These provisions all presuppose private ownership.

The great principle of the common law that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process is embodied in both constitutions, in our Georgia Constitution by Paragraph 3 of Article 1, Section 1, and in the United States Constitution as against the Federal Government by the fifth amendment. Article 17 of the Georgia Constitution prohibits involuntary servitude as does amendment 13 of the Federal Constitution. "Protection to person and property is the paramount duty of government and shall be impartial and complete", our Constitution provides.

Thus, liberty is guaranteed in broad and sweeping terms: the liberty to work and earn a living, the liberty to marry and rear a family, the liberty of the parents to rear, instruct and train their children, the liberty to choose one's own associates, the liberty to dwell in peace under the protection of the laws.

But what are these liberties worth without the liberty to own property? Of what value is the right to labor if one cannot retain the fruits thereof? The right of men and women to marry, establish a home and rear a family is essentially dependent upon the right to select the home wherein they dwell. And this is impossible unless one may own his own home, or freely enter into a contract for possession and rental of the property of another, both of which rights equally constitute property, that is, the right of ownership, and the right of contract. Otherwise, one would be compelled to occupy whatever quarters, if any, were assigned to him by the powers that be. The right of the parents to instruct the youth will in the years to come depend more and more upon the liberty of private ownership of property. No longer can the public schools teach that the Creator is the Lord and Father of us all. Washington has established Mammon in the place of the God of the Christians and the Jews, and parents must turn to their own resources lest we rear a generation of atheists. As to the right to select one's own associates, this is a farce if one is dependent on government. Without the right of private ownership of property, liberty is reduced to mere locomotion, and the status of the citizen to that of the serf.

The use of property is itself property and under the protection of the Constitutions and the laws. Who shall be admitted thereo, who shall remain thereon, are questions of possession and use addressed to the owner, and in the case of the business, the proprietor thereof. When these rights of ownership, possession and use are violated, the law is violated, the most elementary and fundamental rights are violated, and it is the duty of the government of the State to afford relief. The proprietor of a lawful business, obeying the laws, paying taxes, is entitled to have his property protected, and if the government of the State does not protect it, that government has failed in the first duty of government.

The Act approved February 18, 1960, and set forth in Ga. Laws 1960, page 142, is as follows: "An Act to make it a misdemeanor for any person to refuse to leave certain premises when requested to do so, to repeal conflicting laws and for other purposes. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Georgia: Section 1. It shall be unlawful for any person, who is on the premises of another, to refuse and fail to leave said premises when requested to do so by the owner or any person in charge of said premises or the agent or employee of such owner or such person in charge. Any person violating the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punished as for a misdemeanor. Section 2. All laws and parts of laws in conflict with this Act are hereby repealed."

Obviously this Act has nothing whatever to do with so-called compulsory segregation or so-called compulsory integration, nor is it in any way affected by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in the cases of Peterson, Lombard, Gober, Avent and Shuttleworth decided May 20, 1963. Indeed in these cases Mr. Justice Harlan explicitly says in analyzing the decision of the majority of the Court, that it does not suggest that action denying equal protection may be found in the mere enforcement of trespass laws in relation to private business establishments from which the management, of its own free will, has chosen to exclude persons.

It is common knowledge that this law, during recent months and weeks, has been flouted, defied and violated, that these violations have been frequent and repeated, and the results of combinations and conspiracies. This is a matter of great seriousness, involving as it does the property of the citizen, and the authority and capability of the officers of the government of the State to enforce the laws of the State established for the protection of the most elementary rights of the citizen.

The Court explicitly charges the Grand Jury to have bills of indictment in reference to these offenses prepared and laid before you, to cause the witnesses to be summoned before you and to testify under oath on these indictments, and to return true bills in each and every case in which the evidence shows this law has been violated.

Although this offense is a misdemeanor, due to the importance of these cases, the Court directs that they be retained in this Court for trial.

Mr. Foreman, Madam and Gentlemen of the Grand Jury, the government is divided into three branches: The legislative, the executive, and the judicial. It is the duty of the legislative department to make the laws; it is the duty of the executive department to execute the laws; and it is the duty of the judicial department to apply the laws. Each of these departments is required under our system to refrain from intruding upon the prerogatives of the other. This is necessary in order that free institutions may prevail.

The Judge and the Grand Jury belong to the judicial department of the government. Courts and juries administer justice according to the forms and modes of law. They are far above faction and should never permit themselves to be made the instruments of party or the conduits of propaganda.

The function of the Grand Jury in the administration of justice cannot be overemphasized. Its importance is equaled only by its antiquity as an institution.

The foremost function of government, to maintain order in the land, and the administration of justice between man and man, are inseparable, as the maintenance of the peace and good order of society must rest upon the solid foundation of the just application of the laws to all citizens no matter what their station in life.

The author of Proverbs said, "To do justice and judgment is more acceptable to the Lord than sacrifice."

By your duties which you undertake today you help to keep alight the flame of justice, and help to see that her scales are ever held with even and impartial hands.

Mr. Foreman, Madam, Gentlemen of the Grand Jury, it is the hope of the Court that Providence may guide you in your work.
